guished body an excerpt from a letter received by me from William Tetley, member of the Provincial Parliament for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce. For those who do not know the riding, it is the largest English-speaking riding in Quebec, and was formerly represented by the Honourable Eric Kierans, and quote:

"The weekly newspapers and the 'Monitor' in particular, are, in my view, reporting to the public much better than any other source, the work of the representatives in local provincial and federal politics. Without them, there would be an enormous vacuum."

The point I am trying to make, without belittling the Montreal Star or the Montreal Gazette is that English Canadians living in Quebec have a great need for a spokesman or a newspaper which will interpret the events of the day and guide them in their thinking.

This is the role which the Monitor attempts to play in this area, hindered seriously, albeit, by a lack of finances and resources; however, while we face strict limitations, we nevertheless provide our readers with a fully informative, comprehensive and, above all, an objective weekly edition of news relating to our particular community.

Suburbanites demand a better than average newspaper. This is because, as the surveys have shown, suburban readers have better than average education and better than average incomes.

The weekly newspaper must show leadership in its community because people read their suburban newspapers to find out what is going on in their home town while they are away at work.

If leaders in industry want to influence the minds of decision-makers, they should air for the medium that gets into the decision-maker's home.

At the beginning of this talk, I used the expression "oft ignored weekly press". This is in direct reference to the amount of advertising placed by government departments in weeklies. The standard that's used in a metropolitan area such as ours is: we are covered by the dailies, everyone reads the dailies. That may be so, but they also read the weeklies because we tailor our product to satisfy their needs. We keep them informed about community happenings and major developments, specifically as it pertains to them. They literally devour our papers, and the government is missing a tremendous opportunity of getting its message across through the use of paid advertising.

If the weekly press in the suburban communities ceased to exist due to a lack of advertising, it would be more than just the death of another newspaper. It would create a vacuum in our society which will never be replaced.

I might also add at this point that we work very hard at scooping the daily press and we have from time to time scooped them on major news stories. This is because news sources have come to trust us to treat them fairly and objectively in our reporting and editorials. We have the ear of our Members of Parliament, our local civic representatives and the local police chiefs.

As the members of this Committee are aware, the current situations which have and continue to develop in the Province of Quebec are causing a great amount of anxiety amongst the population of the Province and, moreover, within the communities we serve. While it may be a simple matter of stressing pro-English and anti-French messages in our editorials, it is a stand we decline to take.

What we attempt to do is evaluate the facts relating to proposed legislation and attempt to comment objectively if we believe comment is justified.

We frequently discover that speakers rarely relate the negative aspects of such legislation other than the positive and progressive features already mentioned. It is because of this reason that we attempt to be more objective and rational in our summations.

We do not believe in rendering hasty and unwarranted criticism only for the sake of portraying a strictly pro-English image; yet, and you, we have been critical of those individuals, who occupy the seats of government in the Province of Quebec, whom we believe on the basis of their actions abuse the legislative powers to serve their own ends, and as a result, have been instrumental in creating the anxiety which prevails over Quebec today.

We concern ourselves to the extent of being serious, not frivolous, in an attempt to draw together a better understanding of both English-speaking and French-speaking problems and aspirations. In so doing, I believe we are rendering a positive contribution to both the province and to the residents of the communities we serve, in particular.

In discussing the news content of the metropolitan weekly, the question of the news gathering is often asked. How large a staff is required to compete with the rich daily media, television and radio? Well, basically, the operation is the same as most of the weeklies across the country, be they rural or urban, large or small.

In our particular operation, the news content and editorial policy is resolved by two people, the editor and myself. The editor really is an editor, reporter, re-write-man, leg-man, sports specialist, women's specialist, political seer and above all, long on temper, pleasant on the phone, and prepared to work long hours.

The 'Monitor' through its 46 years of existence has managed to build up a strong string of contributors who have a great following amongst our readers.

The sports columnist is in reality a high school principal who has been writing our sports columns for 25 years as his avocation.

The founder of the paper, although retired from active work, contributes a general news column every second week.

A music-oriented column has been written by the same person for more than 30 years.

Our news service, our Canadian press, our Associated Press and UPI are our readers. They supply the news when they are not busy making it. Together with our friends in government, our well-read contributors and long hours, we manage each week to produce a paper which seems to be in demand in the community.

Sensationalism is a rarity. Good solid news coverage, level-headed interpretation of the events of the day as it pertains to our community and outspoken columnists such as the O'Mearas, father and son—that's what makes a suburban weekly a viable force within such a competitive and frustrating climate as exists today in Montreal.

Before closing—I won't get hit on the head—I would like to answer some of the questions asked of me in writing by this Committee.

Number one: a weekly with a conscience should lead public opinion, never follow it; two, at the moment, there are no controls explicit or implicit over the content of weeklies and there should be none. Our democratic society should, and I believe would, under no circumstances, permit a censoring body; number three, almost the total content of our papers are written or re-written by our own staff. We use very little, if any, syndicated services excepting for filler use, though we do find on our women's pages that there is a demand for recipes and patterns, and we use these as supplied by the various agencies. Thank you.

The Chairman: Thank you very much, Mr. Miller. Ten minutes on the nose. Thank you so much.

Next is Mr. Roy Farran, the North Hill News, Calgary. Mr. Farran?

Mr. Roy Farran, 'North Hill News', Calgary, Alberta: Mr. Chairman, honourable Senators: I apologise in the beginning for my unorthodox style which is to follow, but after hearing so many other speakers, maybe I won't be as far off the beam as I expected to be.

From five hundred rugged independent newspapermen, you are undoubtedly going to get 500 different points of view.

Now, I know that people nowadays tend to talk in a sort of jargon that originates with those university professors with mickey mouse degrees like sociology and political science and communications. You know, they talk obliquely, using such words as "meaningful", "commitment", "establishment", "involvement" and they avoid the truth in simple Anglo-Saxon phrases.

Now, the truth as I see it is that a newspaper is an economic enterprise whose first duty is to survive. That's its first duty, to itself and to its employees. If it doesn't survive, it cannot do any of the things which these woolly-headed professors think it should because it would be dead.

Now, by freedom of the press, we—I mean that in the royal sense—I should say, I—mean the right of any free citizen to start publishing a pamphlet, a newsletter, a flyer, a dodger, a weekly, daily or a periodical of any sort without a licence.

These sociology professors can start one. They can start one on the university campus, in the Senate. They don't require a licence, but they won't be around to broadcast their views for long, if they don't understand that their first purpose is to survive economically, unless, of course, they are subsidized by the state which, I hope, is unthinkable in Canada. Of course, they don't often understand this.

You have got to remember that professors of English seldom write bestsellers and I suppose it's true that playwrights always resent critics, just as I confess to a little inner resentment at the very existence of this Senate Committee. It's an inner resentment that's already being tailored to some extent because for the first time, I am beginning to realize how hard Senators work; for years I have criticized the Senate as being a useless organization. Obviously if they are going to make anything meaningful out of this great barrage of different opinions, they are worth quite a bit.

Now, the basic economic pattern of newspapers is that they are carriers of advertising, whatever this charming lady in white thinks. Their economic success as advertising carriers depends directly on their acceptance by their readers. Newspapers have existed in history without dependence on advertising, but in recent decades, it has been unusual to depend on circulation revenues alone.

Although I believe that historically the political pamphlets of people like John Wilkes demonstrated freedom of the press, our raison d'être, today, as newspapers, is as conveyors of the news.

Now, everyone has different ideas on content and make-up of newspapers, but I think that reporting of hard news is our most successful function. Printed media are the most honest media—somebody else said this—they must stand up, be counted much more than those who deal in the transient glimpse of television or the transient voice of radio. The words are there as evidence to analyse for the lawyers to mull over, to look at from all sides. People like this, and the newspapers can also be more exhaustive in detail in their treatment of a story. They are a better mirror of the contemporary scene, less of a distorting mirror.

In content, their first determination is to carry enough advertising to pay the bills and to make a profit. The more advertising it sells, the more editorial content it can carry. The economic box car is only so big; so, the size of the paper is governed directly by the amount of ads you sell.

Then the second determination—it only comes second—is to report the hard news, fill in the space between the ads. For a local weekly, the idea is to endeavour to get the real grass roots news that is missed by the media that are less parochial; to use local names, addresses, marriages, births, deaths and what my university professors, or even Senator Davey perhaps, might call "trivia" are much more important to the weekly than the American involvement in Vietnam.

Our third function after reporting the news is to entertain, and I call many provocative editorials and gossip columns a form of entertainment, just as much as the comic strips.

Only a poor fourth, comes the educational function which bleeding hearts, altruistic people think should be first. These professors think that's our first duty, but I say that education is primarily a matter for the school boards and not for the newspapers.

My organization owns two weeklies, a suburban weekly and a rural weekly, and we print some 30 or 40 weeklies owned by other people. Our approach is different as between the suburban and the rural weeklies.

The suburban weekly devotes 30 per cent of its space to twisting the tails of local government at city hall. I am an alderman and my tail is twisted by it as well. Senator Hays will remember his tail from time to time was twisted in the past. It's controversial, and it steps on many toes. It has its boring pages—to some people, it has very local news about community clubs and the PTA and Tiny Mite hockey inside, but it does superimpose on that an impish veneer. We are cheeky. We are not like the Montreal Monitor, apparently. We are more brash than the dailies. We are small, but we shout louder. We have little dignity. We give the impression that we are sort of a little man's giant-killer.

Now, the rural weekly, on the other hand, is seldom controversial. Its editorials are what all farmers would think. In other words, they are leading us. We are not leading them, and apart from the gossip we call "Country News", that comes in from various districts, most of the stories are about markets and prices and down-to-earth agricultural business; we do run into national farm news as well.

I believe that all newspapers of any consequence tend to be intimidated by the courts. The law does not recognize any watchdog duties by newspapers on behalf of the public, and I think this is a pity. The courts give no more rights to newspapers than to any other citizen, not even the qualified privilege which is possessed by minor levels of government. Senator Davey said we were privileged here. There is some doubt whether we really are, outside the halls of the Senate itself. Newspapers are much more circumspect than in the ambunctious days of yester-year, Bob Edwards of the Calgary Eye Opener and so on, when the press was much freer. The courts have not recognized lack of malice or defence. Even truth is not a complete defence in Canadian courts.

We personally do not like columns. Almost all our content is written by our staff, by ringers or by part-time correspondents. We don't like news releases either. We regard them as a sort of hoax pulled by the advertising agencies. They call it, "public relations"—diverting money into their pockets that should be spent on real advertising of benefit to their clients.

We would not object to a press council to arbitrate upon such matters as journalistic ethics; provided that their powers were limited to public reprimand, like the British council. In fact, in a way, we would welcome them to perhaps secure for us some rights we feel we should have.

We would object to any government interference with the freedom of any Canadian to print his news and views without a licence. We don't like the trend towards concentration of property in too few hands in all business fields in Canada but we don't personally feel particularly frightened of big newspaper chains. Southams can fall; Kemsley and Northcliffe did in Britain, and Thomsons can still rise from the ashes only to fall again. Just so long as we are free, somebody will come along and knock them off their pedestals some time. You can't legislate against bigness in the media any more than you can legislate against supermarket chains in favour of corner grocery stores. Thank you.

The Chairman: Thank you, Mr. Farran. That was eight minutes. I say it was eight minutes because I think that somebody may feel I was afraid to tap for fear you would think it was government interference. In fact, it was simply eight minutes, and because you took my name in vain several times, I would only say to you that anybody who twists Senator Hays' tail several times can't be all bad!

Our third speaker is Gérald Cyr, 'Le Nouveau Progrès', St-Jérôme, Quebec. Mr. Cyr?

[Translation]

Mr. Gérald Cyr, Publisher, Le Nouveau Progrès, St-Jérôme: Mr. Chairman, Honourable Senators, I do not wish to take up all the points raised by our association, particularly by Mr. Gagnon, our President. But I did agree to express the point of view of the provincial newspaper, and give you an idea of the conditions under which we operate.

I own a newspaper in a city of 30,000 near the metropolis of Montreal. In essence, our news coverage has to be restricted to the city and its immediate surroundings. There are two reasons for this: first, our readers demand local and regional news; second, national and international news receives ample coverage in the dailies. As was mentioned this morning, I fully agree with Mr. Gagnon's view that the weekly serves to mould public opinion. As was said just now, we do not follow it, we help to shape it. The weekly is the mirror of the community. In a way, it is minor history that is recorded everyday. The news printed in provincial weeklies is written mainly by their own staffs.

As far as French-language papers are concerned, there is no agency capable of serving us. It is pointless, therefore, without painting too dark a picture, I would nevertheless like to acquaint the Committee with the difficulties that weeklies face. In my opinion, the difficulties are pretty enormous, and pretty serious. Some have already been mentioned, and I shall add a few of my own. One factor is the drop in national advertising. Radio and television go into people's homes and cost them nothing.

Some Quebec papers—including my own—have adopted a system of free distribution, and they now number about twenty. I think the fact that this has happened is fairly significant.

Personally, I should like to point out that the main problem, in my opinion, is in the area of staff training. We are constantly having to train new employees, and this costs us quite a bit. As you know, even if we consider only provincial weeklies, there is no room for amateurism these days. You have to perform like a real professional. When we have finished giving an employee the proper training, he starts to get offers, he sees openings in the big cities or even in government, and he leaves us. We are quite unable to pay the rates offered by government or big business, because the publication of a provincial weekly newspaper is almost entirely a labour of love.

Like many others, our paper has managed to survive solely because one or two people contribute their time without remuneration. Whenever we have to train staff, it costs us time and money. I will take the liberty of making a practical suggestion to the Committee.

We want government subsidies for the time it takes to train staff. We feel that an allowance of some kind should be paid for the training of our staff, since no suitable school exists, and even if one did, we would need training different from what can be taught in a school. Here, I have another practical suggestion to make. I would suggest an allowance covering 90 per cent of the salary for the first year, 60 per cent for the second, and 30 per cent for the third. The selection of candidates qualifying for the allowance could be handled through the Canada Manpower Centres, as is now done in the case of manpower retraining courses.

Secondly, it seems to me that the Government of Canada should try to give more support to provincial press enterprises by sponsoring more advertisements designed to familiarize people with government services. At present, what advertising revenue there is comes from a few announcements for the Post Office at Christmas; Public Works announcements, which are few and far between; occasional notices from the Crown Assets Disposal Corporation; and finally, one or two advertisements for savings bonds. We feel there is much to be gained by informing people about such things as taxes and social benefits.

We regularly receive large numbers of press releases from various departments that are of real interest, but we cannot publish them because we do not have the space, and we do not have the space because we do not have the revenue.

We feel that the Government of Canada should buy about six thousand dollars' worth of advertising from a provincial newspaper every year—an amount equal to the salary of a government clerk stationed in a city to inform the people of the services the Government provides. In this case, instead of having a clerk on the spot, the information would flow to the people through the newspaper. In my opinion, press enterprises deserve support from government, since they contribute to the life of the community just as a theatre group contributes to the cultural development of a region.

On this point, we would point out that the Government of Quebec attaches more and more importance to press enterprises, and now grants a very substantial volume of advertising through the Quebec Information Office. Information from the various departments comes through this Office, and we find this a very practical method. Thus, while it gets more out of the newspapers, the Government of Quebec gives them more and more paid advertising, to the great satisfaction of both parties.

In conclusion, I would say that I believe your Committee is on the scene at the right moment, and many newspapers are expecting a good deal from you. Thank you for giving us this opportunity to express our views.

The Chairman: Thank you very much. Thank you, Mr. Cyr.

The final panelist in this particular panel is Dr. A. I. Miller, the North Renfrew Times from North Renfrew.

Dr. A. I. Miller, 'North Renfrew Times', Renfrew, Ontario: Thank you, Senator Davey, honourable Senators, ladies and gentlemen: I speak with some diffidence as an amateur surrounded by professionals, indeed not even as a Canadian. I have to impose on you a short but necessary preamble.

The North Renfrew Times is a small-town newspaper, is published in Deep River—population about 5,000. It's an unusual newspaper in that no individual participates in the profits and in that most of the copy is generated by unpaid volunteers. The paper is owned by the Deep River Community Association, which is a non-profit corporation of the clubs and societies in the town.

The object of that Association is to promote recreation of all types and most of the newspaper profits go for this purpose.

The actual operation of the paper is in the hands of an unpaid editorial board, usually of about six members, and who have complete control over the news and comment content of the paper, except that the Community Association may request the resignation of any member of the editorial board, something that has never happened, but otherwise they are completely free.

We are inevitably very deeply rooted in the sad experiences. Further than that, some of the community. The people that work for the paper, both as volunteers and the handful of part-time paid employees, absolutely need to have involvement in at least some sections of the community life.

Where this isn't so, we have had several editorial board members have to have very long and very deep involvements in the community, if we are to effectively report on the news and to comment informatively on it; and it is important too in our ability to identify as part of the town by our readers.

The less important, not only in a passive sense but in the active one of obtaining contributions to the paper—the hard core of our news comes from the various clubs and societies. We also have a regular number of feature writers and reporters who are unpaid like the editorial board itself, and of course, we receive a fair number of letters to the editor that are, I think, of very high standard. We are different in this respect from the first speaker on this panel in that our correspondents or feature writers come and go. They will be with the paper for perhaps two or three years and then someone else replaces them. It's a steady stream and this is true of the editors too.

I would say that we are very deeply involved in the community that we serve, and I think that this is certainly what weeklies ought to be.

That, in a way, is what the community does for the newspaper, but what should and does the newspaper do for it? There are two functions that I would like to particularly highlight as especially important. I believe that a paper should be a tremendous cohesive force in the community. I think there is a special challenge to weeklies here, particularly at this point in time because our communities are growing larger, and I don't mean in the physical sense of growing suburbs. I mean there is growing importance of county council. County school boards have appeared in Ontario. There is a fairly obvious trend, in Ontario at least, towards regional government and weeklies have to try very hard indeed to present this enlarged community to their readers.

In our area at least, I don't think any other medium is effectively doing this. This is particularly true for Deep River. It's a relatively new and implanted community. It was founded in 1945 to go with the Chalk River Nuclear Laboratories. It has only very tenuous links with the surrounding area, and about 50 per cent of the people in our town are not Canadian, at least in origin.

We try in our immediate area outside the town, the villages round about, to strengthen our reporting of events there. And in the county at large, we have begun a weekly review of events that are happening elsewhere in the county to help identify the people in our town with the county.

I think I can say safely that we are doing an excellent job of reporting the county school board, and I hope we are working our way towards good in-depth reporting of county council.

This leads me on to what I consider to be the most important function of all for a weekly newspaper and that is objective reporting and comment on the activities of the various elected and non-elected public bodies.

I often suspect that weekly newspapers must be the only effective counter-balance to and channel of information flow from the local councils. If it wasn't for our reporting, and to a lesser extent, our comments and the comments that we print from readers, democracy at the local level, I believe, would be a complete sham.

I am speaking from experience here. The part of Scotland that I grew up in had a feeble weekly press and democracy at the county level, the local district council level was a sham. It was completely disreputable. It didn't do a tremendous amount of damage. It didn't have perhaps as much power as local government does here, but I think this is a tremendous danger.

If we ever lose the weekly press, we lose local democracy.

How then should we handle our reporting of the local government and the like? You have asked whether we should lead or follow the public opinion, and I would say quite categorically that we should attempt to lead it, but we have got to be very careful in doing this that we never slant our news coverage as distinct from our editorial content.

If we are going to be an effective leader of opinion, then you have to be reasonably credible, and that means that you must scrupulously search out the other person's point of view. You have to be respected as a source of comment. To this end, we sign all our editorials. They are written by different members of the editorial board, but all are signed.

I believe that to follow public opinion rather than to lead it would disastrously undermine the thinking public's respect for the paper, and in general public opinion seems to me to be usually behind on its information. A newspaper should both argue its own views and attempt to provide the information and a forum for meaningful discussion of alternatives.

There are some areas where I think we must keep editorial comment out; for example, our standing procedure is for no editorials on narrow party political lines—we can't tell our readers in our editorial columns for whom we think they should vote at elections. This doesn't include comment on government policy.

I think the test here is whether we have an effective discussion with anyone. If we were to blast a particular party or support a particular party, at the federal or political level, there would be very little come-back to us. We have got to realize we are tremendously powerful and it's all right as long as there is someone to counter-balance it, someone to discuss or somebody to put up the other point of view, but there are so many areas where we have to keep out.

Freedom of the press seems to me to mean a number of things. It's the freedom to publish anything that ultimately is in the public interest, and I don't define the public interest to include selling newspapers, I am afraid. It's freedom from bias in reporting, since a press, that's tied to opinions of its publishers or editors in news reporting, isn't free. It's freedom from any substantial influence from any pressure groups. You must be free to decide yourselves as editors on your editorial comment. It's freedom for all points of view to be expressed not just the ones you believe in. It's not a sort of freedom that's easy to come by, I suspect, but even if we never fully attain it, the closer we get to it, the heavier is the responsibility that's put on us as editors than would be the case under controlled conditions where we had to follow a particular pressure group's opinion.

This leads me on to the control of the press. I don't believe that the press is entirely free even if all the other elements are available. We have got the normal restraints of libel, of course, but there are restraints from public opinion too. If you annoy people by your reporting, you very rapidly lose your influence, annoying them in the sense of annoying them trivially, and this is especially so, of course, with a special section of our public, our advertisers, as it affects our editorial rather than our news content.

News content, I believe, we must publish without any question of considering anyone else. When it comes to annoying advertisers in editorial comment, then I think we have to think carefully, but we have on occasions knowingly gone ahead and annoyed our advertisers. We have lost advertising accounts as a result of this, but I think we would not be serving our readers if we effectively were an extension of the chamber of commerce. I think to an extraordinary degree, we are free from these commercial pressures because no one's really particularly worried about making money for themselves out of the paper. Of course we are restrained, as well as in the normal ways, by the need not to damage our confidential channels by irresponsibly leaking information. We are also very definitely restrained by our collective editorship.

A press council? I don't really think we do need a mechanism like the British Press Council to discipline the weeklies. I somehow doubt if there are hardly any cases that are of the sort that seem to come before the British Press Council. I suppose there are some exceptions and perhaps it would be useful for those, but I would agree with an earlier speaker that a press council should be of the sort that would reprimand rather than have any real power over the papers.

Syndicated news—I would say this was definitely inappropriate. I seem to be in agreement with the other panelists on this. It is a local newspaper, and outside material should never pre-empt space. I go as far as to say that a weekly that relies heavily on syndicated material is a very sick paper, and despite not following Mr. Farran's first point as our cardinal principle, I am happy to say we are still surviving.

Thank you.

The Chairman: Thank you very much, Dr. Miller.

I am going to once again go to the floor microphones. We will follow the same procedure if you will go to the microphones. We will call on you in order. Perhaps while people are going, I might ask Mr. Farran just one question.

What is the circulation of the North Hill News?

Mr. Farran: 16,500.

The Chairman: Sixteen thousand five hundred?

Mr. Farran: This is paid but every once a month on average we stretch our arms to full coverage, and "full coverage" means saturation coverage of our area; then it goes up to 5,000, so average total circulation would be, I think, closer to 19,250.

The Chairman: What is the circulation of the dailies in Calgary?

Mr. Farran: Circulation of the Calgary Herald is 84,000 in the metropolitan area. For the Calgary Albertan it's around 19,000 in the metropolitan area. I hope I am not doing damage. I am giving round figures. This is according to my recollection.

The Chairman: You have made the point that I wanted to make that your circulation is about equal or I thought perhaps a little bit ahead of the...

Mr. Farran: Of the morning paper.

The Chairman: Of the Albertan, yes. Have you ever considered going daily?

Mr. Farran: We have considered it but I guess we have got kind of fat and complacent in recent years. We have considered challenging the Edmonton Journal, and we have a plant in Edmonton, and we have worked out the economics, and it would be a marginal operation. I would be gambling. If I were ten years younger, I might do it.

The Chairman: Mr. Farran, I may ask you then if you were ten years younger and you decided to do it—This is not a facetious question, I am curious to hear your answer. Would you have the same priority if you were a daily publisher; in other words, you say your first determination is advertising? Should that be true in the daily newspaper as well?

Mr. Farran: Yes, I believe this; looking in my crystal ball as to what's going to happen in the newspaper field—I believe that eventually when Canadian advertising agencies become better than they are now, as advocates or advisers to their clients, newspapers, radio, television, will all be judged for merit on sophisticated public opinion polls. They won't be relying on about 50 postcards to judge the radio stations. They won't be relying on circulation and nothing else for judging printed media, and they won't of course, just be taking the simple point of view that so many people watch television, and there is only one channel so we have to put everything in one television.

Looking down the line, I believe that eventually all newspapers, daily and weekly, will be free; that you will have landing on your doorstep each morning free newspapers, and the value of those newspapers will be judged on their quality because they will all have saturation coverage of a certain market area.

It will be how well the news is presented and how much the public like it.

The Chairman: And depending on how much advertising they carry?

Mr. Farran: Yes, it will, because the most successful ones will carry the bulk of the advertising. If there is no circulation revenue at all, it would all depend on advertising.

The Chairman: Well, we have people waiting. Senator Hays, yes?

Senator Hays: The Albertan, Mr. Farran, say they have a circulation of 35,000. They tell me this. That would be throughout the province?

Mr. Farran: Yes, that would be throughout the province. They put 5,000 every morning into Edmonton and they put so many into Lethbridge, so many into Medicine Hat. Their Saturday edition has much greater circulation than the week days.

Mr. Jean Laurin, Representative of Hebdo A-1: Mr. Chairman, I represent Hebdo A-1 Incorporated, which in turn represents 20 ABC weekly papers in Quebec. I would like to express a view which has nothing to do with the intellectual aspects of the problems discussed today. My job is to act for these papers in the field of national advertising...

[Text]

The Chairman: Well, now, may I just say—May I interrupt you long enough to say that I said we would give the widest possible latitude indeed. The one regret I have is that even the panelists, all of whom have been excellent and none of whom—I am in no sense being critical—I think, been inclined in their presentation to address themselves to a general discussion of weekly newspapers, and I don't say that critically, but I do want to keep some semblance of order, and we are in this panel, theoretically at least, dealing with the content of papers. This evening at seven o'clock, we have a panel devoted in its entirety to revenue, and I would think that that could be the time to make comments on advertising. It's in the solicitation. I say that with great respect. Thank you so much.

Do you want to carry on then? You will wait until this evening? Thank you so much. I appreciate that.

Mr. Hoodspith: I am Hoodspith of the Lions Gate Times out in West Vancouver. I wanted to underline a statement made by Gérard Cyr from St-Jérôme, Quebec on the point of bringing up, training future journalists. This is a very serious problem of our industry, and now I am speaking not only for the weeklies, but also the dailies, and I would charge the Senators of this Committee when they are finished with this complete hearing, to consider bringing or establishing or striking a group made up of daily and weekly and probably magazine publishers, owners or managing directors to work with members of your Committee to bring up ways and means of establishing a federally-supported school of journalism across Canada.

Now, this is very broad, but this is important for the industry, and it's something that will have to come sooner or later because there are about three ways in which a person can become a journalist.

He can work with his old man in the plant. He can go out after school, if his or her father is not a journalist, and possibly get a part-time job in the summertime or else go to the university.—There is one more way—to go to the university, get your B.A. and try to work on the university newspaper. The last way is to go to an established journalism school. It's a private enterprise, but there are many who do.

The Chairman: Could we go and work for an underground newspaper?

Mr. Hoodspith: Yes, sir, no problem, yes, you can, yes. I don't think you even have to grow anything. Just go and be with them and know their thing.

The Chairman: But, I mean, that can be done?

Mr. Hoodspith: I beg your pardon?

The Chairman: That can be done?

Mr. Hoodspith: Yes, it can be done, but this is something that I feel that if the Committee in its deliberations later would give this some thought whereby some sort of a scheme could be arranged and you could draw from all the organizations across Canada in the mass media and in the printing media, etc., and come up with some.

The Chairman: You wouldn't include the electronic media in this

Mr. Hoodspith: Yes, in the journalistic field, yes, this is true.

Senator McElman: Mr. Withers, in your in-depth reporting of such matters, you said you refer to dope and pollution and similar matters. Do you do your own research or do you follow leads of the daily newspapers?

Mr. Withers: Any following done there, it is done by the daily newspapers following us. I worked for the Gleaner several years ago and they had a different policy there. At that time I was assigned to do an eighteen-part series on pollution of the St. John River. I went from Saint John to Edmundston and back again, dipping my pinkies in the water the whole length of the thing, taking pictures, interviewing people and telling the scene. This sort of policy died with Mr. Irving's take-over as far as the Gleaner is concerned.

Mr. Yves Gagnon, President, Les Hebdomadaires du Canada: Mr. Chairman, I should like first to ask you a question: do you intend to have a session on the press council, a day that will be devoted exclusively to the subject?

[Text]

The Chairman: Well, as I understand your question, you are asking: Are we going to devote an entire day to a study of the press council? Is that your question? I don't think that we are. In the guidelines we forwarded to people who are appearing before the Committee—and as you know, we have heard from a good many publications—one of the specific questions we have asked is about a press council. Consequently, we have really an enormous number of views on a press council now. We have many, many proponents and many antagonists. As the hearings complete themselves, we will hear a great deal more about a press council, I am sure.

It is not our intention specifically to have a day devoted to the problem of press council because almost every day we have heard something about it and discussed it. Does that answer your question?

Mr. Auclair: Well, it answers my question, but the thing is that I have seen by some of the remarks, that I think that many of us are not too well informed about what the press council should do and what it should be. There was a request by Mr. Bureau who is the secretary of the committee on the press council in Quebec, to present to you some information and facts on what is being done in Quebec.

The Chairman: Yes, Mr. Bureau, when he appeared before the Committee, promised that he would forward this material to us. Subject to confirming with the staff, to the best of my knowledge, we have not yet received the material, but it has been promised, and I am sure that it will be forthcoming. I think, in the comments that you made about press council—I think you were referring, with no lack of respect, I am sure, to the comments of our guests here today, because the Senators haven't really spoken about a press council. I can only say to you we have an immense amount of research material on press councils. It will be augmented by the material that Mr. Bureau is going to forward to us; so, I can give you that assurance.

Mr. Gagnon: In the discussions we have heard, I have noted some extremely interesting and perhaps very realistic concerns—for example, the statement that a newspaper is first and foremost a commercial undertaking. In fact, it may be true. I agree it should be said, because it is factually accurate. But, say, for example, Mr. Renaud D'aoust decided to allow advertising in his paper, telling himself that this would make it possible to lower the price and inform the people better; this illustrates that we are moving today towards a totally different concept that the newspaper is first of all a business, and the information function is becoming secondary.

At that point I wonder whether the role of a press council would not be just that: to see that the public is well informed and to act as a kind of buffer between strictly economic requirements and the public's right to be informed.

It has been stated often that the newspaper is primarily a reflection of the community. Having spent a number of years organizing clinics throughout Quebec, and having seen something of all the papers—this is as true of dailies as it is of weeklies—I note that the media are all too often becoming a mere reflection of their environment. For example, I worked for almost a year on the CBC's English network, and I observed one public affairs program that was trying too often to please and flatter people, rather than trying to act as a stimulus in the community.

Another point that was raised—it is often stated that newspaper editors and proprietors are respected members of their community who take part in political and social activities and other activities—I wonder. I think it was Leslie Roberts who said at one point that a journalist who decides to go into politics ceases automatically to be a journalist. I believe that a journalist who becomes president of the local Chamber of Commerce automatically ceases to be a journalist and becomes—unwittingly, perhaps—a propagandist for the Chamber of Commerce.

If we look at newspapers, we almost invariably see that they are a reflection of the Establishment in a community. If I were a 20 year-old student, I wonder what I would find to interest me in daily and weekly papers and magazines—what might fulfil my needs. We made an experiment of our own in 1963; we gave some students a page on which to express themselves with complete freedom, with absolutely no control short of the Criminal Code. We had a tremendous number of protests—not from the students—far from it, they all read it—but from the Establishment in the community. College trustees told us: “You should not allow students to stir up their fellow students; they do not have the necessary training to express themselves”.

Today, one of our greatest problems is the widening gap that is developing, first, between the younger and older generations, and second, between rural and urban communities—to say nothing of the growing gap between different ethnic groups. I believe that newspapers content to be primarily reflections of the communities they serve, and concerned mainly with projecting the image of the local Establishment, are creating a difficult future for themselves, because there is an entire generation of young people who, will totally reject it. I think it was Mr. Lindbergh who said that with the best newspapers in the world in Germany—because the Germans, after all, were among the world's greatest readers—this did not prevent the deaths of six million Jews.

The Chairman: Thank you, M. Gagnon. I am going to perhaps suggest we hear only one more speaker. It is 5.15. We will hear the one last speaker and then we will adjourn until this evening. The last speaker I really should introduce because she is an old friend of mine, but in compliance with the ground rules, I set myself, I am going to ask her to introduce herself if she really has to.

Mrs. Margaret Murray, Publisher, “Bridge River, Lillooet News”, Lillooet, British Columbia: Thank you, Keith. Well, I am Margaret Murray, and I am perhaps the oldest publisher in the room, maybe in Canada. I don't know. I came in from the United States in 1912, and I married a newspaper—that is, I hooked the editor and publisher after I went to work on this newspaper.

I have had the distinction of being at the first convention The Canadian Weekly Newspapers Association ever had in Vancouver when J. B. Livas was made the first president; so, I have been down along the line with CWNA all during its whole time. I got mad out here about eight years ago, and I jerked my little paltry sum that I paid in as my dues because I thought they weren't doing a job. They really died and they really haven't come back to life yet.

I couldn't really let this convention go by—not that I want anything. I am not having any troubles any more although I edit a weekly newspaper every week and I can safely say, barring fires and accidents, that I brought out a newspaper one way or the other, either on the mailing stick or at the typewriter keys, for the last 56 years in British Columbia—consecutive years, too.

George, my husband was a politician between times and he had eight years in the provincial legislature and eight years here in Ottawa as an M.P.; so, I know pretty well the gambit from one end to the other. I hear you talking about all these troubles that you are having and the difficulties the publishers face themselves with today and I can truthfully say that it is your own bloody fault that you are in trouble, I really believe and I have seen it; I am not going to take one word back of what I said. The press in the last 40 years has been selling the people down the river as fast as they could.

Now, I thank Senator Davey for writing me—and he wrote me a long time ago. Immediately his letter came, and I said to my staff—“Well, now, somebody in my family has got to go to that convention because it's damned high time these people were told where to get off at”, and I tried to get my son who publishes the Alaska Highway News to come. I tried to get my daughter, who has come out and joined me recently because now I am almost in my 83rd year, and that's about time I quit. But I can't quit, and I can't afford to die because there are so many things that still need to be done. I had thought too, like somebody else I heard the other day, that the Senate was pretty much of a lead weight having been down here and writing about them for so many years; but now I am beginning to believe that the Senate is now the best influence, because the Commons and the provincial legislatures would have run away and tried to commit murder on the people as well as letting them down these last 40 years if we didn't have the Senate here. They know they're there; they know they can veto any thing that they bring along, and God know they need to veto an awful lot at the present time, in my opinion.

Besides and we had to pay our own expenses. A guy doesn't lay out about $350 come down here, not to have a little bit out it himself. If you have, any of you, followed newspaper work along the years, you know that there are eras in the newspaper and in the publishing field, and they will go on with some fellow like Northcliffe or like Senator Capper from Kansas will come along and they will build up large dailies and they will just beat the cat's whiskers. That is exactly what the people want and they will go along for about 40 years and they will begin to come down in a crescendo, like Senator Capper—he thought he had the world by the tail, and I am from Kansas and I know the old boy, but you see he came down and he worries me now kicking up the daisies some place. He did what good he could while he was there but his time was over. It is high time that we took a new look at ourselves as publishers in Canada and that goes for dailies, for the weeklies and for the periodicals.

Now for the new deal that's coming in, the electronics, as they say—the TV and the radio which is coming in to us in a very unfair way. I was glad that somebody brought up that the people sit in their chairs and they listen to this grunt box and the radio—I am a radio fan myself. I think the television was probably all right for the sick and those who can't get out and that kind of thing, but my God, to sit down and listen evening after evening to that makebelieve on that television—I think there is something wrong with people's minds. And between the television and the laxness of the dailies, the dailies have let us down terribly in my opinion. There is no teeth in any of the editorials outside of probably the Toronto Globe and it's pretty mild—been pretty well sawed off—hardly left in Canada.

The Sun and the Province don't even belong to us any more in British Columbia. They are owned by outside capital and they push up the worst milk and water even when we have elections and when they know ruddy well in their hearts he was right. The dailies have let us down. The publishers have let the people of Canada down.

You talk about these journalistic schools that you have. Nobody who's got something to write about and something in his heart, has to go to any school to learn how to express himself. The best newspaper journalists that we ever had were those who never went beyond the eighth grade. We have got so many words today. There is so much talkie-talk today that, my friends, if you don't stop and pull up your socks and begin to find out what is wrong with the whole deal, you aren't going to have any newspapers.

Here we are almost heading into a dictatorship in Canada. Why are we heading into it? Because the newspapers fail to make any comparison in their paper at all.

Now, here we have in British Columbia Mr. Bennett, and because he was at loggerheads with Ottawa, Ottawa didn't know what they were talking about. They had joined Diefenbaker and Davie Fulton on this Columbia Treaty. Neither one of them knew any more about the water and the flood preservations than a hog knows about Sundays but they went to work and what did they do? Between them, between all the treaties that they made, and God knows I for one tried, myself, to get a decent ratification out of them and, goodness on earth, some of you here must remember the eye-opener on the Columbia in 1962 nine months after that Treaty was signed by Diefenbaker, and that when they re-ratified that and Pearson gets in, he doesn't know any more than Diefenbaker did. He goes to work and he puts the guy from the Yukon on it, that Gordon fellow—you know, the fellow who rang the bell—like treaty fellow, you hear, and what did they do? They have made us through that Columbia Treaty—put snails in British Columbia in perpetuity in the United States, because as long as the water runs, we have to provide flood control for the Columbia Valley in the United States. I am ashamed of my own country that there are such sharp traders and, as a matter of fact, the United States' engineers tried to hedge with Diefenbaker of him on the Saguenay Club in Quebec when they went down to that—not the last ratifying but the one before the Pearson government came in in minority, and there we are, accepting half what the deal was of 478 million. We accepted 270, Mr.—is such an eager beaver. He wanted to get on with the job and they are now gift wrapping and tearing up the Kootenay Valley. They already have the Columbia pock-marked like a turkey egg with dams all the way down wherever there could be any water held back, and as long as the water runs, we must provide flood protection for the Columbia Valley.

Now, that is what comes from papers not doing what they should be doing. You know, the people have gone hog-wild, the publishers. I have heard people here today talking about this business of these weekly papers as an industry. It's not an industry. It's an establishment. My goodness, whoever expected to make any money out of newspapers? If you had the opportunity—and now I have not only been in the newspaper business since I came up here and joined my husband, but I can remember when I was a little girl that the most looked up to persons, in Kansas were the editors of the little dinky weekly newspaper and if there was something wrong and they couldn't manage it as they were, they would go back into the files and they got something that happened 20 or 30 years ago, lay open the damages that was done by fool-hardy tricks that the people let themselves in for and they usually did what would stem the tide on that particular thing, and today I think the publishers of Canada need an awakening.

I think you have got to get down on your knees and ask God to give you light to look a little bit beyond money and the paycheques and that signature on the end of the cheque.

Today—I don't need to tell you. You all know about it. We were talking about ABC the other day, and the other man, thank God, he didn't join us. I wouldn't join it. They came to me and I said if I had been in the newspaper business 50 years in British Columbia and I am not honest enough to tell you whether I've got 300 subscribers or 1300 and if I was you, I won't even join up, and I didn't either, and I put it on my rate card.

I said if you can't take my word for it now, it's high time I quit.

Well, that's fine, we have all these fabulous advertising ABC built. Now, when I first came to Canada I made a trip down to Montreal for this Chinook caper that we were printing. There were only two advertising agencies in Canada, and one was old Jackie McConnell at Random and Ferguson and the other one was Johnson, McNim in Montreal, and I have seen this great and enormous and fabulous and opulent note of advertising; the super-sales idea that we have had.

Now, I don't blame them. If people are saps enough to pay out 25 per cent—I was right here in Ottawa or in Toronto and put up the fight and pretty near drew blood when they used to charge us 25 per cent commission. We finally got it down to 15 per cent commission, and so here we have this ABC. Nobody will take your word for it. Are you dishonest? Do you go to work and tell somebody that you have 30,000 subscribers and you only had about 3,000? You would know very well that somebody is going to find out, and I think that the time has come when the publishers of Canada have got to take a new reading of themselves, and they have got to go to work and do something else with regards to the mess they have got the printed word in today, the press, news media, the weeklies and the dailies made lots of money out of it.

Look at how many more have hopped on the bandwagon. Look how many have said here today about how people come in in just a few weeks or months where they will start another paper. You don't do what you can. You have it in your hands, and this C.W.—the weekly association, if it's got any spunk at all, it's going to go to work and put a little teeth into itself, and it's going to do something for the members that are in it and for the mass media in the weekly field.

Here we had Clive Stengel at Millions Lake and three times he won the top notch prize of the Canadian Weekly Association for the best paper in British Columbia and what did he do? He had a salesman come in about four years ago. A salesman went around and bleated a good story to every business man in town and told them how he was losing out to Stengel who was paying him starvation wages. He goes out, he signs up all of Clive's customers and they just literally put Clive out.

Old Betty Milner came along and with $4 million that he made out of the lumber business and he bought up a chain of newspapers. First he only had weekly newspapers in British Columbia. He bought the Prince Rupert paper, the Paris paper, the Prince George paper, Quesnel, Williams Lake papers and he bought Clive out. He was mighty glad to sell out because maybe the sheriff was right on his heels at the time; however, he sold out.

Well then, he went along and he hired another advertising manager. The other advertising man comes in by the name of Carl Silver. He had some friends in the east. He's a "Scandihoovian" or something or other. He had some money that he didn't have in his palm, but he started and he gets the same kind of a deal out of Clive, and he starts another paper. That's two papers within five years.

Well, I am happy to tell you this afternoon that Clive, by hook or crook—I don't know how he did it, but his paper is out, because we get our paper printed there from Lillooet and he's out there and Clive is back in the driver's seat after he's run two of them off and you can do anything, a weekly publisher with the heart of the people in his hand, and if he gives them a good paper and he's close to them and he tells them something about what they do and what they want to do and what would be the thing for them to do and they don't maybe agree with him at the time, but they will establish him again and I am thankful now—Where was the C.W.A. when they were the lousiest of the two papers? Where are they? Shouldn't they be a guide line for the rest of the people across Canada?

They do that all along, and I think our association in British Columbia made both of those fellows members of the W.C.B.A. whatever B.C. weekly newspaper association of British Columbia. It's too long for me to say, but anyway, now there is the C.W. thing here tonight wants this overall picture of this thing that it's talking about. In God's name, give it to them. It's worth a try. Everything is worth trying, and if it doesn't work out, we all have the same sense after we have tried it as we had before and there is no earthly reason why we couldn't go to work and by trial and error iron out the bad parts and go along with the good parts, and that's the only way that you are going to do and that's what every 40-year era of publishing business in Britain and in Canada and in the United States has done every 40 years.

It would be enough. It wouldn't probably be exactly within the four decades, but it would be 40 years and so I couldn't come down here; so I said to Keith here I would not get the money out of it unless I got it and gave you the benefit of these few remarks. I am going to keep them to few too. It's awful hard for me to shut up when I've got so much to say and I've got a few little things here.

Now, I am not blaming you for this. There is no one in this room that you might say was here 40—outside of me, or maybe David Browe over here, that was here and going when the newspaper was started. We started the Weekly Newspaper Association, you must remember, to get a just due out of the agencies that we say that was building up so fast, and you think of all these agencies.

Jimmy Lovick sold his agency here about three years ago in British Columbia for one cool million dollars, and I remember when he was a copy boy with McKims, one of the first agencies to start up—well, the first agency to move out; so, you see how much money there has been in the advertising business; so you know very well that somebody had to print newspapers to carry that advertising that Lovick and McKim and all the rest of them had to have to pay the 25 per cent commission, and you must remember that the newspaper business has got to be more than a racket and more than delighted in hearing the jingling of the cash register than they are to jerk the tears out of the eyes of the people who want to see a fair and a square deal for somebody in a little dinky town or even in a place like Vancouver.

I want to refer back a minute to this Columbia because you people down here in Eastern Canada—you are in with us on all these fool things that we do out there even like building the Alaska Highway. You have got to keep it up. They built that Alaska Highway—the Americans built it but you people of Canada are paying your share to about 250 million a year to keep that Alaska Highway open so that the Americans will have a nice free and a saucy road to roll over from Kansas and Wyoming into Alaska, and it's the same with the Columbia Treaty.

You helped to pay for all this cost indirectly that we do in building dams than we do in serving all this; so, don't underestimate we people in British Columbia are the only ones that's going to be in perpetuity favouring to them. We might have to look after the flood control, but you are going to have to look after the cost if we can't do it because we are all partners in crime, my friends, and we can't single one out here and leave one in there and so if there ever was a time—there never was a time in my life, although I remember well when Crighton brought out his first weekly and thought it was going to raise hell and put a stamp on it—right there in the United States, in those central states, and you see he's gone now and I won't be here when probably there is a new deal coming in for you, but there has got to be a new deal, my friend, and my friend, you publishers here will wield that typewriter and you get out that editorial column and you write the stuff about them in the papers and try to hold them or try to sell them and try to get enough money to go on.

It can't be all money in newspapers. You must have some reward out of what the Lord God created you for. Your job is to help sustain your fellow man. For any publisher of either a weekly or daily that is a Godly mission, and when you begin to stop and realize what is within your hands, you will know—I hope you won't have to wait until after you are 82 like I am, to see it.

Of course, I have seen it quite a long time. When we came back and brought the little paper back after my son had sold it, George and I ten years ago—I told the Lord one-time—I said, “I will never chisel another advert as long as I live”. I said, “If you’ve got something to sell and you want to sell it, bring it in” and you are not to coach here in the same way, will you; and you know in your own heart that there is an awful lot of our business of chiselling, just downright chiselling, and we don’t get enough for our papers. In the olden days, they got a good price for our papers. We should get a good price. I’m going to raise the price of my paper $10 a year. Now, it’s worth $10 a year or it’s worth nothing and it isn’t very big so they can’t even start crying about it and when I raise my next price, it’s going to be $10 a year, and I am going to tell you now too before I close—I just must tell you this.

We have a UBC paper out there, and this UBC paper—I applied to the alma mater society or whatever it is—I never had much education myself, but you know who I mean—their boss, and I said that that paper should be suspended, and I finally wrote an editorial in my paper and sent it to all the professors and everybody, and I said, “Wouldn’t you tell those editors of your UBC that the people of Canada—maybe the kids pay the printing bill. I don’t know, but we stand behind them. It’s our paper. It’s our university. We have got to have faces red over it. I said, “Tell them that they got a navel. If they only just write above the navel instead of below the navel”, and this was my reason here—Cecil, he knows—and I said, “This stuff here is not good enough”, and they have a better education.

I might write something like that because I didn’t go to school. I’m a third greater and I aint got the grammar to do it right with, but they are all in the university. They don’t have to write like that. And so they called me an old bag, and we had a battle back and forth, in the Vancouver Sun and suddenly they challenged me to come down, and so I took me down there and of course they said, “Well, we can’t talk to you. You’re just against sex.” I said, “Who told you I was?” I said, “I am not against sex. It’s the nicest thing in the world”, I said, but I said, “If you start it too soon, you’ll wear it out too soon”.

Well, as a result, I didn’t get the paper suspended but I did get another UBC paper started at the UBC in British Columbia, and the other one’s gradually dying a slow death; so that there is nothing in the world, my friends, that you can’t get if you have a little patience and you got the right heart to do it with, and you publishers are never, never—now you have all made your money—you don’t know what it is to—Does anybody in this room know what type lice is? I wonder if there is one single person in this room who knows what it is. Well, for the person who’s gone through the type lice era and gone through the starvation period and where you would pay your subscription one year with fried down sausage and make sure you pay it maybe with a ham or something like that, because we just couldn’t afford to be without that little dinky four pages of familiar news printed by hand and the type all set by hand, and I was so keen about that, so I learned about type lice. Do any of you here know what type lice is?

Well, in the old days, you know, the hand set type had—you bring in the sausage and put it down on the stool and eat so that you won’t leave without taking it home after a while, and so he would say, “Maggie, would you like to see some type lice?” I remember this is how he got me the first time; so he takes his stick, he sets out and he picks it all out like this, and before he started to start it, he took a drink of water, not a very big one; he slurp all over the type like this. I wasn’t paying attention about the drink you see, and so he gets it all on the stuff and then he says, “Well, it’s closed”, and he screams this little jigger up on the end and w-i-n-g, she goes up like this and I looked just like those turkey hens—turkey eggs, and I went away from him; so they always call that type lice, and that was how they indoctrinated everybody in the hand set type.

Of course, that’s all beyond us now. Here I have three linotypes and a little dinky office up there and a letter-press shop, and I won’t let them take away one because of the way that we are growing. I am sure that our confusion and the terrible state of our economy and our thinking today—I think this rebellion of half these youths—I think half this phobia of sex is due to the fact that that press, the daily press and the periodical and the press that counts, the weekly press, hasn’t taken a strong enough stand, and not so strong we must make comparisons. Hindsight, of course, is always better than foresight, but hindsight is just as necessary today for you to consider and for you to apply as it is for you to look for foresight, because there won’t be any foresight, there won’t be anything in front if we don’t know what happened in the past and be guided by the mistakes that we made and so I would tell you today to change your way of thinking towards your job and appreciate it and know that you are one of God's gifted people. You are one of God's best supporters.

You have a good editorial page and you have got news columns and all these little troubles that you have talked about here today and that you can't print police court news and that somebody will shove you out like because you're not subscribing to all those little just jiggles in the form and another 40 years is coming and I hope that the CWNA will go to work and take the bit in its teeth and be a guideline to you.

I wish them every success. I worked with them in the beginning. I was one of the beginners of the BC Weekly Newspapers Association. I was always a joiner with anything until I found out that it didn't have anything to offer. I was so mad that I quit this Canadian and I went down to Banff and I told him whether Cecil was there or his brother, whatever his name is—Cecil is the other brother, and they were there and I went in and they were going on a long harangue about how they couldn't get any help in Banff, and this was about '56, and here they were all a big low cod feed, you know, and that night Harry was—I think in the morning Harry had loaded them up on moose milk before they went into the convention and then I think they went on after Banff or something and had a big smiley at night, and I came in the next day, and here they were hanging around and haranguing about help.

I said, "If you fellows would just forego one year of this convention and these doods and this extra liquor which you get willed in and go and build a little linotype hop where people could learn, boys and girls could learn, and learn it yourselves, and send your own sons and your neighbours' sons there and learn to run the linotype, but thank God the offset came along and now of course there's nothing to it. They do it all with mirrors and improvising; so it's a great pleasure to come and I hope I haven't bored you but I just felt like to let my $350 out of it, come all the way from Vancouver. I had to get a little shot out of it in words here as well.

The Chairman: Thank you, and we only hope that you will never die, and we know you will never quit.

I would say to the Senators and the panelists, I guess, and everyone else, that I am going to adjourn. I would like to start sharp at seven o'clock. Please be here on time again.

Thank you, ladies and gentlemen: the meeting is adjourned.

The Committee adjourned at 5.40 p.m.

The Committee resumed at 7.00 p.m.

The Chairman: This evening we will again turn our attention to the weekly press, and I am going to call on the panelists in the order in which they are listed. I will start first of all with Mr. McKenna and then on to the other members of the panel. I will tap gently with the gavel at eight minutes once, and at nine minutes, twice, and at ten minutes I am afraid we will have to cease and desist.

Mr. McKenna?

Mr. J. L. McKenna, Publisher, Kings County Record, New Brunswick: Mr. Chairman, Honourable Senators, ladies and gentlemen, first of all I want to point out that we have something in common. I noticed my name has been misspelled here and I also notice the name of our paper is misspelled so we are off to a good common start.

Revenue is what makes any business operation tick. Without it, business goes tock. Publishing a weekly newspaper is a business operation, and publishers are very much interested in revenue so they may continue publishing. Revenue comes from sale of advertising, in most instances from the sale of newspaper by subscription or by the single copy, and frequently through commercial printing in the plant; occasionally through a stationery retail outlet.

It has been suggested by some that publishers of weekly newspapers should be more concerned with service than with revenue. Money seems to be a nasty word these days.

Sufficient revenue makes it possible for a publisher to be independent in the handling of the news and advertising content. Without revenue to balance expenditures, and provide a profit of some kind, a publisher could become the victim of the whims of a major advertiser.

Your Committee has suggested certain points which might be discussed. I trust you have read the brief I submitted.

Following the guidelines set out, I shall attempt to provide answers.

Question: "What benefits can a weekly offer the local and national advertiser?"

No. 1 must be repeat projection—at no extra cost to the advertiser. The weekly newspaper frequently remains in the house until the next issue arrives.

Thus any member of the household has a chance to read it; perhaps not at one sitting, but before the paper is used to wrap the garbage, light a fire, or for the multitude of benefits which a newspaper is used for which cannot be claimed by any other print media.

Do people pick up the weekly a second or third time? Many do. Spots on radio and television are separate investments by the advertiser.

Question: "Who benefits most from weekly advertising?"

I'm not Solomon, and I doubt if Solomon could answer that question. I feel this question should be something like—just plain who benefits?

The advertiser benefits. He generates volume, the base from which most business operations continue. He tells people what he has, in broad terms. He tells them prices.

The customer benefits. He doesn't have to go from store to store—in the case of retail advertising—to compare prices of at least some items. He saves shoe leather, or he saves wear and tear on his motor vehicle, and doesn't have to increase the rate of air pollution by driving to half a dozen stores.

Question: "Are national advertisers particularly reluctant to advertise in weeklies?"

I would say not. National advertisers rely to a great extent on the recommendations of their advertising agencies. It is my opinion that many persons in agencies today, responsible for buying space or time, have not the slightest conception of weekly newspapers. In fact, I would wager some do not read any weekly newspaper regularly.

This is the age of electronics. Many space buyers have entered the field during this age. Probably most read magazines, or metropolitan newspapers. How many read the smaller dailies? The weeklies?

Many years ago, agencies complained weeklies did not provide tear sheets, regular billing, gave poor imprint to national ads. This has been changed. Most publishers are aware good service to advertisers is a major factor in their operations.

Today the shoe is on the other foot. Some advertising agencies have come to expect miracles from publishers. For instance, this year I have had (a) a telegram on Wednesday night from an agency wanting a change of date for an ad so it would appear in that Thursday's edition, and (b) the following week a revised insertion order, which arrived on Thursday morning, for insertion on that day. Our rate card definitely states Monday noon is closing time.

Postal pick-up times demand we complete some 3,000 copies of our paper, for delivery to the post office on Wednesday night. How can we make changes after these papers are printed?

The Chairman: Excuse me, Mr. McKenna. It has been suggested, Mr. McKenna, that if you sat down, our translators might be able to hear you a little better. Thank you. Please carry on.

Mr. McKenna: It is just a case of lack of knowledge of production methods of print media, whether they be weekly, daily or magazine.

Question: "What can be done to persuade more national advertisers to use weeklies?"

First of all, the weeklies need to put forward a strong sales effort. Secondly, agencies should conduct educational courses to assure their personnel are familiar with all types of media, including weekly newspapers. Only in this way can agencies offer full value to their clients.

While attending the annual meeting of the Audit Bureau of Circulations in 1968, I heard a large advertiser say the trend definitely is back to print media. I have heard this several times since, from other sources.

Various Weekly Newspaper Association are taking another look at sales organizations, either as national or regional operations. This is essential. We must act now, or be prepared to pick up only the crumbs.

Question: Explain the "Economic advantages of controlled as compared to paid circulation?"

Some 20 per cent of our newspaper's revenue comes from sales—by subscription of single copy. The balance is received from advertising. During 1968, national advertising amounted to about 5.6 per cent of our newspaper revenue; classified ads to about 12 per cent. We consider all advertising which does not come through an agency to be local. As a member of the Audit Bureau of Circulation I naturally believe ABC to be of value. ABC give us the privilege of buying copies of the audited statements of other ABC newspapers and this is a strong selling point when we can show advertisers and potential advertisers that we outsell, in Kings County, any other newspaper. For instance, we sell in Kings County some 700 papers more than any daily printed in New Brunswick. Kings County includes Saint John suburban areas; and when it is considered our paper sells for 15 cents, and the dailies 10, we have a convincing argument to present. Some 35 per cent of our sales are by single copy.

I do not have much faith in sworn statements, nor do I believe advertisers and agencies have. It is because of this distrust of sworn figures that the Audit Bureau of Circulations was founded more than 50 years ago, to set up an organization involving advertisers, agencies and printed publications.

I am not familiar with controlled circulation and its operations. I realize that, particularly in metropolitan areas, some advertisers demand blanket coverage, which cannot be given through paid circulation alone. In our instance, we provide, through paid sales, almost blanket coverage of the Sussex area, and extensive coverage of surrounding areas. Were we to change to controlled circulation, we would increase deliveries only slightly, but would have to increase our advertising rates considerably to make up for loss of sales revenue, which certainly would not be taken up through increased advertising sales.

Question: "Is there a danger commercial printing may interfere with the quality of the newspaper?"

It is my opinion the reverse could be the case. The newspaper is able to install equipment, type faces and other necessities for dual use, while it might not be economically feasible to do so for one phase.

The average weekly newspaper today receives more revenue from the paper than from commercial printing. The newspaper business is operated by a professional newsman.

At the same time, most have some knowledge of commercial printing. They realize a good printing job acts as an ambassador for the client, just as smartly laid out ads work for the advertiser. Many plants cannot employ fulltime printing salesmen, so they depend on quality and service to keep customers coming back.

The cost of printing a weekly depends entirely upon equipment and staff.

Question: "Does this give us an advantage over other printing firms?"

I would say no. Perhaps rates of pay are somewhat lower than in the larger centres, but this is offset by the fact we must maintain our staff at a level to handle peak work periods, with more down time than large plants, where workers are available for the peaks only.

Our stationery shop is operated in another part of town, with its own staff. It provides a service not available previously in Sussex, and also handles subscriptions, ads, printing orders, payment of accounts, for our main office.

Earlier I said I would return to pressures from advertisers. We have encountered this, and we have had advertisers withdraw because of our policies. However, because we have been reasonably successful financially, we were able to survive until the time the customer discovered he was losing business by not advertising, and he came back.

But, should we be compelled to take in the government as equal partner, as recommended in the White Paper on Taxation, the economic stability of many weekly newspapers would be destroyed, and for financial reasons we might not be able to resist such pressures by advertisers.

Should this arise, it could wipe out the many contributions that I believe the weekly newspaper is making toward the building of a better Canada.

The Chairman: Thank you very much, Mr. McKenna. The next panelist is Mr. Douglas Bassett, vice-president and general manager, Inland Publishing Company Limited, Ontario. Mr. Bassett?

Mr. Douglas G. Bassett, Vice-President and General Manager, Inland Publishing Company Limited, Mississauga, Ontario: "Mr. Chairman"...

Senator McElman: Just for the matter of the record, Mr. McKenna, what does the word "advertiser" mean?

The Chairman: Where is that, Senator?

Senator McElman: On page 1 of Mr. McKenna's brief.

Mr. McKenna: This is one of the problems, Senator, which arises when I proof-read things myself. This is always a very bad thing to do.

The Chairman: Mr. Bassett?

Mr. Bassett: Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen of the Committee, I am very pleased to have this opportunity to appear before you to discuss the general problems of obtaining revenue for a suburban weekly newspaper.

All weekly newspapers, in our opinion, can increase their readership, circulation, and revenue by stressing complete local coverage; by leading public opinions and actively participating in community affairs; by exercising better business administration; by better co-operation between newspaper associations. We shall deal with each point in this brief.

First, I would like to inform this Committee that Inland Publishing Co. Limited owns the following newspapers: the Ajax News Advertiser, Brampton/Bramalea Guardian, Burlington Post, Mississauga News, Newmarket Era, Oakville Beaver and the Stouffville Tribune.

I might say that each publisher, and his staff of the aforementioned newspapers live in the community that their newspaper serves. The content of our newspapers is entirely local and deals with the problems and activities in their respective communities independent of each other.

It is our opinion that a suburban weekly newspaper should deal only with the news events of its community. This attracts the reader to sit down and read the weekly newspaper thoroughly and identify with the news content.

The high quantity of local and editorial content has enabled us to increase the advertising revenue and because of the personal identification between the reader and the suburban weekly, both national and local advertisers know that their ads are being seen and read.

The local editorial reporting of the weekly suburban newspaper should be, and in fact, in most cases is, complete, concise and unbiased.

A suburban area which does not have a local weekly newspaper has a distinct disadvantage not only to the people who live in the community, but also to those merchants who do not have a vehicle to advertise their products. It is almost impossible for them to advertise in the large urban dailies which partially infiltrate their market. The urban dailies do not deliver a concentrated circulation and their advertising rates are much too steep.

National advertisers are reluctant to advertise in weekly suburban newspapers. It is our opinion that there is a stigma in the eyes of advertising agency space buyers that the word "weekly" connotes the small time, non-professional, family-operated business. This, of course, is not true.

It is our contention that many national advertisers would find it advantageous to concentrate on advertising with weekly suburban newspapers. We say this because it is a proven fact that there are proportionately more home owners in the suburbs than in the city. Manufacturers of products such as carpeting, paint and lumber, household appliances and gardening supplies are missing a sure market by not advertising in suburban weekly newspapers. Perhaps the advertising agencies of these kinds of manufacturers should take a closer look at this lucrative market to further benefit their clients.

In order to change this opinion of the weeklies, it would be necessary to have an advertising program under the auspices of the CWNA in periodicals designed for agencies and advertisers, as well as continuous contact between the papers and the advertising agencies. This is why Inland has a national advertising representative located in Toronto to sell on our behalf. In 1968, Inland carried 398,374 lines of national advertising, which was 2.6 per cent of the total lineage and in 1969 we carried 438,467 lines, which was 2.7 per cent of the total lineage compared to urban dailies that carry over 12 per cent of national advertising lineage compared with their total lineage.

One might expect to get support from the Canadian Weekly Newspapers Association and also, in our case, the Ontario Weekly Newspapers Association in selling national advertising. In our case, this is not so. In 1969 Inland received one 200-line ad for all our newspapers from CWNA and the OOWNA sold two ads for 151 lines for the Newmarket Era and seven ads for 1,346 lines for the Stouffville Tribune. These associations have not in any way helped our newspapers. There was no communication in 1969 between Inland and either association. We pay an annual membership fee to support these associations but they do nothing to help us secure advertising revenue. We feel that one of the main functions of these associations should be to help secure advertising lineage for weekly newspapers in Canada.

The weekly newspaper reports local news whether it be the death of the oldest resident in the town or the local midget hockey team winning a hockey game. Readers can believe in their weekly suburban newspapers more than the urban daily. That is why they fe that this is their newspaper. Advertisers should be made aware of this.

There are both advantages and disadvantages of having paid circulation. With paid circulation, there is a net profit from the money paid by subscribers, but on the other hand in suburban areas it is easier to sell advertising with a larger controlled circulation. Our own experience is that, on a national level, ABC circulation is preferred, but on a local level, advertisers do not differentiate between ABC paid circulation and sworn statements. It would seem to us that the only advantages of ABC paid circulation are incoming revenue from the paid circulation and the greater advertising agency recognition, which does not guarantee any national advertising.

Suburban newspapers live or die by the acceptance of local advertisers and as a result, ABC figures cannot be used as a selling force.

In order to give a fair comparison to this Committee on the difficulties of obtaining revenue, and thus profit, it is necessary to give some background about our suburban weekly newspapers.

Before the newspapers were bought by Inland, the experience had been that the financial control was of a very low content and quality. This was due to the fact that, among other reasons, the newspapers could not afford to employ qualified accountants.

At the acquisition of our papers, we found that the staffs were doing all things in all jobs—bookkeepers were overworked—the papers were experiencing high bad debt write offs—and they were unable to prepare budgets and also unable to enjoy budgetary control.

Inland Publishing Co. Limited is now able to provide our newspaper publishers with complete financial information.

Inland Publishing and the publishers stress the importance of the following financial data—average line rate in the paper, advertising content, and the actual expense of operating the paper compared to the budget.

In previous years, the greater proportion of weekly newspaper owners were primarily printers instead of newspapermen. Any newspaper revenue was used to supplement job printing revenue. As a result, the paper was secondary; the quality and reproduction were poor.

Today, the situation is reversed. Many weekes are going out of the job printing business, such as our Newmarket Era and Ajax News Advertiser.

In our opinion, weekly newspapers cannot compete with job printing firms. Newspaper publishers must, and should concentrate on putting before their readers, the best product possible. We feel this is a specialized job. They have a responsibility to do this, and this can be achieved by devoting all their efforts to the newspaper.

The Chairman: Thank you very much, Mr. Bassett.

The third panelist this evening is Mr. Clifford Hacker, who is President of Western Regional Newspapers Limited. Mr. Hacker.

Mr. Clifford Hacker, President, Western Regional Newspapers Limited: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

Western Regional Newspapers Ltd., is a group of 23 individual, non-metropolitan community newspapers in British Columbia. The chief purpose of this group is to promote the sale of national and other types of advertising for our member papers.

I suggest that right here it should be established that the term "community newspaper" is more descriptive of the type of newspaper being discussed. Whether such a newspaper is printed once, twice, three times or daily each week is beside the point—few advertisers (except some retail ones) run more than once weekly anyway. I propose to answer the questions and topics raised in your outline. Question: "What benefit can a weekly newspaper offer the local and national advertiser?"

It can offer these advertisers the only effective print coverage of the market the newspaper serves. Other print media mainly metropolitan dailies) often claim to cover our markets, but they do not provide the same local news and local editorial leadership in discussing local problems of our communities and they do not provide a satisfactory advertising medium. I base that statement on the fact that large food and other retail chain stores who have retail outlets in our towns find it necessary to run exactly the same advertisements and in some zones the same prices in our member papers that they run in Pacific Press.

One of our Vancouver Island members points out that he has five dailies coming into his community, but that his circulation is considerably in excess of the total of these combined and to quote the publisher, "This suggests to me that we survive because we are needed."

We must be offering them benefits because in one single issue last December another of our member papers ran a total of 473 column inches of national advertising, 261 column inches of classified and 2,947 column inches of retail display. That same issue contained 28 local news pictures and 1,959 local names in its news columns. This newspaper is not the largest one in our group.

The community newspaper can also offer a closer link between the national advertiser and the local dealer who sells his product.

A progressive community newspaper can help a local advertiser to "invest" his advertising dollars rather than "spend" them. This, of course, works for the benefit of both the local merchant and the newspaper because when this service is provided for all local merchants it certainly helps to further the development of the town as a retail trading centre.

Question: "Who benefits most from weekly newspaper advertising?"

I would suggest the local advertiser is the principal beneficiary because it is the only economically feasible media available to him. Because rates are generally related to circulation, his alternative would be to buy space in a media which covers an area much larger than his market area.

In other words he would have to pay for circulation which would be of little or no value to him.

There have been cases in B.C. where local merchants have purchased and taken over the operation of the local paper when it was faltering financially because they felt a local advertising medium was essential to their own business welfare. There have also been cases where local merchants have given financial backing to start a second local paper when they felt the existing one was not doing a good job in the community.

Everyone benefits! Both the advertiser and the buying public benefit as does the newspaper publisher and his staff.

I would say that somewhere between 40 cents and 50 cents of every community newspaper's revenue dollar goes into the newspaper's staff payroll. This money remains in the community and to a large extent finds its way back to the local retailer.

Question: "Are national advertisers particularly reluctant to advertise in weekly newspapers?"

I don't think they are reluctant, but they sometimes are not aware of the benefits awaiting them. It is a fact also that advertising in weekly newspapers is costly on a cost-per-thousand copies basis...but the returns can well warrant the cost. Agencies also, sometimes overlook the value of weeklies and community markets, but this is a matter of us selling them and their clients. We, in Western Regional Newspapers, feel we have been fairly successful in doing so, but there is still much to be done.

Question: "What can be done to persuade them to use this medium?"

Do a good selling job of the product we have to sell. Provide them with accurate statistical information to prove our point. Let us take liquor sales as an example.

From figures compiled from the British Columbia Liquor Control Board's 48th Annual Report covering the period April 1, 1968, to March 31, 1969—

This report shows us that their sales in Western Regional Newspapers markets represented 22.7 per cent of all liquor sales in British Columbia. This fact gives our sales representative a pretty strong selling point to take to potential liquor advertisers in an effort to get at least an equivalent percentage of their advertising dollar!

Those who advertise products and services nationally, and their agencies, sometimes forget that the WRN market population alone—let alone that of other non-metro newspapers—is a large market, and a fast-growing one. One method of "persuading" them to use our medium is to suggest they take a hard look at their regional sales figures—not just those of the metropolitan markets.

In British Columbia, due to the decentralization of industry, population growth and thus purchasing power is increasing at about the same rate per body in non-metropolitan regions as it is in metropolitan areas. The trading area population of 23 WRN newspapers totals 534,298—over a half-million—our combined circulations are just a few short of 101,000. We continually submit these, and other pertinent facts to national advertiser and their agencies.

Question: "Explain the economic disadvantages and/or advantages of controlled circulation over paid circulation."

What do you mean by controlled circulation? We recognize two kinds of circulation—paid and free.

Insofar as national advertising is concerned paid circulation has, and should have, the advantage. It provides the national advertiser and his agency with a base upon which to evaluate the newspaper and its degree of service to its community market. This is very important.

Question: "From your own experience in trying to sell advertising, which is preferable—sworn statements or ABC circulation data?"

ABC is preferable, again as regards national advertising, for the reasons given previously, to provide advertisers and their agencies with audited circulation figures. But there are some markets, where the newspaper is the only medium in town—where markets are more or less "captive"—where distance or isolation makes ABC auditing difficult or too costly.

In these markets, sworn statements should be considered acceptable. Difficulties arise mostly where a bona fide newspaper has spent considerable time, effort and money in establishing itself as a true newspaper—building up paid circulation and providing good editorial service to the community and effective advertising to retail and national advertisers—then, in to town comes a promoter who starts up an "Advertiser"—a free-distribution paper (or one which purports to be paid, but doesn't provide authentic circulation records.) He cuts advertising rates, offers editorial "puffs" in return for advertising, provides little other news material and generally tries to skim the advertising cream off the market.

The Chairman: I am sorry; I am going to have to skim the cream of your market, Mr. Hacker. I am afraid that is all the time we have.

Mr. Hacker: Fine.

The Chairman: I am sorry, sir. The final panelist on this panel is monsieur Roger Delorme, L'Observateur, a bilingual paper in Laval, Quebec. Monsieur Delorme...

Monsieur Roger Delorme, L'Observateur: Mr. Chairman, Honourable Senators, ladies and gentlemen. Of course, Quebec has to be different. I will try, within this very short period of time, to make sense of whatever I have here. I will do it in French.

[Translation]

Mr. Roger Delorme, Publisher of L'Observateur, Laval, P.Q.: Let us begin by saying that one of the characteristics of a weekly is to be a general information paper. On a reduced scale and adapted to the needs of its readers, it offers an entire array of information, excepting, perhaps, important national and international news. However, from the point of view of advertising, a great distinction must be made between regional weeklies and local weeklies, i.e. between newspapers which are published in or close to large population centres, and those which are published in small rural centres. The source and volume of advertising varies considerably in each case. We may even go so far as to say on the subject, that according to advertising agencies, large population centres do not yield a sufficient return on the advertising dollar, which would explain the volume of national advertising in these weeklies. It would, therefore, seem logical to conclude that the further removed a weekly is from population centres served by dailies, the more profitable it is in the eyes of the advertising agencies. Having made this observation. I would add that weeklies, for all intents and purposes, live on local advertising, since they are generally much more accessible to enterprises in the area, and thus their markets are selective, and the cost per agate line, considering the volume of circulation, remains less than that of the larger media.

One must admit that the weekly newspaper lives in tune with its surroundings and is therefore able to perceive changes much better than others. When the regional economy experiences a slump, the weekly suffers too. By virtue of this, it is extremely vulnerable to market fluctuations, credit restrictions, seasonal changes, and the climate. When business takes a turn for the worse, as is the case at present, the weekly is the first to feel the effects. Advertising is, by tradition, always the first to be affected by budgetary cut-backs, and you may rest assured that under current economic conditions, most of the Quebec weeklies are presently fighting for their very existence. One has only to speak with a few of the bank managers who do business with the weeklies to confirm this.

The deficiency to be made up, along with the exorbitant rise in postal rates, have dealt many of us a mortal blow, and yet, despite this economic unrest, a large number of new weekly publications make their fleeting appearance on the market every year. In spite of their good intentions, the majority of these new arrivals do not last more than an instant. But, during that brief instant, they manage to split the market further—a market which is scarcely big enough to support the already well-established newspapers. I hardly need add that most of these publishing firms are formed without sufficient funds and with experience which only the would-be possessor could consider as valid.

Now, let us go on to the positive aspects of the weekly newspaper world. By its very nature, the weekly is always close to its community; it encircles it so to speak. It is the weekly that really covers municipal council meetings, serves as the watchdog of the school board, associates with the business men of the community, and devotes pages to community projects and club, recreational and sports activities. In point of fact, the weekly is the best reflection of community life. In it, the reader sees himself as he lives, works and plays. Generally, since it is not a very big publication, the weekly offers the advertiser a considerable advantage, in that his advertisement is not lost in a sea of advertisements which seem more or less all the same. Thus, for introducing new products and putting them on the market, the weekly would appear to be the ideal advertising medium, being the best means available for research and opinions.

This is why we find it difficult to understand the failure on the part of the big agencies to recognize this potential when it comes to introducing a new product and testing it out. Instead, they seem to be totally ignoring the weekly. Moreover, some consumer products are tailored for the weekly, such as mechanical saws and fertilizer which are sold retail. For these and for many other products, the small town and suburban weeklies would be far more profitable. The manufacturer who invests large sums of money in the big dailies will sell about as many power saws in Toronto or Montreal as fertilizer will make grass grow on pavement.

On the same subject, the suburban weeklies will bring a better return on a whole series of products. Now, it would appear that the advertising agencies consider the cost of advertising in the weeklies too high. This attitude is neither reasonable nor justified. The reasoning is too narrow as the advertising dollar return is not a function of circulation alone, but also the degree of penetration of the paper, on which the decision to accept the product depends.

It seems to us that both the media directors and their customers are poorly informed as to the influence which the weeklies exercise within their respective communities. And as for their degree of penetration, we may say without the slightest reservation, that the weekly lives longer in the home. On this subject I would refer you to the survey conducted last year by the biggest French-language daily in America, "La Presse". Among its findings, a weekly in the outskirts of Montreal was achieving 85 per cent readership in comparison with La Presse's own 50 per cent for the same area. The weekly is generally read more thoroughly by the family members, precisely because it ties in so closely with their daily lives. Events which seem harmless thousands of miles away, by contrast assume a great importance to those who are living them. Thus, it is in this manner, I maintain, that the weekly, by its nature, possesses a deeply human identity. It is so involved in the community that it cannot remain anonymous.

All the same, we understand the problems which the analysis and selection of weeklies present to advertising agencies. The weeklies don't have research teams; they are not in a position to compile statistics on their respective markets. In short, they find it difficult to sell advertising space because their services cost so much. The only positive aspects on which the agencies may base their decision, are the circulation figures. These are generally held suspect if given under oath, and acceptable if received from a reputable organization.

While on this subject, allow me to point out what it costs a weekly to belong to the various associations like the ABC. We believe that membership in the "French-language Weeklies Association" or "the Canadian Weeklies Association" is really a sign of quality. Both of these associations have strict entrance requirements and the annual contributions are based partly on a fixed sum, partly on the volume of circulation. In our opinion, it would be to the advantage of advertising agencies to obtain from them all the information they need on the weeklies which belong to these associations.

To turn to another subject—since the change in postal rates and the modification of the Act, the Post Office Department has checked our volume, our circulation and you have to prove, using actual receipts, that 50 per cent of your circulation is paid. And yet, this guarantee is a small price indeed, compared with what you pay to ABC.

A last remark before closing: there is another problem causing enormous difficulties for weeklies and that problem is monopolies, cartels. The question of an information monopoly has been discussed today, but at the same time, when a client makes a bid, the owner of a weekly newspaper offers to sell 15 weeklies in a region with a preferential advertising rate, you come up with ridiculously low rates which cannot possibly be met. Well, that's the law of free competition. But I think this is a serious problem which will shortly force a large number of well composed, serious weeklies—which are far from being mere circulars and which fulfill a need within their sphere of influence—out of business, simply because they do not have the means to compete with these big publications, with the equipment to produce a page of advertising, and produce it simultaneously for 15 papers.

On this note, I will close. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

[English]

The Chairman: Thank you very much, Mr. Delorme. I would like very much to thank the panelists. It is now 8:05 and it is my intention to start the panel on disbursements at eight-thirty. This means we now have 25 minutes to discuss this question of revenue.

Are there people who wish to go to the microphones and discuss these problems?

If there are not, of course, we will proceed right on to the next panel.

Senator McElman: Mr. Bassett, in the last paragraph of his brief, says:

"In our opinion, weekly newspapers cannot compete with job printing firms. Newspaper publishers must, and should concentrate on putting before their readers, the best product possible."

Does this mean they should get out of the job printing business?

Mr. Bassett: In our opinion, yes, going from my own personal experience, Senator, in the newspapers that we have—the newspapers that we have that are in the job printing business. There is only one now that does job printing, and it is in Stouffville. The people who work at this newspaper are concerned to try to make a profit in the job printing as well as to put out a product—a newspaper each week. I think that their first responsibility is to the readers and to the citizens of the community in putting out the best newspaper and they should devote all their talents to putting out that newspaper.

Senator McElman: You believe that they are incompatible?

Mr. Bassett: Well, not incompatible but basically today—as I said earlier, in the first paragraph of the last page—in previous years weekly newspaper owners were primarily printers as compared to newspapermen. Today, it is reversed. We have heard today people asking for students from journalism schools to come and attend their meetings, trying to get them into the newspaper business. They are not interested in selling job printing; they are interested in putting out a newspaper.

This is what we feel in our company is the primary interest.

Senator McElman: Do you feel that this view would be more applicable to an urban or suburban situation than to a rural or smalltown situation?

Mr. Bassett: I suppose so, because our newspapers are suburban newspapers. The market is a lot larger than in a rural area. I suppose in a rural area there wouldn't be any job printing companies except the local weekly newspaper. That would be the only one and so there is no point in closing down your job printing shop and making somebody go from St. Stevens to Fredericton to get their job printing done.

Senator McElman: Thank you.

The Chairman: Mr. Bassett, in view of the paragraph which is a rather severe indictment of the advertising sales abilities of the Canadian Weekly Newspapers Association, why does Inland continue to belong to the CWNA?

Mr. Bassett: Because the publishers of these newspapers want to belong to it.

The Chairman: Why?

Mr. Bassett: I have two of them here—you can ask them.

The Chairman: Why?

Mr. Bassett: Well, I have Mr. Nolan and Mr. Haskell sitting there.

The Chairman: Well, rather than putting that to them now perhaps Mr. Nolan and Mr. Haskell could get to the microphones and answer that question because I think we would be interested.

Mr. Bassett: I know a lot of urban daily newspapers who are members of Canadian Press. They don't use it; they don't use their wire services really because they have their own correspondents around the world—the Toronto Star is one and the Toronto Telegram is another and the Globe and Mail. They pay their fees to support the organization. By supporting the organization they are supporting also the smaller weekly newspapers that really need the CWNA.

The Chairman: Well, I would suggest that the analogy isn't valid. I think that the Toronto Telegram for example gets far greater service out of the Canadian Press than Inland does out of the CWNA?

Mr. Bassett: They are both negligible.

Mr. C. S. Q. Hoodspith: Mr. C. S. Q. Hoodspith, West Vancouver, British Columbia, The Lions Gate Times.

You have heard me several times today but bear with me for two points please. I mentioned very briefly the last time I addressed you on the question of department advertising from the Federal Government. I felt that there was an element of discrimination being shown.

First of all, we are fed in great quantities on all types of forms, free literature, free information and fillers and all that type of thing from the departments of the Federal Government. When the time comes for advertising we find that sometimes we do get the advertising but the daily newspapers always do. When we do get a similar ad on the same subject, the advertising is just about half of what the daily newspapers receive. There may be arguments for this, I just don't know, but nevertheless the departments feel that our papers are sufficiently important to receive a steady stream of publicity. There is all kinds of material that comes in and I could name them forever if I had to.

The Chairman: Do you use it?

Mr. Hoodspith: No.

The Chairman: None of it?

Mr. Hoodspith: No.

The Chairman: Do you receive any kind of this material from private industry?

Mr. Hoodspith: Yes.

The Chairman: Do you use it?

Mr. Hoodspith: No.

The Chairman: Do you get it from the British Columbia Government?

Mr. Hoodspith: ... but we do get advertising from private industry.

The Chairman: Do you receive it from the British Columbia Government?

Mr. Hoodspith: Yes.

The Chairman: Do you use it?

Mr. Hoodspith: If it is pertinent to our own area. I should have predicated my remarks by saying that if there is anything of local interest we would use it, yes. We receive everything—we get the whole ball of wax. Since I have a rural paper and a suburban paper I get everything right from "How to plough fields" to "Building high rise apartments."

That is one point—the second one is the reference to Doug Bassett's comment about ABC. I want to underline his statement; I am one hundred percent behind him. If ABC were strong and meant as much as it says with advertising agencies I think this would do a lot to discourage throw-aways. If you went to an advertising agency, any established advertising agency across Canada, and said that you were going to put a full coverage newspaper regardless of page advertising or not they will say "What is the circulation?" You tell them "We will buy some space in it." They are not asking you whether it is ABC or not.

Now, if we are supposed to go ABC or retain this standard we have it thrown right back in our faces with no recognition at all. I think there has to be some real soul searching with regard to the value of ABC. That is my statement, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: Mr. McKenna would like to comment on that.

Mr. McKenna: In that respect, Mr. Chairman, I would point out, as I pointed out in my reports to the CWNA that one of the weaknesses of the weekly newspapers is that they don't go to ABC meetings. Now, you have a chance to meet advertisers and advertising agency personnel there, but how many meetings have you attended?

Mr. Hoodspith: My dear sir—I pay them a set fee a year but that doesn't mean I have to go down to their meetings to find out what they do in Chicago. I have a representative from Canada who is supposed to represent me. If I can't expect an elected body of the Audit Bureau of Circulations to look after my welfare in the agency field, then I might as well not belong to it because that is what I want them to do and that is why I am paying them fees. I don't have to go down there and ask them what they are doing, watch them, because they are supposed to have intelligent people looking after the place.

Mr. McKenna: I am very pleased to have you call me intelligent, because I am the representative.

On the other hand, when you have a half a dozen weekly newspaper people in the last case we had three Canadian weekly newspaper people at the ABC annual meeting in New York—one was our president, Mr. Gerry Craven, one was myself and one from Quebec—and you have several hundred agency people there, and you have several hundred advertisers there, how in the blazes, no matter how intelligent and how energetic your representative may be, how is he going to be able to talk to all these people?

Mr. Hoodspith: Mr. McKenna, all I am trying to tell you—

Mr. McKenna: If you get 30 or 40 people here talking, then you are going to reach a lot more people.

Mr. Hoodspith: You have missed the point. ABC is supposed to be recognized and one doesn't have to go down there and tell them that we are ABC—the agency should know this. They are standing by ABC, and the principles of ABC, why don't they stick with it instead of giving advertising to throw-aways and dodges and that sort of thing. This is the point. I don't have to go down there and reach to them because we are paying them to do the preaching. They preached to me, that is why I joined them.

Mr. McKenna: Why don't you come down here and help us do the preaching. You are a very good preacher.

Mr. Hoodspith: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Roy Farran, Publisher, North Hill News, Calgary, Alberta: Mr. Chairman, I stood up because Mr. Bassett was getting pretty close to my former business and I thought I must disagree with one of the things he said, although I agree with most of what he said.

I also agree with Mr. Delorme's view about agencies. I should probably begin with those areas of agreement because I understand my friend Scotty Lovick had some pretty harsh things to say about weeklies the other day and so I think I probably should crack back.

The standard of Canadian advertising agencies is very low, lower than it was in the United States before suburban weeklies, in such places as The San Fernando Valley, began to wake them up by selling manufacturers and companies direct. This is really what should be done here.

The Chairman: Excuse me for interrupting you but you say that the standards of the Canadian advertising industry is pretty low. Do you mean when it comes—

Mr. Farran: When it comes to giving real service for the dollar to their clients.

The Chairman: You are not referring specifically to the problems of weeklies—you are speaking much broader?

Mr. Farran: Yes, I am speaking much broader.

The Chairman: Fine, I just wanted to be clear on that.

Mr. Farran: Their attitude to weeklies, of course, is one which particularly aroused me because I am in the weekly field. Their percentage of commission, for instance, from weeklies is the same as it is from dailies, but placing ads in weeklies takes a little bit more work on the part of the agencies—a little more billing, a little more servicing. The agencies prefer such things as those very doubtful stop-holes on radio ratings because they are simple. The whole value of a radio station may depend on the return of 50 postcards out of 300 from a city of a half a million people, but they prefer that because it is easy.

They prefer the certainty of the daily circulation despite the inevitable reader loss. They never tell their clients about the reader loss because the daily is so thick. Some people you know only read the front page and the comics. Only 19 per cent of the readers read the editorial page, for instance.

The Chairman: What survey is that?

Mr. Farran: That was the University of Washington.

The Chairman: When was that done do you know?

Mr. Farran: Approximately 1960.

The Chairman: We would be interested in that survey if you could send us a copy of it?

Mr. Farran: I will see if I can dig one up.

They have a form of intellectual snobbery towards weeklies because they don't read the trivia themselves and they believe they are more sophisticated than people who come from a Prairie Gopher town for instance. They don't understand pre-prints and inserts in Canada. I don't believe the weekly publishers themselves do. They just don't realize what sort of a market they are missing, especially since the rates for direct mail have gone so high. A lot of them don't understand that they could be using their weeklies legally as a carrier for direct mail.

Now, I don't believe that PR releases really demonstrate much value by Canadian agencies to their clients; it really demonstrates a syphoning off of advertising money. It does not represent a real sort of advertising purpose, a real benefit to the client, because this gentlemen is correct, most of it does go into the trashcan.

The Chairman: Don't you think they know that? Why do you think they do it?

Mr. Farran: Because they bill the client. It is a sort of con job. They bill the client and the client honestly believes that this is performing a service; that he is getting free plugs in newspapers from coast to coast and, of course, he isn't.

The Chairman: Do you think most advertising agencies con their clients?

Mr. Farran: A lot of them do.

The Chairman: Most of them?

Mr. Farran: Most of them—all of them in this PR field.

The Chairman: I might say for those who are interested—I think it is probably not until after Easter—but we have the Institute of Canadian Advertising coming before us and we will have the transcript of your remarks and we will ask them to comment.

Mr. Farran: Well, as I understand, Mr. Shoults made some remarks about weeklies, so it is quid pro quo.

The Chairman: I didn't see that.

Mr. Farran: Here is where I disagree with Mr. Bassett and the gentleman from Vancouver.

The Chairman: Well, are you leaving the agencies now?

Mr. Farran: Yes.

The Chairman: May I just ask you one question before you do?

Mr. Farran: Yes.

The Chairman: I should make clear, Mr. Farran, that I have no brief for the agencies myself but, on the other hand, I wonder if you aren't being just a little bit unfair, exaggerating to make a point. Surely some of the problems that you fellows have in selling national advertising are your own fault?

Mr. Farran: I don't have any problems. I have to tell you that I am at the end of a record year since I have been in business, that it is an even better year than 1967-68. was a good year but '69 to '70 has been a tremendous year. I don't suffer from a lack of national advertising.

The Chairman: I was going to ask you, what ratio would be national, Mr. Farran?

Mr. Farran: Our ratio would be roughly the same as Mr. Bassett's, around three to four percent.

The Chairman: That is national?

Mr. Farran: National.

The Chairman: Well, you could hardly call that a flood of national advertising?

Mr. Farran: No, but obviously, since we are making a very good profit on our overall business, it is coming from somewhere else.

The Chairman: Well, of course, it is coming from somewhere else. I am not quarrelling with your success at all. The industry as such, as we have heard from representations put before us, is well known for having trouble attracting national advertising. You would agree with that?

Mr. Farran: Yes, but they are not really suffering. I have access to the books of a paper I used to own with a circulation of about 2,000 which is now owned by my brother. It is a very small one-man operation and he does extremely well for the investment in that business.

I believe that most of these weekly publishers do much better than you give the impression they do.

The Chairman: Well, I don't want to chew the point to death but if I could just follow this up. Mr. Bassett told us in his presentation that in 1969 he received one 200-line ad throughout all of his newspapers from the CWNA.

Mr. Farran: Well, yes, he received Tex-made Sheets, which has been a tradition in the CWNA for us to receive every January.

The Chairman: Well, perhaps I am becoming repetitive but I think some of these problems in terms of national advertising is with the weeklies.

Mr. Farran: Yes, it is. The great classic example in the success of the weeklies is in the San Fernando Valley outside of Los Angeles. One of them grew so big that it knocked out two established dailies and now has a third, one of the biggest in the world in trouble. It has expanded to the point where it also needs a three-ton truck to take out one carrier boy's route because it has gotten so fat and thick. It is really sort of a man-bites-log story. However, now I will come to the area where I don't agree with Mr. Bassett.

You see, you set up your machinery for a suburban paper for one issue a week, or perhaps two days a week so you have over invested in machinery for your requirement. Obviously good business is to try to fill up to capacity that machinery for the rest of the days of the week. Nearly all of our weeklies are published on the same day or maybe a variation of a couple of days, especially in areas where there is a late night shopping pattern, or two pay days a month, one at the middle of the month and the other at the end of the month. You have to fill up, use your machinery for the rest of the week, and as far as I am concerned, a buck is a buck and I see nothing wrong with that.

I don't despise direct mail or flyers or codes or throw-aways, because they are also entitled to the freedom of the press. Let the people judge which is the best medium for carrying the advertising.

If a good weekly is stacked up against a flyer, nine times out of ten, if the weekly is good, it will win. The flyer is less attractive to the reader. However, if the flyer is better printed, more acceptable and more attractive to the reader than a weekly newspaper, then let the flyer win, because the flyer deserves to win. I say a buck is a buck.

The Chairman: Would you like to comment on that, Mr. Bassett?

Mr. Bassett: Well, all I was saying was that you are putting out a weekly newspaper once a week and you want to stay in job printing, but therefore you are devoting four-fifths of your work week to job printing, not to the newspaper in the community which it serves. It would seem to me, from what you have said, that your newspaper is fairly prosperous so you must be doing a fairly good job. But in some cases it could happen that your staff and the publishers are concentrating more on other aspects than the newspaper, and it is our opinion that our publisher should concentrate on getting business and putting out a very, very good newspaper.

Mr. Farran: Well, it is a point of view, but I believe that a weekly should be produced in one shift. I employ 52 people that one shift just doesn't justify, so I need to fill it in for the rest of the week with something else, which is also making money.

Mr. Bassett: Well, we are pretty lucky because we have one central printing plant.

The Chairman: Excuse me, gentlemen, I believe Mr. McKenna wanted to make a point.

Mr. McKenna: There is one remark that I would like to make and this is on the question of the remark about 200 lines of advertising from the Canadian Weekly Newspapers Association.

I would like to point out that the Canadian Weekly Newspaper Association has no direct sales force and any publisher who expects to get direct national advertising from the Canadian Weekly Newspaper Association just hasn't read what CWNA is supposed to do.

Mr. Bassett: Well, in the brief I say that we feel one of the main functions of the Association should be to help secure national advertising.

The Chairman: May I then put this question to you, Mr. McKenna.

The broadcasters have a radio sales bureau; there is a television sales bureau; the CDNPA very actively solicits business; and there is the Magazine Advertising Bureau. Is there no central organization seeking national advertising on behalf of the weeklies?

Mr. McKenna: There is no national advertising group as far as weeklies are concerned. I think if you will look at my brief that you will find I have mentioned that the regional groups are becoming interested in advertising nationally, or from a regional level. However, there is no national advertising sales group in the CWNA.

Mr. Bassett: Mr. Chairman, the best way to secure national advertising is to go out and sell it for yourself. I might say that we have just landed a 17,000 line contract with Volkswagen Canada last week by going out and selling it ourselves. Nobody can tell your story better than you, yourself, so this is what I mean when I say that you have to go out and sell it yourself.

The Chairman: Well, surely an organization which is a group and has six or eight papers has an advantage over an individual paper, even more so when that group is near Metropolitan Toronto. As you know, you can get in the car and go down and call on that group of people. It is not possible for an independent weekly in rural Manitoba to do this. How do they sell national advertising?

Mr. Bassett: Through the CWNA.

The Chairman: Well, Mr. McKenna said they don't.

Mr. Bassett: Well, they should.

The Chairman: Well, we will hear these two people at the microphone and then we will turn to the next panel and we will have a discussion following it.

Mr. Lindley Calnan: The Picton Gazette: Senator Davey, Honourable Senators and Friends.

We publish semi-weekly in other words twice a week. The press run is 5,800 and the ABC position is approximately 5600 indicating 200 giveaways or something like that.

On a recent visit to Toronto I called on an advertising man and asked him about the virtues of ABC. His answer was: we do not like to buy unless we have an ABC verified situation. I told him that unfortunately the weekly press from my statistics and figures was getting a very small proportion of the advertising dollar and he said "Well, on the other hand, why don't you come in and see me twice a year—what effort are you putting into selling national advertising?" That is just one angle.

We are talking about revenues—all right. At the Picton Gazette we have subscription revenue, we have advertising revenue and we have commercial printing revenue. I think it is very difficult in a weekly newspaper, or semi-weekly newspaper not to have a commercial printing establishment along with the newspaper operation.

Approximately—I wish I had this in percentage form but I do have it very nearly in a percentage form—our revenue derives from 15 per cent in subscriptions, 50 per cent in advertising and 25 per cent in commercial printing. Well, that is not right—it doesn't come out evenly. However, we will carry on with it anyway and say 15, 50 and 25 per cent. I haven't worked out the percentages.

We come to the point, what is happening with income. Well, this last year the Honourable Eric Kierans in his postal budget made it necessary for us to consider regarding our 5600 ABC position and to announce to our public, who receive the Gazette, that we would have to put up the subscription price from five to seven dollars a year. In the United States from seven to nine dollars a year.

What happened? Well, we lost a few subscribers, possibly about 240 or thereabouts and we already have a few of them back and we expect the rest to come back. It is necessary to make a profit in an operation as far as we are concerned. I have spoken about subscriptions already and said that last year the subscription price went from five to seven. I remember when it was one dollar a year.

As far as local advertising is concerned we have seen the price of local advertising go from five cents an inch in my lifetime to a dollar and a half an inch.

In my experience, we have had to put up our advertising rates every year or two in recent times on account of the inflationary trend. That is my contribution, sir.

The Chairman: Thank you very much. There is one other speaker waiting, I think.

Mr. Donald C. Somerville, Publisher, 'Olive Chronicle', Oliver, British Columbia: My name is Somerville. I am publisher of the Olive Chronicle in British Columbia. I am also a National Director, of CWNA. My paper is a rather small paper, but as a Director of CWNA, I feel compelled to express an opinion here to dispel some of the criticism that has been expressed against CWNA with respect to its activities in efforts to sell national advertising. I want to point out that CWNA primarily is a fraternal organization. It was always intended to be, as far as I know. It has tried over the years on a number of occasions to develop policies and activities which would further selling national advertising for its members. So far, these policies and activities have not been successful, but it has not been because of lack of effort.

I wish to point out that our Association has between four and five hundred members whose total circulation may vary anywhere between five hundred and twenty thousand or twenty-five thousand. They are scattered from the Maritime Provinces to British Columbia. They represent a wide divergence of rural and urban markets. They represent a great divergence in size and the nature of their readers and the nature of their publications.

I suggest to you that the selling of national advertising as a package for all of these members is a practically insurmountable task for an Association of our nature. I might also point out that the annual dues or membership fee, while they vary, are rather small. I have forgotten the figures, but as far as I know, no paper pays more than about two hundred dollars and most of them somewhere in the area of about a hundred dollars per year. This type of money in no way should be expected to provide a major sales effort for all the weekly newspapers throughout Canada.

Now, I don't want to suggest that our Association should have no part in approaching national advertisers. I think that we have a place in selling our national advertisers on the principle of advertising in weekly publications, but I do not think that we are in a position, nor that we will be in a position in the immediate future, to make a meaningful presentation to national advertising agencies for national advertising. And I think it's a bit unfair for any newspaper to expect its association, which is primarily a fraternal association, to make a major effort in sales. I don't think we can be expected to have the resources with the funds that are available to us.

The Chairman: At the same time, I am sure you would share the opinion which has been expressed here about Federal Government advertising. You would expect more Federal Government advertising, or would you? I don't want to put words in your mouth.

Mr. Somerville: Yes, I would, based primarily on the fact that if the weekly newspapers are important enough to be on the receiving end of so many press releases, surely we are important enough to place paid advertising in for the benefit and information of our readers.

The Chairman: But the Federal Government advertising is placed mostly, I think, through advertising agencies.

Mr. Somerville: That is correct. What I am saying, Mr. Chairman, is that I do not think—and this is a personal viewpoint—that the Federal Government should place advertising in weekly newspapers as a means of subsidizing weekly newspapers. I have no use for this at all.

I think that the weekly newspapers have a proper function to their readers and to, in this case, the Federal Government, which would be an advertiser in getting a message across, and that we have a way, a medium, to express this message, and that as such, the Federal Government is missing a wide spectrum of readership by not advertising in weekly newspapers. The monies which are expended on these seemingly endless press releases could far better be spent in paid advertising.

The Chairman: All right. Fine. Mr. Miller?

Mr. Lou Miller, Publisher, The Monitor, Montreal: I just wanted to add, sir, on your statement a moment ago. The Treasury Board approves all advertising budgets and the list of media—the total shebang as far as advertising is concerned—here in Ottawa.

The Chairman: But I think you would agree that those decisions are made by the agencies; if you are under the impression that the Minister sits down and draws up the list of newspapers which will be used, I don't think he does. I think that those decisions are made by advertising agencies, and they come to the Minister much in the way that any agency goes to its client.

Mr. Hacker: May I comment on that? It seems to me it's been pointed out here that you are hiring an agency. Whether you are the Government or whether you are a company, you should have the say in where your money is spent.

The Chairman: Yes, but one of the reasons, and I don't want to get into that—but surely one of the reasons you hire an agency is so you won't have to do the work.

Mr. Hacker: Mr. Chairman, I know for a fact, having worked in an advertising agency, myself, which handled governmental business that the agencies do, in fact, make the immediate decision as to where the advertising dollars go.

Mr. Miller: All the more reason we should speak to our Cabinet, the people who are running the various departments, such as Bryce Mackasey, to whom I have written on several occasions, and in this particular department, Labour—

Mr. Hacker: That is a last resort. I mean, if you don't get the business through the advertising agency, then like all of us, you go straight to the client, don't we?

Mr. Miller: We are not getting it from the agencies.

Mr. Hacker: No, so then we go to the client.

The Chairman: Well, you know, there may be more to say about this after the next panel. We are going to have to move on to "Disbursements". It could be that although we are leaving "Revenue", that we could return to this question when we come to the discussion following the next series of panelists. I would thank the gentlemen who are here, and I wonder if the final group of panelists would please come forward—Mr. Rodrigue, Mr. Willis, Mr. Friesen and Mr. Dunning.

Ladies and gentlemen, this final panel is going to discuss "Disbursements". I think we will perhaps turn to that discussion now. Again, gentlemen, I will tap once at eight minutes, and I would hope you can conclude in ten minutes.

The first speaker is Mr. W. E. Dunning, publisher of the Haney Gazette, Haney, British Columbia. Mr. Dunning?

Mr. W. E. Dunning, Publisher, The Haney Gazette, Haney, British Columbia: The term "Disbursements" sounds like the adjournment. We are nearing that point in the day, and with your indulgence, Mr. Senator and fellow panelists, I would like to say that to talk about the disbursements of eight hundred weekly newspapers is about as complex as trying to analyze the total industry in ten minutes.

I don't think there is anybody in this room who knows the full story of analyzing the Canadian weekly industry, individually or as an industry.

Fortunately, there is a group in the United States which has been making consistent studies of cost analysis and its breakdown of the actual weekly newspaper complex throughout the years. I have the report comprising the 1968 report which dwells with some of the requests for information. I am not therefore going to answer some of the points relative to your disbursements subjects because I believe some of the other speakers will be covering them.

Fortunately, I will therefore be brief, and with your permission, I would like to point out that maybe ten years ago, weekly newspapers as a group or individually could be considered on a comparative basis because then they were nearly all on letter press. I do not know the exact percentage of letter press to off-set, but the complexities of the studies have not been made on that basis, and I don't think there is yet one planned, but it is something which should be done by the Canadian weekly industry, not only for its own benefit, but the industry as a whole across Canada.

I come from an area of Canada in which is recognized, and is now being tested in Vancouver, the cost of producing weekly newspapers or dailies—because the dailies are being made to compare and being made to meet the hourly rate, in B.C. is on a basis of the cost of producing such similar products in New York.

The basis of the contest in Vancouver is the basis of the obtaining criteria in New York.

There are weekly newspapers in B.C., some being produced by a combination of letter press and off-set, which are paying higher than the basic price.

Some of them are a combination of letter press produced and off-set printed; many of them are producing their own composition with work being produced out on outside presses or what they call "central printing".

I don't think there's yet been sufficient analytical material to make a comparison at the present on the cost of producing by these different methods, or, to know truly whether off-set has yet achieved the savings which are anticipated or hoped for in the change-over between offset and letter press.

No one will deny that off-set has the potential of control of colour and a greater feasibility in the longer production of the newspapers' runs, apart from a totally letter press shop for the production of newspapers. We have within our plant attempted to sell only the complete structure of offset to maximum size, with the exception of off-set for our jobs, so when we start to disburse the income which we have been discussing, it is an impossibility to study any standard of comparisons in any part of Canada. But there is in this cost analysis, a study produced in 1968 and 1967, figures which will aid your thoughts this evening. I will leave this report with you, if you have it or not, because its breakdowns such that it is being accepted as a comparatively acceptable level of study for the weekly and the publishing field, both in the United States and Canada.

I am not too sure that the printing business as it exists in Canada today, knows enough about its own business and the details of its own business.

There has been the position of the metropolitan Ontario dailies entering the weekly field, as in Toronto, with a degree of success which we have not seen for several years.

I am not saying therefore that many of the publishers today would not be reluctant to all out because the figures show you—all these figures like in 1967, the net return to the average weekly newspaper was seven point four per cent. In 1968, on the same figures of comparison, the figures had increased to nine point two per cent, approximately, a little over five per cent on the gross return.

Now, 1969, undoubtedly—I know in my own instance and many others—has been or was a good year. The reports are not coming yet; so I still claim that the net return to an average weekly newspaper owner is less than the average bank loan charges accepted today. I believe the average bank loan on first mortgages on properties within sewered areas is about ten point five. I believe within the same area, the same banks charge fourteen and some points for home construction mortgages in unsewered areas across Canada. Those are established figures, and they are being now charged by banks.

With your permission, Mr. Chairman, I am going to read this statement, and then leave it with you because in it are included many solid facts, based on research, something which we do not have in Canada, but has been found by our experience to be comparable to our own position in British Columbia, and I think a basis for that analysis on a comparative basis across the country. This was published by the Publishers' Union in 1969, based on the report by Carl C. Webb, upon completion of tabulated returns from 16 weekly newspaper publications, who participated in the eighteenth annual Weekly Newspaper Cost Study.

Webb, who is both manager of the Oregon Newspaper Publishers' Association, and a Professor at the University of Oregon, says that this sample of weekly publications enjoyed more business in 1968 as compared with 1967, and that they enjoyed a greater net return in their reports for this last study. Average income per subscriber increased from $3,623 in 1967 to $3,892 in 1968, a percentage rise of nearly five per cent.

The survey also showed that the adjusted net income after deducting a modest salary for the publishers increased from 7.4 per cent in 1967 to 9.2 per cent in 1968.

Newspapers from 38 States submitted 196 reports of 1968 income and expenditures in the States which has been conducted under the sponsorship of newspaper associations, managers and the national newspaper associations, the composite newspaper showed a distribution of income per subscriber as advertising—24.17; circulation 3.81; commercial printing—6.46; miscellaneous—4.48.

Income per employee increased from $14,663.00 to $15,595.

Offset printing of newspapers continues to increase and now is 49 per cent. of the current study.

In the final statement, 83 newspapers gave both advertising range and advertising for the kinds of advertising: average advertising net per income per panel for the composite weekly newspaper of 4,327 circulation in 1968 was: local, 1.19; national, 1.36; classified, 1.34.

The Chairman: I am afraid, Mr. Dunning, that you have run out of time. Can you complete in a sentence?

Mr. Dunning: Yes, wages generally average about fifty per cent. of the gross distribution of a weekly, with newsprint the second major factor and postal and the other incidentals, but I still feel that there is a tremendous amount of work yet to be made on behalf of the weekly industry, printing industry for a study analysis of our cost factors, something which we do need now and must be employed and stored by a computer. This is to the total benefit of the Canadian Newspaper Industry.

The Chairman: Are you going to leave that with us?

Mr. Dunning: Yes.

The Chairman: I think you may for the file. Now, Mr. D. K. Friesen of the Altona Red River Valley Echo, Red River, Manitoba.

Mr. D. K. Friesen, Altona Red River Valley Echo, Red River, Manitoba: Mr. Chairman, members of the Committee, ladies and gentlemen: I am sorry. I was told to prepare a ten-minute speech, and I only have notes to the questions that were raised in your analysis that was sent me, but I hope that they will suffice, and that my remarks may prompt some discussion.

I would like to make my position clear in the light of some of the earlier remarks. Our newspaper is run as a department in our larger complex. Its sole function is the newspaper production itself, and its revenue only constitutes about two per cent of our total revenue.

Now, I will read the questions, and my notes to them.

Question: "It is contended that newsprint, transportation and postal costs have increased disproportionately with other industries. Do you agree?"

My answer is: not entirely; because the items in fact increased disproportionately with other costs in other industries. Postage costs for magazines have increased certainly, in my opinion to the detriment of the Canadian publications. We are subsidizing U.S. and foreign publications and printed material. These come into Canada duty free or at a lower rate of duty to our detriment.

Furthermore, while I am not personally opposed to the present increased costs for paid circulation weekly newspapers, as they have not hurt too badly, I feel that the services we are obtaining from the post office are detrimental to the point it takes six to seven days for delivery in our own province.

Postal costs for controlled circulation weeklies have risen much more than for paid circulation weeklies, especially in rural areas that depend on postal delivery, even if they do not have the newspapers mailed. As to advertising content, I content that they should be treated the same as paid circulation newspapers.

Question: "Do you feel that these increases are a serious threat to Weeklies?"

I think that many weeklies are feeling the pinch not because of this increase but because of other factors. This region has become too small to make the operation viable because of competition from other media, such as radio, TV, free circulation newspapers and advertising sheets. Better facilities are necessary in the rural communities. It seems the answer to this problem lies in merging these smaller newspapers in each individual community, but they must face realities or lose the home or weekly newspaper.

Question: "What should the government and/or industry be doing about them?"

I am personally opposed to subsidies to any industry or other facet of society unless it is being hurt disproportionately by the indiscriminate use of public funds for publication originating outside of Canada. In this respect I would recommend that the government give us a more efficient kind of postal service and help us to get the newspapers more quickly into the hands of our subscribers.

Should not the CBC do just what other industries have to do, increase circulation and develop revenue and cut costs by making their plant as efficient as possible? My concern is the amount of public funds which have been spent which directly compete with the private news media, such as TV, radio and newspapers. The CBC sells millions of dollars of advertising in competition with other media, sometimes without relation to the cost. Does the CBC pay taxes on their income? Other media cannot compete with them.

I think in addition to the advertising commissions they get, they received a subsidy of $145,630,000 in 1968-69 and are requesting over $160,000,000 for the current fiscal year. This permits them to send people from one end of the country to the other for feature which may take two or three months of their time. They ended up with 400 unused hotel rooms during Expo!

I would go on to add that what I would like to see is that they sell no advertising whatsoever at the local or provincial level, their function being to provide good TV and radio service across Canada.

Question: "Are salaries commensurate with other occupations?"

This varies a great deal. Larger weeklies pay their employees salaries and wages comparable with those of other publications. In some weeklies many high salaried people are employed as apprentice reporters. After gaining experience, they move into the larger centres, whose revenues permit them to pay higher wages.

The nature of the work requires long hours for reporters, but this is recognized and in spite of that, many of them are in the not so much for the money they receive as for the challenge; and specifying the type of work they perform is impossible.

Question: "Would increased salaries or improved working conditions deter Weekly staff members from moving to larger papers or the cities?"

This would probably help but it is not the sole criterion. There are many factors that impel good editors and reporters to remain in rural locations. Even editors from the cities or reporters from the city dailies are anxious to buy weeklies. One is a publishing decision of ignoring tight deadlines on dailies. They have a more relaxed pace on weeklies.

Large cities, large traffic problems, pollution and tense working conditions do not matter to the same extent as in the past when economic benefits did not always win out.

The Chairman: Thank you very much. The third panelist is Mr. I. D. Willis. Mr. Willis is the publisher of the Alliston Herald, in Alliston, Ontario. Mr. Willis.

Mr. I. D. Willis, Publisher, Alliston Herald, Alliston, Ontario: Mr. Chairman, Honourable Senators, Fellow Publishers, Ladies and Gentlemen:— I am honoured to have been asked to speak on this occasion, although somewhat appalled at having to try to deal with weekly newspaper costs in just ten minutes.

By the time I finished preparing this talk, I felt great sympathy for the old lady who had her epitaph engraved on her tombstone, "Meant well, tried a little, failed much".

To begin with the points set out in the agenda:— I do not think that costs have increased disproportionately to those in other industries, except for postage which affects some papers more heavily than others.

The problem is not so much rising costs of all kinds, with wages the heaviest charge, but the difficulty of increasing revenues to compensate. There are definite ceilings on local and national advertising rates and on subscriptions. To push any of these beyond a certain point results in diminishing returns, and now, just when these rates should be increased, many papers which have been "holding the line" have the added problem of the governments' anti-inflationary policies which are a psychological hindrance to needed rate and price increases.

I submit, therefore, that very many weekly newspapers are in a squeeze which can have serious ill-effects on their quality, effectiveness and even their very existence.

In this connection I would like to remind the honourable members of this Committee that weekly newspapers are in quite a different position to the ordinary retail merchant who has a small investment in equipment, low-paid staff, often extended credit so that goods are not paid for until sold, and whose retail prices are a percentage mark-up on cost—and his rising prices are accepted as normal by the public. Compare this with the weekly publisher. The vast majority have very substantial capital investment in equipment; must employ high-rate skilled workers and have more employees per $1,000.00 of sales than any retail store. Also, it is not easy to raise prices because of traditional prejudices about subscription and advertising rates which involve the false idea that weekly papers are a public service that, somehow, exist without needing to make money, or conversely, are making enormous profits.

The truth is that the profits are small when all costs are truly taken into account. Publisher monetary returns are modest if we may judge by a survey made in 1968 by the National Newspaper Association in the United States. After review of 161 weekly papers with circulations from under 1,500 to over 4,000, the survey suggested that a publisher-editor salary of $6,000.00 to $8,000.00 a year might be taken as a reasonable average.

Here are profits in percentage of gross revenue to the nearest thousand after deducting the publisher's salary but before income tax on five circulation categories: Under 1,500 with gross income, $43,148—11.2 percent; 1,501—2,000 gross $49,909.00; 2,001—3,000, gross $92,089—10.2 per cent profit; 3,001—4,000 gross $114,900—7.3 percent profit; Over 4,000, gross $207,462—1.2 percent.

Out of the 161 papers, 13 percent did not earn the suggested publisher salary. The forecast for 1970 is lower profits.

As to industry, we do not feel that it is called upon to do anything about special low prices to weeklies except as to newsprint, the pricing of which might stand investigation, which, if I remember rightly, has been raised by other groups.

However, there is something which governments can do. It is to remove all sales taxes on equipment, parts and supplies used in all phases of production of legitimate weekly newspapers. We exclude equipment, et cetera, for commercial printing.

There is good ground for such exemption. Weeklies are in a unique position to provide two-way communication between governments and public. Because weeklies are usually thoroughly read, any government stories stand a good chance of being read too. Going the other way, an intelligent study of weeklies by governments will help them, the governments, to keep informed about what is happening at, and the sentiments of both the rural grass-roots and urban asphalt dust. Information Canada might make a special note of this.

So far as wages and salaries are concerned, they are the heaviest single cost and are rising. The aforementioned 1968 survey puts them at about 37 percent of gross income and they are higher now. Please remember that this percentage does not include the publisher's salary.

Of course, increased wages and salaries would help to hold staff, but money alone is not the only thing that enters into working for a weekly. There is the matter of congenial surroundings, less pressure, a happier employer-employee relationship, less need for special certified training, the open shop and many other things, including the pleasant lower-cost life in a small, friendly community.

Anyway, I am convinced that most weekly publishers are glad to pay as much as they can, but they cannot pay more than the business will carry. Also, wages must be acceptable in the over-all context or employees will leave. I think that I am right in saying that many publisher-editors earn less per hour than many of their responsibility-free employees. For instance, my wife and I get about $1.70 an hour and no extra for overtime. We work about an eighty-hour week.

A weekly newspaper has got to make a profit to survive. There must be enough net profit after taxes for the publisher to maintain a decent standard of living and to set up reserves and buy new equipment. If Finance Minister Benson's White Paper tax proposals are implemented, it will be more and more difficult to do this and finance expansion. Weeklies are already in danger from the cost-price squeeze and Mr. Benson intensifies this threat to the survival of an independent weekly press.

Now, in the few remaining minutes, I would like to mention some other aspects of costs. Loss of subscriptions due to poor postal delivery is becoming a serious cost.

It also costs money to run even a very small fraction of the flood of news-releases which come from both the federal and provincial governments and their agencies. Some may deserve space but will probably need condensation because the bulk of such new releases are too long, too dull and too confusing. Rewriting and publishing cost money, although weeklies are rarely given credit for the public-spiritedness in this regard, and it is galling to a publisher to give this time and space and then find that a revenue-producing advertisement on the same subject is being carried in other papers.

In our view, governments, in the broad sense should not expect weeklies to incur costs by giving free space for what is often straight government advertising. This should be paid for.

So far, I have dealt primarily with production costs. To these must be added costs of news gathering, features, selling both local and national advertising, photography, accounting and billing, completing government returns and questionnaires, general overheads and so on. These all cost money.

The amount spent in these different activities depends upon both the size and policies of the paper.

Some papers cut them all to the bone to reduce costs. There are all levels from this basic stratum upward, according to ability to finance news coverage, selling and other services. The policies followed are reflected in the quality of the paper.

Selling, advertising and billing takes time and, therefore, money.

Accounting costs money. Completing government returns is a non-productive cost.

In all papers, there is an economic balance between amount of advertising carried, amount of news and number of pages which can be produced efficiently with existing equipment and staff.

If the balance is maintained effectively, there should be a profit. If advertising falls off, there must be economies somewhere to compensate. The greater problem is when news volume is too heavy in relation to advertising (which foots the bill) or, even, when advertising and news exceed plant-worker capacity.

When this last happens, there is overtime at higher rates (and overtime cannot be incurred indefinitely) or the hiring of part-time help (which probably is not readily available in smaller places) or expanding plant and staff to meet the heavier work load. Expansion at this time needs to be very carefully considered in light of interest rates, taxation and business uncertainty.

Expansion results in cumulative cost beyond back shop staff and equipment because a larger paper can mean more selling and more news gathering staff. Costs can pyramid. Will business growth carry them?

These general remarks apply to both letterpress and offset production. I might say that the figures given earlier were based on studies of both kinds of production.

In conclusion, I would like to emphasize that in this field, time and money equate; that weeklies are caught between fast-rising costs and slow-rising revenues; that removal of sales taxes would help a little to relieve the situation; that space is worth money and that governments should pay for "advertising" announcements; that the total cost-revenue situation could become one where some weekly papers may be forced to merge or sell out to chains, which will weaken a most important part of the web of the country's national pattern of mass communication—the independent weekly newspaper.

I thank you for your attention.

The Chairman: Thank you, Mr. Willis. The final panelist of the day is Mr. Vincent Rodrigue of L'Éclairer-Progrès, St-Georges, Quebec. Monsieur Rodrigue, please.

[Translation]

Mr. Vincent Rodrigue, Publisher, L'Éclairer-Progrès de St-Georges-de-Beauce, P.Q.: This statement concerns, above all, the general percentages of increased costs in the production of newspapers over the last five years. I have subdivided the various costs of production: (a) printing, (b) salaries, (c) administration, and (d) postage. First, I would like to point out that these are my own personal ideas, and not representative of any association. I obtained the percentages from personal experience and from various associates in the neighbouring regions, all in Quebec. Moreover, this investigation I conducted was not comprehensive.

Concerning the first item, the cost of printing the paper, in my estimation, increases range from 25 to 30 per cent over the last five years or so, varying according to the region. I think that this is a fairly normal increase in relation to the other industrial sectors. It must be said that the printing industry, at least in Quebec, has been hampered for years by work contracts. The cost of printing a weekly would equal one-third of the returns, and no more.

For the second item, employee salaries, we had a bigger increase over the five years.

This is due to the fact that weekly employees used to forget about the practical side of life and work, that is to say they were on duty seven days a week. It was a vocation. But, today, coping with reality as well as their vocation demands that they receive a more appreciable income. The future outlook in this area is very uncertain. There is a definite shortage of qualified editorial personnel. Governments and several other organizations draw from our manpower resources, and in view of the financial position of the weekly, there is not much that can be done.

Secondly, though the work involved in a weekly is not excessive, it cannot be evaluated by the number of hours or set holidays. Events wait for no one; we have to be there and that is where the sense of vocation comes into it. We cannot have the same work contract as the big newspapers or other news media. As in the previous item, I don't think salaries should exceed approximately one-third of the paper's income.

As for item (c), administration, there has also been an appreciable increase over the past five years. I estimate this increase as being between 40 and 50 per cent, varying according to the region and the size of the paper. These increases are not due entirely to a rise in the items involved, but also to the new compulsory and voluntary security plan which we must offer our employees.

In reference to item (d), postage, most of the rural weeklies, about which I have been speaking, use the postal service. The increase in this field amounts to somewhere around 120 per cent. Since we have come to a hotly-debated subject, I would like to give my personal opinion concerning the postal rates.

I am totally against a free distribution by the Post Office or any other Government agency, for the good of the people, the country and us, the publishers. First of all, it insures the people against perverse or revolutionary literature which could benefit in many ways from a free distribution. For the publishers who are not too badly off financially speaking, but who are nevertheless hindered from offering their readers a more efficient service, well, it would mean a further reduction in revenue and as always, it would be the quality of the paper that suffers.

Without creating a monopoly, as radio has in various regions, postal rates give us at least a minimum of protection as a serious newspaper. On the other hand, the seriousness of our paper is guaranteed by the subscriptions which we require and which must be paid. However, due to the size of this country, it costs a lot to deliver to some of our fellow citizens. These are precisely the cases in which the federal administrators are called upon to establish a service to insure that distant regions pay the same communication costs as more thickly populated areas. Just in passing, it should be noted that these scattered peoples represent an active sector of our country and we need them.

Thus, it is clear that this is an indispensable service, the total cost of which must be paid for, as a simple increase in taxes if you like, since in the case of newspapers, it is always the Canadian people who end up paying. They will do so until such time as the price gets too high, and then it is the industry which is compromised. In my opinion, to want to erase a deficit in this public sector in order to have a balanced budget is purely a matter of personal satisfaction.

To return to the percentages for items (c) and (d), administration and distribution, a difference of between 26 and 28 per cent from the figures for business is generally accepted at present.

To sum up, and this is only an estimate, but I think there has been a general increase of between 55 and 60 per cent over the last five years. Furthermore, in most cases, the returns have not had the same increase. In this kind of situation, it is unfortunate that the content of the paper is almost always the first to suffer, and, consequently, the readers.

For several years now, influential people have been claiming that the printed word is on the way out. Facts prove the contrary. It remains to be seen whether people will accept these facts, or whether the facts were designed to protect personal interests or friends. I would be the first to applaud and extol the electronic press, which provides a vital service and entertainment in our day. However, the more the electronic press tries to orient us towards the world at large, the more remote from the individual it becomes. This is why the print media are still the more desirable. It is as if to say that for our own good, we should learn to live together and our leaders should learn to treat us as equals.

I would like to mention the one point, which in my opinion, could most help the weekly press. This is a complete revision of the policy for press releases by the government, industry and associations. The cost of composition, staff, and delivery of the releases is astronomical and, unfortunately, in spite of their interest, the majority of them end up in the waste-paper-basket because of a lack of funds on our part to publish them. We, the weeklies, are particularly affected in this situation. All kinds of pressures are used to get some free publicity out of us. I can assure you that the people who release these statements have our addresses, but, unfortunately, refuse to give them to the publicity departments, since they do not seem to be aware of us. It's the same with certain industries and most of the professional associations who draw up their own code of ethics when it comes to preventing their members from advertising while others of these same organizations inundate us with release to build up their own profession. Even if these release do contain some very useful information, the merchant, too, conveys an element of information in his advertisement, and yet he has to pay for his advertising. If we, the weeklies, are so close to our customers, then our obligations are all the greater, and all the more earnest. We simply ask to be allowed to give the public the kind of service they have a right to expect from us, while at the same time remaining a profitable industry in this country.

The Chairman: I must say, Mr. Rodrigue, may say for the benefit of Senators and others, it is now nine-twenty. I intend to adjourn this session at ten o'clock. I am going to now entertain comments which may be made at the microphones by individual members. I think Mr. McIntosh was going to start.

Mr. Irwin McIntosh: Mr. Chairman, my name is Irwin McIntosh, and I am the Managing Editor of the North Battleford News-Optimist in North Battleford, Saskatchewan, semi-weekly newspaper. I am the immediate past-president of the Canadian Weekly Newspaper Association.

I just wanted to say, in summation to some extent, Mr. Chairman, that you have seen here today the wide spectrum of opinion of publishers of Canada's weekly press.

I think we probably face in the weekly newspaper industry, the same things the farmers face in trying to have a national voice. As independent units, their opinion on various subjects differs very, very widely and I think you have seen to-day a wide spectrum of opinion on such things as a Press Council, editorial direction, government he to the weekly newspaper industry, or on selling national advertising; and I may say on that particular point that the Canadian Weekly Newspaper Association was the prime or one of the prime movers in forming Canadian advertising representatives and lost some fifteen thousand dollars of its very, very long-saved revenue or savings in that venture.

I was interested in Mr. Hacker's remarks in the view that he really said that what destroyed this national sales group was regional representation; and the fact that the B.C. group was one of the prime movers that decided that they would be better served on a regional basis.

This very independence may be viewed to many as a weakness of the weekly press. To me, however, Mr. Chairman, I view these differences as helping to make the weekly newspaper industry independent, and I submit to you a viable force in democracy as it flourishes from one coast to the other.

One concluding remark I would like to make is that we hear so much these days about Canadian content in radio and television. Our journals, sir, are completely Canadian content, and I think we should be very proud of this particular fact.

The Chairman: Thank you very much, Mr. McIntosh. Are there any other people who wish to speak? Mr. Calnan has spoken before. I will hear him again unless there are others. Mr. Calnan.

Mr. Calnan: Senator Davey, Honourable Senators and friends—we are talking now about disbursements.

Concerning postage, the new Postal Regulations have put a semi-weekly in the same position as a daily. They do not rank a semi-weekly as a semi-weekly. It's ranked as a daily now. The postage costs of the Pictou Gazette rose from $3,300 in 1968, to approximately $10,750 next year, which is up approximately $7,500 over two years.

If you happen to be unfortunate enough to have a mortgage, you are paying 9½ per cent interest now. If you are unfortunate enough to need working capital, you are paying 8 per cent interest now. I don't intend to disclose my own personal affairs, but I just state those facts.

If you are handling a payroll, you are acting as an unpaid employee of government administration. You are deducting income tax, Canada Pension contributions, Unemployment Insurance, Ontario Hospital Services Commission, OMSIP. Those are the compulsory deductions, and the employer is deducting them for the government without any compensation. All right.

Now, on salaries, there is a necessity I think every year, or if not every year, every two years, to consider relating the payroll to the increased cost and price of living, unless we can lick this inflation deal, which means they keep on going up. There is a limit, I believe, to the amount to which we can put our prices up; so the question of having a profit gets to be the important thing, a profit sufficient to retire a mortgage principal; a profit sufficient to retire a working capital loan and have the firm's own working capital; a profit sufficient to renew the plant by new equipment, which only can be bought out of profit; a profit sufficient to leave a net profit for a dividend to the shareholders. That is a more or less impossible situation with firms which are in debt at the present time.

Now, on top of that, we come to the White Paper. Formerly, those companies which made thirty-five thousand a year net profit were taxed at twenty-one per cent. Now the White Paper proposes to take fifty per cent. What chance is there for the small corporation to survive?

Thank you.

The Chairman: Are there other speakers, gentlemen?

Mr. Ernie Neufeld, Publisher, Weyburn Review, Weyburn, Saskatchewan: Honourable Senator Davey, Honourable Senators, ladies and gentlemen: I am Ernie Neufeld, Publisher of the Weyburn Review in Weyburn, Saskatchewan.

I have been a bit surprised that until the last few minutes all discussion and conjecture and planning for the future seems to have been done on the basis or on the supposition that things are going to go on as they have been before; yet as the previous speaker just mentioned, we are faced now with a White Paper which proposes to take over fifty per cent of corporations' profits.

Not very many years ago, we were facing annual payments on capital investment of close to $20,000 a year. On this sort of a situation, this would require about $40,000 net profit just to meet your commitments. True, there is depreciation, but let us suppose someone in a good-sized operation now decides to go offset and with the word "offset", let us talk about a $100,000 investment.

In five years at 20 per cent he has still only written off 70 per cent. He has paid for that equipment in most cases; so that's $30,000 profit, of which the government would want $15,000, or really, realistically, $60,000 profit just to meet that commitment. So this is the type of thing we are faced with if it goes through. I think that in all your planning you are not being very realistic unless you are facing the fact that something will have to be done about this. Thank you very much.

The Chairman: Thank you very much. Mr. Friesen?

Mr. Friesen: I have seen a number of proposals recently by advertising agencies to various firms, none of which contained any recommendations to put their ads into weekly newspapers, one particularly where the advertising agency knew that we were looking for provincial distribution of the message we wanted to put across, and the only thing that they suggested was daily newspapers in the City of Winnipeg, radio stations also in the city of Winnipeg, and national magazines, and I think this just reinforced...

The Chairman: Yes, you made the point that other media can't compete with the CBC. I think private radio and private television compete with the CBC in Winnipeg, for example, very successfully.

Mr. Friesen: Not at their rates.

The Chairman: Well, it's my understanding the private radio and private television in Winnipeg are quite successful.

Mr. Friesen: That is true, but they still cannot compete. They cannot give the type of advertising that the CBC does because the CBC has large amounts that private radio cannot spend for the type of advertising that is necessary.

The Chairman: And yet you said a moment or two ago in the course of your remarks, I believe you said that you would like to see the CBC provide the same service with no advertising.

Mr. Friesen: That's right. They are getting a subsidy from the government anyway, and I said that...

The Chairman: You would increase the subsidy?

Mr. Friesen: Yes, you could increase the subsidy, but I said no advertising at the local level and provincial level because I can understand that at the national level, this may not be possible.

The Chairman: I am not sure I understand you.

Mr. Friesen: Well, there are national things that have to be run on a national level like the Olympic Games where they sell a certain amount or where it will be sponsored by certain advertisers to pay for some of the costs of these programmes.

The Chairman: Well, Mr. Willis, I know, wants to say something, but I think that perhaps we should go to Mr. Derkson now.

Mr. George Derkson, Editor, Estevan Mercury, Estevan, Saskatchewan: Mr. Chairman, in the closing remarks, Mr. Willis mentioned his fear of the dominance of the chain, and I am sure that if the chains were represented here that they would say that they would welcome competition because the readers of the new papers would benefit from the competition, and the advertiser would benefit from the competition. But in fact, there is a lot of pressure brought on in the community other than in competition; rate cutting for example, instead of trying to improve the product.

Now, in our city, we have an underground newspaper. It's published by some very bright young people in both high schools. Now, these kids do everything in the paper from soup to nuts, from the actual production on a ditto machine to distribution. Now, these are bright kids, and they have different viewpoints and our world is changing. These kids are either going to merge with the present society or they are going to divide with it.

Now, if the existing press will compete with those kids in their news coverage rather than bringing pressure in the community to have their paper stifled, I think society will benefit. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: Thank you. Mr. Willis?

Mr. Willis: I am afraid I am going to sound like a fifth columnist, but actually I am just changing hats.

Before I got bitten by the bug of being a weekly newspaper publisher ten years ago, was an agency account executive and I have also, for a good many years, been the advertising and public relations manager for a large national industry.

I would like to say a word on behalf of the wicked agencies. I don't think much of the agencies. I think they are stupid. I think they are narrow. I think that their media people are grossly overworked, and grossly under-trained. But there are some cold, hard facts which both the agency and the advertiser have to take into account, and which, if I may take the liberty, Mr. Chairman, of mentioning, should be considered by every weekly publisher.

In the first place, it costs about five dollars—it may now be more—to process one insertion order. Now, when you think of your own national rates, do you think honestly and conscientiously of the size advertisement which will do a job in your paper?

Now, you don't need a half-page ad. in the ordinary weekly. Now, I am not talking about the big weekly. There has been a lot of talk here about the big weekly, the sixteen-page, five thousand or up circulation weekly. But it's the little weekly, the small ones, fifteen hundred to three thousand, who are predominantly in this country. They are the ones who reach into the grass roots and where in many cases they get the greatest maximum value for investment by the national advertisers. Now, I know this.

When I was national advertising manager for a certain large company, with the permission of the President and over—I would say—the dead bodies of the agencies' people, we ran a series of advertisements in all weeklies of fifteen hundred and up across Canada, and the measurable sales of products, within three weeks of placing those advertisements, went up six per cent. It was repeated again the next month, and they went up another six per cent. At that time, I wasn't happy with the situation, and I went over to the agency field.

The agency, which we won't mention, sold the company and the Chairman of the Board on the fact that four-colour pictures with pretty models was far more in keeping with the dignity of the company, and the president would be able to boast about it at his club which he did, and sales went down twenty per cent.

Now, the point is that it costs the agencies money, and in spite of the statement made here by an earlier speaker, we act in some ways as an advertising agency, and we know that the papers we deal with can't even get an invoice made out correctly, and my friends in the agency field—we know that the agencies aren't putting them in.

I bought weeklies for ten years in agency. ABC means nothing. It's the quality of the paper that counts. You can have the louisiest paper that was ever produced, with the poorest advertising, the poorest editorial, the poorest news, and so help me, the mystique, the worship of ABC makes people buy it. A first-class paper, they don't.

Now, we have tried this. We have done it by actual experiment, and we know it is the quality of the paper that counts. Actually, to put it bluntly, who in the world cares whether the paper has 3,448 or 3,600 circulation. You are buying a market. You are not buying circulation.

I want to say flatly now, as an advertising man, as a national advertising manager, as a weekly publisher, the whole question of circulation has got to be related to the quality of the paper; and it's got to be a measure of quality before we are going to be able to sell advertising agencies on the fact that weeklies are worth having. It's the poor quality of the weekly. It's the lack of proof that they are doing the job, not some mystic figure, that is going to bring business to the weekly press, and we know from our own experience that if you go out to industries for direct mail, and you sell your product, you get national advertising. We do.

The Chairman: Thank you, Mr. Willis.

Mr. J. L. McKenna, Kings County Record, Sussex, New Brunswick: Louis McKenna, Kings County Record, Sussex: I am thinking of the previous speaker. You were talking about underground or the newspapers by kids and so forth.

The Chairman: The next previous speaker, yes.

Mr. McKenna: Now, I am just wondering—I don't know. I had an experience last Saturday morning. I was called out, and I wasn't even a member of this organization. I was called out to arbitrate something that was going on there. This was settled quite successfully, and I am just wondering on this point: how many of us really take the interest in kids that we should be taking?

I think they talk about a communications gap—I think we can communicate if we try, and I think it's very important that we do try. As I say, I am not even a member of this organization, but in fifteen minutes we got things straightened out.

Do we work at this? Should we work at this? I feel we should.

The Chairman: Thank you. Are there other speakers at any of the microphones? Yes.

Mr. Dan Barr, Independent Sales Agent: Thank you very much, Senator. Dan Barr, independent sales agent for newspapers, formerly with the 'Woodstock Bugle Times-Gazette'. I would just like to point out one thing that Mr. Willis said. Agencies are buying a market. That's straight—a market. They are not buying your circulation. They are buying a market in which you are producing your newspaper; therefore, you should be covering the market.

What I want to point to now is the rate cards that just about everybody produces. On the front of it, it states that you publish on Thursday. It gives local rates or national rates; whether you give colour, et cetera. On the back, it tells who publishes the paper. It's very nice, and all the rest of it. It says what your circulation is; what your population in the area is; and it says that you have hospitals and so forth and so on, and lists your big industries. It does not give any information whatsoever about your market.

Now, your market is not only necessary to your national advertiser but also to your local advertiser. By making up a decent presentation of what the market can do and what it is, and being able to present this via a salesman, not waiting for the man to come in to the office to buy the space, but getting out and selling it to him, with a decent presentation, you can increase your sales to both the national and the local merchants. All I want to say is: what you do need is to get out and sell your product, and if you can't sell it, don't expect other people to come into the store and buy it because this is not a market in which people come in and shop. You do have to get out and sell. Thank you very much.

The Chairman: Senator McElman, I think, wants to say something or ask the question perhaps. Are you asking the gentleman who was just speaking?

Senator McElman: In general.

The Chairman: Oh, a general question—thank you.

Senator McElman: There have been numerous references to Mr. Benson, the White Paper and Income Tax law in general, but they have been voices of general complaint. It's well-understood, I believe, that the White Paper approach is rather unique in the income tax field in Canada, and that Mr. Benson has asked for constructive proposals on how to improve it.

Has the CWNA made suggestions, or proposals of any nature to Mr. Benson with respect to the White Paper propositions?

The Chairman: I wonder if there is a representative here. Mr. McLean, you might know. I am sorry. Mr. Craven, the President is there. I didn't see him. Could you answer Senator McElman's question Mr. Craven?

Mr. Craven: Mr. McLean is the Chairman of the Parliamentary Committee, I suppose.

The Chairman: I think that's what I call passing the buck.

Mr. Andrew Y. McLean: Senator Davey, and Honourable Senators:—the CWNA has not considered this in the full context of the White Paper.

Individual publishers perhaps have indicated an opinion. I think the attitude of the CWNA—and this could well be discussed at this first Directors' meeting since the paper has become a reality. The attitude of the individual publishers reflected their personal opinions, and I am not aware of any formal representations having been made by any individual publishers to the Association as such with a request that there be a formal presentation made.

The recognition has been of the preliminary nature, as it were of the paper.

The Chairman: Senator McElman, do you wish to pursue that?

Senator McElman: Yes, and I simply would like to ask:—is it not a sensible thing that the CWNA get...

The Chairman: Well, I think in fairness, Mr. McLean says it is. I think he agrees with you.

Senator McElman: On postal rates, I think we have heard a good deal of discussion about this. Surely these aren't the only increased costs that the weeklies have faced in recent years:—salaries, wages, newsprint costs, material of all kinds, ink, equipment. I think someone referred to exorbitant bank rates. Are these editorialized on and pushed with the similar emphasis as has been done with postal rates?

The Chairman: Who are you putting the to?

Senator McElman: In general, the panelists.

The Chairman: Mr. Friesen, do you want to answer that question or could you?

Mr. Friesen: I have pointed out as far as the paid subscription newspapers are concerned, the rates have not gone up that much, although there is another increase coming.

I was talking about some of the increases in some of the other media such as magazines and free circulation papers that have gone up very substantially, more so than possibly the machinery and other increases that the publisher has to face.

Was that the question, or is there another one that you...

Senator McElman: I was asking if the newspapers have pressed editorially and otherwise their criticism of these increases in their costs with similar emphasis to what they have done with postal rates.

Mr. Friesen: Well, I think they have. I think in general the newspapers have belaboured the high costs—the high interest costs for instance, and we have had editorials on the White Paper as well, and I know that many individual publishers through other organizations have made representations to Mr. Benson on these costs, but we are talking in the weekly field about two different facets. One is the rural press and one is the suburban press, and these are two different facets. These publishers face these problems in a different manner.

For instance, we are a country newspaper. We deliver our paper to the surrounding post offices who just insert them into the mailboxes, and it costs the post office really nothing to distribute our newspapers. Still we pay the same costs as we would have if we mailed it from our own post office; whereas in the cases of other mail, for instance, other second-class matter delivered in urban areas—there is a large cost to the post office of the house-to-house delivery that they have to make not only the Canadian publications, but also American and foreign publications coming in, which practically break the back of our mail carriers.

Senator McElman: Mr. Kierans has suggested that taking this second-class mail, the newspaper aspect of it, as a whole, and we have heard this same complaint from dailies and all elements of the print media—that the newspapers are paying approximately twenty per cent of the cost to the post office department.

This represents, if he is accurate to any degree at all, a pretty substantial subsidy. I was wondering how you would relate this to the constant references to the subsidization of the CBC.

The Chairman: Who are you putting that to?

Senator McElman: Again, anyone who cares to answer.

The Chairman: Well, we might ask you to put it to one of the panelists or if any of the gentlemen at the microphones want to answer it. Well, once again, you have been talking to Senator McElman, Mr. Friesen. I don't want to put you on the spot, but could you answer that? I think perhaps you were the person who was talking about it in your brief.

Senator McElman: Is it suggested that they are being charged too much of the cost to pay twenty per cent?

Mr. Friesen: No, I don't think so. I said in my report that I wasn't too concerned about the increased costs that the paid subscription weekly newspapers are paying. It is the suburban weeklies, if they were using the post office, that would carry the large part of the cost. But this whole matter is not broken down, I don't think, enough by the post office to say where their increased costs are; whether they are with the rural weekly or the suburban weeklies or the free circulation newspapers or whether it's second-class matter of all kinds.

Now, magazines, for instance, might weigh one or two pounds and cost a lot more to distribute than a newspaper does; whereas the return to the post office is relative to what the weekly newspaper costs of distribution are.

Senator McElman: Mr. Kierans at one point—correct me, Mr. Chairman, if I am wrong, suggested the establishment of some kind of a fund that might be offered by government and distributed by the industry to those who were being charged or considered to be charged unnecessarily or to the point where they might be losing money.

Would you section of the industry find such a subsidy, if you will, offensive? What would you think of this proposition?

The Chairman: Perhaps we could put that to Mr. Dunning.

Mr. Dunning: No, I don't think I would like to answer that.

The Chairman: You wouldn't care to comment? Anyone care to comment on that?

From the floor: Yes, I would like to.

The Chairman: All right, before you do, I am going to say it's the last call.

If there is anybody else who does want to speak, please do go to the microphones. I don't want to limit discussion, but I think it is perhaps time to wind things up and call it an evening. Yes, Sir?

Mr. Gorge Cadogan, Editor, 'Pictou Advocate', Pictou, Nova Scotia: Senator Davey and Honourable Senators: George Cadogan, Pictou Advocate Pictou, Nova Scotia. I think one of the reasons there's a kind of resentment against some of the actions of the government, particularly the postal department, is because it seems that over the years, the Federal Government has bent over backwards to cater to the Americans.

Now, a few years ago, there was a Commission regarding publications and the complaints went in about the special privileges given to Reader's Digest and Time Magazine, and instead of doing anything about it, the government simply confirmed the special privileges for these two magazines, and now they are getting more advertising revenue than all the Canadian magazines combined.

Now, if we had freedom of the press in this country, there is one way this could be overcome, if enough of us would just subscribe to the home editions of these two magazines, but that is not permitted, and the Canadian government—

The Chairman: Now, wait a moment. Just a moment—what do you mean by the "home edition"?

Mr. Cadogan: The American editions—you cannot subscribe to the American edition of Time or Reader's Digest.

The Chairman: I don't think you are right.

Mr. Cadogan: Well, I know I am right because I have written.

The Chairman: They wouldn't send you a copy?

Mr. Cadogan: No, they will not, no, and as I say, the Canadian Government will do nothing about this. The Commission before would do nothing about it.

The Chairman: Well, let me ask you this: do you think that our Committee should recommend something be done?

Mr. Cadogan: Yes, I do.

The Chairman: Specifically, are you aware that the Canadian magazine industry came before our Committee and said that it would destroy them if we made that recommendation and it was carried out? To MacLean-Hunter Limited and all of the other Canadian magazines who came before this Committee, we put the question I have just put to you—they all said. "No".

Mr. Cadogan: I am aware they said that, but I simply don't believe it, and if they don't want the advertising revenue, there is another print media, the weekly newspapers, that would be glad to take it up.

The Chairman: Were there other things you wanted to say? No—thank you. Thank you very much, sir.

Mr. George Baker, Publisher 'Kentville Advertiser', Kentville, Nova Scotia: Honourable Senators: George Baker, 'Kentville Advertiser', Kentville, Nova Scotia. I just wanted to make one brief remark in response to a question that Senator McElman asked.

He asked if we were making the same sort of editorial comment on other costs, such as the rise in the cost of newsprint, the rise of the bank rate, and so one and so forth. I would just like to say that in my part of the country in the last six years, newsprint prices have up from $133 a ton to $140 a ton,—less than 1 per cent per year.

The bank rate has gone up more than that, perhaps 30 per cent, and I think everybody knows perhaps because of inflation, postal costs have not gone up on the same gradual trend at all.

Now, it may be true that the rates offered to weekly newspapers are subsidized rates, and if so, I personally would be against it, but I do feel that the Post Office Department is in no position to say what its costs are, and I agree with the panelist tonight. As far as other postal rates are concerned, they are pretty serious.

I happen to print a fair amount of direct mail advertising, and I might say that for something printed on newsprint, the logs can be cut and turned into newspaper, shipped from Corner Brook, Newfoundland to Nova Scotia. I can make up some direct advertising material; place it; put it on the press; print it; sort it for the Post Office; do half their work; and then they take three times as much to get it to the addressee as all the rest of us in that chain have taken to do our work.

The Chairman: Thank you. Senator McElman—

Senator McElman: There has been testimony before the Committee that the Government subsidy is a grave threat to freedom of the press.

Now, I think most will agree that there is a heavy element of subsidy in postal rates, a special consideration.

Would the President of CWNA perhaps comment on this question or the other gentleman who spoke in his behalf? Would you consider that the newspaper industry, including your section of it, receives a similar special consideration with respect to Estate Tax laws or Income Tax Laws?

Mr. Roy Farran, 'North Hill News', Alberta: Mr. Chairman, could I ask a question?

The Chairman: Of Senator McElman?

Mr. Farran: Yes.

The Chairman: Well, I don't think Senator McElman is the witness.

Mr. Farran: Well, I put my comment myself. Are we all sure that this really is a subsidy and that it's not in the nature of a factory filler, similar to the discussion we had a short time ago about newspaper machinery or printing one day of the week and filling it for the rest of the week?

I don't believe the Post Office plant can work on first-class mail alone. When the postman goes to the door, he might as well carry me cut-price mail as well, and that until it is demonstrated to me that this factory filler is being heavily subsidized, I am not convinced.

Senator McElman: Let's get away from that. There's no point in you and I arguing whether you are subsidized on post office rates. I think that's pretty well discussed and established. Would you suggest that your industry receive any special consideration in Estate Tax Laws or Income Tax Laws or be treated the same as any other industry, small or otherwise?

The Chairman: Mr. Farran.

Mr. Farran: I think they should be treated the same as other Canadians. I believe that small business should still have the old provision of about twenty-three per cent. Income Tax up to a thirty-five thousand dollar profit level and then fifty per cent thereafter, but I don't believe there should be any special deals for publishers as opposed to other businessmen.

Senator McElman: Would there be any—Mr. Chairman,—contrary view to that amongst those who are here representing the weeklies?

The Chairman: Mr. MacIntosh.

Mr. MacIntosh: Mr. Chairman, I would just like to make a comment. The Post Office treat various weeklies in different regards; for example, among the smaller weeklies under ten thousand population, there is a free distribution zone. This has been traditional in Canada since Confederation to encourage smaller publications, and I think you have had adequate knowledge here today to show why that might be necessary.

Now, in my particular community where we are above twelve thousand people, and we are more than once a week, we are treated as a daily newspaper.

There is one difference between an urban paper and a rural paper. No urban paper depends on the Post Office for distribution. A newspaper in my category, for example, doesn't depend on the newspaper to distribute its material in its urban community, but more than half of our circulation is rural, and there is no alternative than in Saskatchewan and the West where our trading areas are big and the population small, to the Post office doing this type of work, but our contention is very much that which you, I am sure, heard from the 'Winnipeg Free Press', is that we do an awful lot of the work. Our readers come to the Post Office to pick up their mail, contrary to the point in an urban community where you deliver the mail to the door, and your costs, I would assume, must be higher than they are in our regard.

The Chairman: Thank you, Mr. MacIntosh. I am going to turn to the final speaker, the gentleman who has the microphone.

Mr. Frank Withers, 'Bugle Gazette-Times', Woodstock, New Brunswick: Frank Withers, 'Bugle Gazette-Times': what I am going to say, I think has something to do with money, In fact, I am quite sure it does.

As I understand it, the object of the exercise in calling this hearing was to look into the quality and the possibility of operating and the quality of news and news coverage, and I wonder if it cannot too solve some of our personal business problems.

The Chairman: I think if I may say, I think the purpose of the study is—as has been stated—the ownership and control and the impact and the influence of the mass media in Canada, and I agree certainly in the immediate instance, our prime concern is not the financial problems of any particular branch of the media. If you are saying that, I agree with you, yes.

Mr. Withers: That is about what I think. In this respect, I wonder...

The Chairman: Excuse me, but obviously if this is a matter of concern within any branch of the media, then it has to be a matter of concern to this Committee. Sorry, carry on.

Mr. Withers: The only thing I was going to say on this point was that it's been suggested several times that the CWNA should be selling advertising for us, but I would really question that. That is not the purpose for which I would join any Association, and I would just leave the idea that possibly this is the place to start this proposed press council; that the CWNA might, in fact, comment publicly on whether I plant my news, whether or not I cater to certain customers and whether I am doing my job as a newsman on that paper.

Thank you.

The Chairman: Well, I see Mrs. Murray wants to make a statement. Mrs. Murray, a short statement I will accept.

Mrs. Margaret Murray, Publisher, 'North Vancouver Citizen': Yes, a little sort of a benediction.

The Chairman: All right.

Mrs. Murray: And just a little bit of a comment—now, all day long, I have heard about costs and costs and costs, and I was sorry to see—don't go, Harry! This is good for you to hear it. I was sorry to hear the disgruntled dissatisfaction people take about putting in a little mark about this White Paper.

Now, I don't know Mr. Benson from a pile of hay, but I have seen two complete wars start and finish in Canada in my fifty-seven years here, and every time there is a war declared, there wasn't half as much money for people to dig down in their pockets and sacrifice for when another country was in trouble, and Canada was called upon to go and help. Today, my friends, Canada is in trouble, Canada is in serious trouble, and if Canada in 1910 owed the United States nine billion dollars at one time. Old Pierpoint Morgan would have served the Blue Paper on you, and he would have come over here, and he would have made you pay up or he would be taking over your country. And when the same world war came, we were just getting out of the First World War and God knows we hadn't the money to dig down and fight another war. Who was behind the war? Who were the people who called the people to arms? Who supported the government when they declared war in September of 1939, your newspapers and you know what, it was. And I am very hurt to sit here and see this fine bunch of men and women groan with a little satisfaction when there is a knock on the door.

You got to cinch in your belt and you got to make a sacrifice out of your profits to help Canada out of the trouble that it's in today.

My friends, our country has its back up against the wall, and in God's name, instead of knocking the White Paper and knocking poor Benson who's an accountant and must know what he's doing and knocking those Members of Parliament whom we elected and sent down there and being opposed to them, in God's name, hop on the bandwagon. Pay they ask of you to do, and do it in the name of Liberty and Freedom, and good night and what you got to pay. Make the sacrifice that God bless you all!

The Chairman: Thank you very much. Well, Senators and ladies and gentlemen, perhaps I could just sum the day up in this way—it has not been our intention at all to be critical of the C.W.N.A. and Les Hebdoms or individual weekly publishers. If, indeed, it has appeared, for example, that we would propel the C.W.N.A. into the advertising sales business, then I can apologize. That has not been our intention.

It's been our intention to listen to you rather than have you listen to us. Indeed, I can think of no better way of summing up than repeating some of the things I said at the convention in Halifax. I hauled out a page and a half of notes, and they are very brief and to the point, and I think relevant.

I pointed out then that the weekly newspapers in Canada, and I point out now, are a national institution in a country which, I think, as Mr. McIntosh said, or was indicating, has too few national institutions.

Not only is foreign ownership or foreign control a problem, but indeed we have the exact opposite side of the coin with the weeklies. You people are unabashedly Canadian. I said in August in Halifax and I say it again now—Amen! Far from being concentrated, your ownership represents the broadest possible spectrum of free-thinking individualism. I think we have had that demonstrated again here today.

I think it's fair to say that your prime interest is serving the public interest in your community, and I think one of your greatest advantages and perhaps your operative advantages as opposed to television's and the big city daily's is that certainly you are the most immediate, the most direct, and the first link with the homes and families of the nation.

I think these days also you are, as I said at the beginning, to what you said earlier—beginning to attract more and better young people.

I think your graphic designs and standards are improving dramatically. I think this is all in all really a relatively glowing picture, but indeed again, as I said in Halifax, as a student of publishing in Canada, it occurs to me that as a group, the journals and the publications—that I think more of the publishers of the weekly newspapers in this country than apparently the publishers of the weekly newspapers think of politicians.

Notwithstanding all of these things, I think it is also apparent from our discussion today that you do have some serious problems.

I think the discussion has been most helpful and I think you realize that you form a valuable part of the record.

When you leave here this evening—if when you get back to your many other thoughts, you have thoughts which you think would appeal to us, then please believe me, more than just as a trite invitation, I would urge you to send us your views and send them to us privately and confidentially and of course, we would be most interested; so I want to say to all the people who have participated today, and for each of those who have not, that it has been a useful day from our point of view, and thank you for coming. Thank you for participating.

The Committee adjourned at 10.05 p.m.

SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE ON MASS MEDIA

EVIDENCE

Ottawa, Thursday, March 12, 1970.

The Special Senate Committee on Mass Media met this day at 10:00 a.m.

Senator Keith Davey (Chairman) in the Chair.

The Chairman: Honourable Senators, ladies and gentlemen. This morning and this afternoon we are receiving a brief, from the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

I should perhaps repeat the announcement I made last evening and that is that the session with the CBC originally scheduled for eight o'clock this evening has been cancelled because of the fact that this is budget night, but we will be dealing with the CBC this morning and this afternoon.

If we find it necessary to make this evening's session up by asking the representatives of the Corporation back, I am sure, without asking them, they would be more than willing to oblige.

Sitting on my right, as I am sure you know, is the president of the CBC Dr. George Davidson. I will in a moment or two, ask Mr. Davidson to introduce his colleagues from the Corporation. Perhaps before doing that, may I say that the brief that the Committee requested was received three weeks in advance in compliance with the guidelines. The brief has been circulated to the Senators. It has been studied, I know, by some of them.

The procedure here is to allow you, Mr. Davidson, to make a 10, 12 or 15 minute opening statement in which you can explain our brief, amplify it, add to it, take away from it or say anything else that may be on our mind or indeed in your heart. Following that we would like to turn to the questioning and question you on the brief, on your oral statements and there may well be questions on matters which are not raised.

Good morning and welcome. Perhaps you would introduce your colleagues first.

tor Davey. Ladies and gentlemen, I would like first of all to express the appreciation of the Corporation for the opportunity that has been given to it to appear before the Special Senate Committee on Mass Media. I would like to begin by expressing a hope that the appearance of the CBC this morning, being, I believe, the first appearance of any broadcaster as such, before the Special Senate Committee, that this represents a transition on the part of the Committee from the underground in which you have been dwelling to the high sierras of the broadcasting world.

We deal in the air. We deal with the people's air and it is therefore perhaps appropriate one should mark the transition in the way I attempted to do.

I would like to begin by introducing my colleagues who have come with me to give as much in the way of help and information to the Members of the Committee as possible. On my immediate right is the Executive Vice-President of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, Monsieur Laurent Picard who took office as Executive Vice-President on the 1st of February 1968, the same day I took over my responsibilities as President of the Corporation.

We have brought along with us the officers of the two language networks in the persons of Mr. Eugene Hallman on your immediate left, Mr. Chairman. Eugene Hallman is the Vice-President and General Manager of the English network broadcasting with headquarters located in Toronto.

On his immediate left is our Vice-Chairman and General Manager of the French language network broadcasting with headquarters in Montreal in the person of Mr. Raymond David.

These two gentlemen, I think, more than anyone else in the Corporation bear the primary responsibility for the broadcast service that goes out to the Canadian public in our two official languages.

We have also thought it appropriate to bring with us, in view of the concern of the Special Senate Committee with the field of news, public affairs, information generally, to assist in presenting this testimony the heads of the information services in the two network centres in the persons of Mr. Knowlton Nash, Director of Information Programs for the English Network and Mr. Marc Thibault, Director of News and Public Affairs for the French Networks.

These four gentlemen who I have mentioned will assist Mr. Picard and myself in whatever extent may be required in the replies to questions that the Honourable Senators may wish to put to us.

We have also a number of other senior officers of the Corporation here. These will be available for supplying supplementary information, if that is required, and I mention in particular Mr. Ron Fraser, who is our vice-président of Corporate Affairs concerned with the relationship between the Corporation and permitting bodies in the community at large, including the CRTC, the various bodies representing the House of Commons and the Senate and so on.

I think with these introductions, Mr. Chairman, I will now proceed, if I may with your permission, to say a very brief word in supplementation of the brief which we have presented to you.

I do not propose to speak to the context of the brief because I think the brief in a large part speaks for itself. The Members of the Committee have had it in their hands for some time and I think it will save time if I leave it to your counsel and to the Members of the Committee to raise out of the brief what issues they think are raised in the brief.

I would merely like to depict for you in a very brief fashion at the outset the nature of the organization from whom you will be hearing testimony this morning.

You are concerned, among other things, Mr. Chairman and ladies and gentlemen, with the question of multiple ownership. I suppose from one point of view it could be said that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is the prime example of multiple ownership of broadcasting outlets in Canada.

We own and operate a considerable number of radio and television stations. To refresh your minds on the number involved, we own and operate 27 stations which we own in the English language across Canada and seven French language stations. These are in the field of AM. We own and operate six FM stations in addition to that as well as five short-wave broadcasting outlets for a total of 45 owned and operated radio outlets in the country as a whole.

In addition to that we own and operate 12 English and five French language television stations for a total of 17.

Now, if any private broadcaster were to come before this Committee with that kind of a broadcasting complex under his ownership and control, I think the Members of the Committee might quickly recognize that this is a fine example of a concentration of broadcasting entities in the hands of a single entrepreneur that might illustrate the problem with which you are concerned.

I will leave it to the questioning at a later date to bring out whether or not in the mind of the Corporation and in the minds of the Members of the Senate Committee this represents quite the same kind of problem when it is concentrated in the hands of a public broadcasting entity set up by parliament, as it might represent if it were a comparable complex held in the hands of private entrepreneurs.

The Corporation is a multiple organization in more ways than one. There is a tendency, I feel in the country at large to think of the Corporation in terms of the use that the individual viewer makes of the Corporation and since the individual viewer is usually an Anglophone who watches English television or a Francophone who watches French Television, it does not always occur to the viewer or the listener to radio that the Corporation is a multiple complex organization providing no less than nine different kinds of services simultaneously to the people of Canada and to the people who are interested in Canada outside the boundaries of our country.

We have, for example, an English language television service operating from coast to coast over the longest micro-wave network in the world. We have also operating at the same time a full time French language television service which we call a nation-wide service, but it is not truly nation-wide, I have to say, in the same sense that the English language service is truly nation-wide. It is not truly nation-wide because we have not yet been able to develop the complete network facilities to ensure network broadcasting or microwave links simultaneously from one end of this country to the other.

We have a micro-wave net that covers the portion of Canada from the Atlantic to Sturgeon Falls in North Western Ontario. We have also a number of outposts, French language broadcasting television and radio stations in Western Canada at Winnipeg.

I am happy to say that we have had a very successful opening on Tuesday night of the new French language television station in Edmonton but these are not hooked up to the network by micro-wave and they still represent a partial effort to provide services to the French speaking communities of Western Canada which lacks the completeness that we are able to provide for those that are fortunate enough to live in the Central and Eastern parts of the country.

But here we have two services, the English language television service and the French language television service. In addition to these we have English language AM services provided on a coast to coast basis and a French language AM radio service, making four separate services altogether.

We have a nucleus, a cluster of FM stations, six in number, which we cannot say represents a complete nation-wide service but which does represent a distinctive and different kind of service which we are developing. We have in addition to those five services our short-wave service overseas in which we broadcast in 11 different languages to 26 different countries.

We have our services to the armed forces overseas which we provide in a manner that is not duplicated by any other broadcasting entities operating in Canada and we have a very important final service, the Northern service by which we broadcast in short-wave to people in the Northern parts of Canada and people living in the high Arctic.

I mention these separate services, ladies and gentlemen, in order that you will have some better comprehension, I would hope, of what it is that goes into the expenditure of 166 million which is provided by the Parliament of Canada to ensure the provision of broadcasting services to the people of Canada through the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

There is a tendency on the part of all of us to think in terms of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as one network and CTV as another network and this ready comparison fails to take account of the fact that the CBC does more than an English language network serving 14 Metropolitan communities in the way that CTV does.

We have these obligations to provide these other services. These other services cost substantial amounts of money. For example, our total radio service costs something in the neighbourhood of $35 million a year to operate. This is a part of our total budget and this accounts for the fact that our requirements from Parliament are as large as they are.

This will give you some idea of the complexity of the organization, of the variety of services we are trying to provide and there is material that has been presented to the Committee, I believe—am I right, Mr. Chairman, this document, "CBC Facts and Figures", has been presented to the Committee.

The Chairman: Yes.

Mr. Davidson: This document will give you in much greater detail the true complexity of the structure and the organization of the Corporation.

Can I just say one final point before I complete my opening remarks? The Corporation has in recent years been operating on the basis of an English language network broadcasting service and a French language network broadcasting service and a regional broadcasting service and this has been for the purposes of ensuring that there has been a development of regional broadcasting services through our regional centres of production in a way that is called for and contemplated by the provisions of the Broadcasting Act.

We are now in the process of restructuring and, hopefully, simplifying some of the complexities of the organization that have resulted from separating the regional broadcasting operations from the two network broadcasting operations.

Frankly the organizational pattern that has existed up to the present time has resulted in some divided jurisdiction and some problems arising as a result of that divided jurisdiction. We have decided that the sensible thing to do, which will simplify and clarify the lines of responsibility, is to structure the corporation on the basis of the two language broadcasting systems and we are therefore now in the process of merging our regional broadcasting entities into our two language broadcasting systems. When this change-over is complete, we will have two language broadcasting systems one of them under the direction of Mr. Hallman operating out of Toronto and the other one under the direction of Mr. David operating out of Montreal.

The result of this change, when it takes place, will mean that our Vancouver French language radio station, instead of being the responsibility of the regional broadcasting entity in British Columbia, which is overwhelmingly Anglophone and which understandably sees the French language radio station there as a relatively small entity in a much larger complex of broadcasting apparatus. The French language radio station in Vancouver will under the new arrangement become the direct responsibility, operationally, programwise and in every respect, of the French language broadcasting system with headquarters in Montreal.

This will be true of the Edmonton television station and it will be true of the Winnipeg television station in the French language. Per contra the responsibility for all CBM and CBMT the English language radio and television stations in Montreal, which at the present time form part of the Quebec division and are the responsibility of Mr. David, then will become part of the English language broadcasting system and will fall under the direct control and responsibility of Mr. Hallman. In this way we think the lines of responsibility will be simplified and clarified, and we hope as a result of that some of the confusion which sometimes surrounds the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation may be dissipated.

With this in the way of a brief statement as to the nature and structure of the organization with which you will be dealing, Mr. Chairman, I think the best thing I can do now is to turn matters back to you and to say that we will all do our best to answer the questions that are raised with respect to the brief we have presented to the Committee and we hope we will be able to also successfully deal with any other questions that Members of the Committee may have in mind.

The Chairman: Mr. Davidson, may I thank you for a helpful statement and may I also compliment you on the quality of your brief. I am sure there are questions both on the brief and on the statement. I think we will start with Mr. Fortier.

Mr. Fortier: Thank you, Mr. Chairman, tonight is budget night and this morning we look at a part of the budget, I guess, Mr. Davidson.

You gave a few hours to a Mr. Blackburn who writes for the Toronto Telegram shortly before leaving Edmonton. After this interview with you he wrote a column which I am sure you must have seen as you were winging your way back from Edmonton. If you did not, I will read part of his column and I will ask you for your comments.

He says "I have not spotted anyone who has kept his cool better than George Davidson, President of the CBC."

Mr. Davidson: Keeping his school?

Mr. Fortier: "Keeping his cool". And he says "Mr. Davidson right now is perhaps the most beleaguered of broadcasters." I will talk more about that later. And then he goes on to recite some of your intentions—at least he makes them out to be so.

He says "The CBC is thinking of dropping the late movie on the CBC stations".

Then he goes on:

"Maybe they will drop a vice-president."

So as to save us some of the questions that the Senators may have intended to ask, would you tell us which one is to be dropped?

Mr. Davidson: If he is here, he will not answer. Maybe that question is just for starters. The word "vice" was misplaced there. He was speaking of dropping a president.

Mr. Fortier: You mean you have had it?

Mr. Davidson: No, no. I have enjoyed this experience as I have enjoyed few experiences in my years in the public service and Mr. Blackburn's question I do not propose to answer directly at this particular juncture.

Mr. Blackburn was asking me how far up the line our current austerity would operate and how far up the line our establishment reductions would operate because we are in the process, as a result of the budget freeze in effecting establishment reductions.

I said that there was no arbitrary limit to the levels at which the establishment cuts, by decree, would stop, that they could rise as the way up to and include vice-presidents, the circumstances required.

I hope that will allay some of the fears on your part as well as some of the fears on the part of our vice-presidents.

Mr. Fortier: You have been president, Mr. Davidson, of this very important crown corporation for some two years now. Have you found it difficult, as head of a crown corporation, to build your own team?

Mr. Davidson: One always has the experience of moving into a situation where you are taking on an on-going organization, one has the problem of trying to determine what parts of that organization need maintenance, retention and what parts need renewal. This is structurally the case and one never has the same free hand that one has in beginning from the beginning to build a brand new organization.

I had the experience back in 1944 when family allowances were inaugurated and when the Department of National Health and Welfare was created, of building the welfare half of that department from zero. There was not a single employee in that organization when I began to build and therefore one has relatively complete freedom of choice in the selection of personnel. One does not have to live with the mistakes of the past. One makes one's own mistakes and the result is, in many ways, it is an easier initial enterprise.

Senator Beaubien: How many employees has it got now, Mr. Davidson?

Mr. Davidson: I do not know how many it had but it had a remarkably good record, Senator Beaubien, of a small number of employees in the years up till 1960 when I left there.

I think there were about 867 employees with family allowances across the country, a remarkably small number with a remarkable small percentage of the administration cost.

Now, by contrast on taking over the presidency of the Corporation I found an on-going organization, already structured, already manned with personnel, some 9000 personnel in all and Mr. Picard and I were the only two newcomers. We have had to make our assessment of the need for structural change and also of the need for personnel change.

There has been, I can say, a very substantial reallocation of functions structurally and reassignment of personnel of very significant degree in the two years we have been responsible for it.

Mr. Fortier: Have you been able to go outside the confines of the CBC itself or the Corporation to pick and choose men or women whom you consider fit and proper persons?

Mr. Davidson: There has been no obstacle to our doing so. I can think of one senior appointment we have made from outside the Corporation. This is not the only one but I can think of at least one immediately; but our changes have been for the most part—I think it is fair to say—at the upper levels, a reassignment of senior personnel to new responsibilities and new duties.

Both Mr. Hallman and Mr. David owe—I use that word in a rather questionable sense—their appointments to Mr. Picard and myself and they do not forget to remind us at times that the slings and arrows of outrageous fortune that they have suffered are the result of their accepting these assignments from us.

Mr. Fortier: Do you find in a crown corporation, as opposed to a large public corporation, the president is hamstrung in his choice of team members?

Mr. Davidson: Not in the least. I can say quite frankly that there have been no restrictions that have been felt by Mr. Picard and myself or that anybody has every endeavoured to impose upon Mr. Picard or myself in our selection of personnel.

Mr. Fortier: Insofar as the two top positions are concerned, is it your prediction—I do not wish it upon either of you—in future years when the occasion arises, it will be again advisable to go out of the Corporation to find a president or an executive vice-president or do you think that the crown corporation will now produce people of a calibre such as yourselves who will be able to perform effectively?

Mr. Davidson: I would hope that there would be complete freedom of choice on the part of the authorities responsible for making these appointments and other appointments.

Certainly, there should be no assumption when one is looking for the president of the Corporation that the president of the Corporation should be selected from the best of the 9000 people who happen to be working at the Corporation at a given point in time. The selection should be made from the 21 million or 22 million Canadians who are available and who have a variety of qualifications for the senior post.

The nature of the two positions has changed a little bit, as you may know, Mr. Fortier, since Mr. Picard and I have taken over. Under the old Broadcasting Act the posts of president and statutory Executive vice-president were both the prerogatives of the Governor-in-Council to fill. This is now changed. Under the new Broadcasting Act, the presidential post is now filled by the Governor-in-Council. The executive vice-presidential post is filled, if I recall the wording of the Act, directly by the Board of the Corporation making a recommendation, which has to meet with the approval of the Governor-in-Council.

This does shift the nature of the appointment somewhat.

Mr. Fortier: But you yourself have not suffered from the fact that you had been prior to 1968 not associated with the CBC?

Mr. Davidson: Oh yes, I have suffered.

Mr. Fortier: You have?

Mr. Davidson: Terribly.

Mr. Fortier: Well, you educated yourself, obviously.

Mr. Davidson: There is no doubt about it in my mind that a person such as myself or Mr. Picard coming brand new to an organization as complex and as difficult to understand and to manipulate as the CBC, is under a very real handicap from the lack of knowledge of how the machinery works, in terms of incomplete knowledge of the qualities and characteristics of the personnel.

All of the complexities of the ongoing organization have to be absorbed in fairly quick fashion. I had one advantage, if I may say so, in that in my prior capacity as secretary of the treasury board I did have to deal with the CBC budget. I had therefore some understanding or some knowledge of the structures of the budget, of the structure of the organization, of some of the problems that were presenting themselves currently. To that extent therefore I did have a preview of a few of the problems facing the Corporation, but this was merely a glimpse. It was a key hole and did not give me the panorama of vision of the nature of the organization that one really needs if one is going to be an effective president.

Mr. Picard also had one or two incidental opportunities through training seminars that he had developed in his previous capacity for the Corporation to see some of the problems that both of us have been under a very real handicap in our apprenticeship, in trying to learn what this organization is all about.

Mr. Fortier: How have you found the cooperation of your new colleagues?

Mr. Davidson: Excellent.

Mr. Fortier: Was it acquired from the start?

Mr. Davidson: I cannot fault in any way whatever the degree of cooperation, the wholehearted cooperation and support I have had from the colleagues that we acquired when we took over the affairs of the Corporation.

I do not want to guild the lily without also having one comment. If there is one thing I would say to all of them, if they were here, I found that their loyalty to the Corporation, which is very great, prompted them at times to defend past positions and set positions in the Corporation which Mr. Picard and I, with our newcomer's eyes, were prepared to look at a bit more sceptically and we hope a bit more objectively than those who had been a part of the Corporation.

Mr. Fortier: The Canadian Association of Broadcasters in presenting a submission to the policy conference of the Liberal Party of Canada at Harrison Hot Springs in November last year, spoke of most of the bodies of public inquiries into broadcasting had been made up of inexperienced amateurs.

What is the feeling of the CBC with respect to inquiries such as the one which is going on now by the Senate Committee? Do you feel that since it is being conducted by "inexperienced amateurs" it will not be effective and does not have much credibility?

Mr. Davidson: What are you trying to do to me?

Mr. Fortier: You are sitting there, sir, and I am asking the questions.

Mr. Davidson: Well, you are talking to two inexperienced amateurs here in the first place.

Mr. Fortier: Well, you notice how I moved into this.

Mr. Davidson: But may I tell you what I said to a closed meeting that was held recently in the Chateau Laurier under the guidance of Mr. Graham Spry, whom I see in the audience.

The Canadian Broadcasting League held a meeting recently, which a number of senior people in the broadcasting world attended and a certain gentleman, whom I will not say is identified with the CAB, but I will not deny that he was—made an impassioned plea that the broadcasters of the country be left alone for a year or so.

He said "In my years of experience, I think I have gone through 19 inquiries of Senat Committees, House of Commons Committees, Royal Commissions and Bob Fowler half a dozen times and everybody else has been in the act and will you not just leave the broadcasters alone for a year."

I was asked for my view of this and I got up and said I thoroughly disagreed with the gentleman who preceded me that appearing before Parliamentary Committees and Royal Commissions of Inquiry is about the only thing left that the CBC can really do well.

They laughed and we had our confidence taken away from us but seriously I feel very strongly that as a public broadcasting entity supported by the people of Canada and created by the Parliament of Canada that the CBC should be the last organization to raise any question about the right of bodies of inquiries to probe into its affairs.

Now, this is time consuming. It is burdensome in many ways. I can assure you, ladies and gentlemen it is expensive in many ways and the cost of operating the CBC is not made less by the number and frequency of the inquiries to which we go; but I believe it is part of the public responsibility of a broadcasting organization such as ours to respond to these inquiries and we will certainly do that as long as Mr. Picard and I are in charge of the Corporation with the fullest of cooperation and every good wish.

Mr. Fortier: The CAB in this same brief, Mr. Davidson, said and I would like to relate to the very good answer you have just given, if I may. I would hope that your comments now would include not only the CBC but also private broadcasters in Canada and I now the Members of the Committee would like your opinion on some of these things that they are doing and some of the things they are not doing.

The CAB says:

"Broadcasting in Canada will continue to be uncertain if it is subjected to insistent investigations continuing inquiry puts the broadcaster on the defensive and works against his creative activity. It produces dissension and distrust."

Do you agree with that?

Mr. Davidson: No. I think it can do that if there is the wrong kind of motivation on the part of those making the inquiry or if there is the wrong kind of motivation on the part of those responding to the inquiry.

I make a distinction between a public inquiry and an inquisition. If I were of the view that a particular body making an inquiry into the CBC was doing so with motives that were not really consistent with the public interest, I think I would feel quite differently to that inquiry from what I would feel with respect to an inquiry which is set up as a responsible public investigation and conducted reasonably in the spirit of the inquiry.

I would not categorize the kinds of inquiry to which the CBC has gone in the past years and the kinds of inquiries to which I have been subjected to in the two years I have been president of the Corporation, as being inquiries that are not conducted in an overwhelming degree with the best of motives and hopefully with some constructive results in terms of the CBC.

Mr. Fortier: Do you, Mr. Davidson, find it is a good thing that the CBC should have a sort of appeal to the Governor General-in-Council from any decision of the CRTC as opposed, of course, to a private broadcaster?

Mr. Davidson: Well, I think that this is a useful protection for us. I think that the experience that I have had in the two years and the experience with the new Broadcasting Act is much too short to be able to document with specific examples the reasons why this safeguard could be a useful safeguard but, you know, human error is possible even in such an august body as the CRTC.

Mr. Fortier: Yes but...

Mr. Davidson: And the CBC being perhaps even more human and subject to error than the CRTC does welcome the opportunity to make an appeal to higher authority in the Parliament should the occasion arise.

Mr. Fortier: If human error is possible, as you well put it, why should the private broadcasters be discriminated against?

Mr. Davidson: That is a good question.

I know of no particular reason why the distinction should be made in the legislation between a private broadcaster and the public broadcaster in this respect other than the fact that I think in bodies like the other regulatory bodies dealing with other things, it is been found that the government tends to prefer to insulate itself from the kinds of pressures that can be put on it to change the decision of those regulatory bodies by giving the final decisions in most instances to the regulatory bodies and/or the courts.

Now, in the case of the Corporation, since the Corporation is already a body created by the Parliament of Canada and financed by the Parliament of Canada, which has to go to the Government for its budget each year, there is no prospect whatever of keeping the Government completely insulated from the affairs of the Corporation; and I can only assume that the Government takes a position that when it is caught in the middle between two bodies of its own creation, that there is a case for the Governor-in-Council to have the ultimate right to intervene in certain situations where there is a conflict between these two bodies.

Mr. Fortier: Both of which, of course, are creations of Parliament.

Mr. Davidson: Both of which are creations of Parliament.

Mr. Fortier: You have just spoken of the fact that the CBC owes its existence to Parliament and it gets its operating money from Parliament in the form of grants every year.

In view of the fact that Parliament has conceived the CBC and now keeps it alive, how much real insulation is there in the day-to-day affairs of the Corporation between yourself and your colleagues and Members of the present Government?

In your case you can only speak for the present Government.

Mr. Davidson: There is complete insulation accepted through the channels of the Minister, the Secretary of State who is the Cabinet Minister through whom the CBC reports to Parliament.

When I say there is complete insulation, I do not mean there is no communication. We will receive letters from Cabinet Ministers or Members of Parliament as we have a perfect right to do and as they have a perfect right to send to us.

We deal with these I think responsibly but we do not, I assure you, deal with them in any sense of unfair pressure coming from this particular source because it happens to be a Member of Parliament or a Cabinet Minister, who is making the inquiry.

The Chairman: May I ask you what kind of letters?

Mr. Davidson: Oh, we get letters...

The Chairman: I would never think of writing a letter to the President of the CBC.

Mr. Davidson: Well, I got a letter from a Member of Parliament the other day reflecting the fact he had received eight letters of complaint from members of his constituency in respect of a program that was produced out of his constituency.

The Chairman: What kind of letters would you get from a Cabinet Minister?

Mr. Davidson: We get the same kind of letters from a Cabinet Minister.

The Chairman: Do you treat a letter from a Cabinet Minister any differently than a letter from a Member say of the opposition or the Senate?

Mr. Davidson: No. We try to explain as best we can what we did and why we did it. If we did something we think was wrong, we would hopefully acknowledge it but we deal with a Cabinet Minister inquiry in precisely the same way as we deal with a Member of Parliament's inquiry.

The Chairman: I am sorry, Mr. Fortier, I may be asking questions you were going to ask but I am just curious to know: do you deal differently with letters from Members of Parliament than letters from the public?

Mr. Davidson: Basically no. Now, I will not deny if I got a letter from the Right Honourable John Diefenbaker I will probably pay more personal attention to the way in which the reply to that letter was worded when it goes out than if I received a letter from some individual who is not known to me.

There are just levels of attention that obviously are given...

The Chairman: Would it be fair to say if the letter was from a barber in Prince Albert of whom you had not heard, you might not even see the letter?

Mr. Davidson: That is correct.

The Chairman: Whereas, Mr. Diefenbaker's letter you would see?

Mr. Davidson: I would almost certainly see Mr. Diefenbaker's letter.

The Chairman: Senator Smith?

Senator Smith: There is just one step to take...

Mr. Davidson: Write me a letter some time

Senator Smith: We have just one more step to take in this area, I think. How do you treat a letter from the Secretary of State on the same kind of complaint that you would get from Members of Parliament or John Diefenbaker and so on?

Mr. Davidson: Well, in the first place I would say that the Secretary of State is probably the man least likely to write on any matter of a private complaint he has received from an individual or that he has himself from what he has seen.

The Secretary of State has been very circumspect in distinguishing between his official communication with the Corporation on matters of policy, budget, structure of the Corporation for which he has so much responsibility to deal with, and dealing with matters other than that.

Typically what happens is that the Secretary of State receives letters of complaint about the CBC, something it has done, and the Secretary of State's office replies to these simply saying that as the individual no doubt is aware, the Corporation operates as an independent crown corporation under the provisions of the Broadcasting Act.

It is responsible to Parliament and he is the communications through which the Corporation deals with Parliament and he has noted that and he is passing it on to the Corporation to deal with the letter.

The Chairman: Do you get many letters that should be directed to private broadcasters from people thinking that...

Mr. Davidson: I would have to say that in terms of the cross-section of mail that I see, I do not see many letters that should be directed to private broadcasters.

The Chairman: Just one other question. This may not be the kind of question you would expect and it may not be possible for you to answer but I would be interested in knowing something about the volume of this mail and also is it possible to discern any pattern in it?

What kind of things do they say? Where are they writing from and what are they writing about and how many people are writing?

Perhaps Mr. Fraser could answer that.

Mr. Davidson: Perhaps I could call upon Mr. Fraser, our vice-president of corporate affairs to answer that question.

The Chairman: Just generally.

Mr. Ronald Fraser, Vice-President of Corporate Affairs, Canadian Broadcasting Corporation: Generally, Mr. Chairman, this mail is almost entirely program mail. There would be a few letters about the coverage in areas that do not have much but the large majority of it would be program mail.

The volume varies tremendously, depending on what happens.

If people object to something, there is a definite increase in the volume.

Mr. Davidson: Could I supplement a further question? It could go to Mr. Fraser or Mr. Hallman as to whether the volume of mail is concentrated primarily at the network centres or headquarters or what is the situation.

Mr. Fraser: It is sent mainly to the network centres.

The Chairman: What would the volume be, Mr. Fraser?

Mr. Fraser: We might run several hundred letters a week, probably.

Mr. Hallman: I think, Mr. Chairman, the one figure I recall from about a year ago was something like 750,000 letters annually but I mean there would be a fair number we would deal with.

Senator Smith: Do most of these letters have to do with the so-called permissive programs, the programs which people think should not be permitted to appear, certain kinds of drama. You know what I mean.

Mr. Fraser: Yes.

Senator Smith: Are most of them concerned with that subject?

Mr. Fraser: I would hesitate to say, Senator, certainly some of them do. We can provide a breakdown, if you like, and give you the figures.

The Chairman: I think it would be interesting perhaps because this whole aspect of the permissive society and permissive programming is referred to in the brief but because I am sure we want to ask you some questions I think perhaps at this point we should burn back to Mr. Fortier.

I think I have some supplementary questions on Senator Smith's comment about permissive programming but perhaps we are getting ahead of ourselves.

Mr. Davidson: I would not wish that impression be left on the record. Most of the letters are about things that people do not like about our programs. It could be that we cut off the hockey game too soon, that we have put on a politician for too long a period, and I do not regard those as elements of the permissive society.

Senator Smith: I can vouch for the fact that at least one of them has to do with the adequacy or otherwise of the coverage by radio of my area of Nova Scotia.

The Chairman: Mr. Fortier?

Mr. Fortier: The daily newspapers have devised a letters to the editor column, as the case may be. I would imagine that many of these letters which the Corporation receives is in the form of a letter to the editor.

Do you consider that there is any way for the electronic communications media to give publicity to these letters and is there any study being made in this respect?

Mr. Davidson: I have raised, as the gentlemen at the table will testify, the question at various times both at our board meetings and at our management meetings. I have raised the question as to whether we could not develop a program period on radio in which we would perhaps from a slightly different point of view use the letter device and the answer device as a means of acquainting the public with some of the problems that are faced by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

Perhaps this is a different approach. This is not so much a letters to the editor as it is using our correspondence flow as a means of interpreting some of the difficulties and problems of the Corporation to the Canadian public.

Mr. Hallman and Mr. David, who have been under pressure from me, to try to conceive some kind of answer along these lines, might care to add a word as to some of the things they are doing and some of the things they find difficult in doing in this regard.

Mr. Eugene Hallman, Vice-President and General Manager, Canadian Broadcasting Corporation: Well, I think we have begun just about a month or six weeks ago on radio a new program called "Your 2 bucks worth", which comes on on Sunday early afternoon.

It is an endeavour there to respond (a) to tell the story of what CBC radio is doing and also to respond to letters, phone calls, to suggestions that come up.

In addition I think we have a number of programs now particularly in radio in the English network "Cross Canada Check-Up" a number of structured programs in which there is a good deal of audience participation.

These I heard from coast to coast on pre-long distance telephone calls but a fairly carefully organized program.

"Radio Free Friday". There are a number of these which do not exactly fulfill the role of a letters to the editor column in response and I cannot see that can be done very well technically because it is basically a local function.

Mr. Fortier: Maybe not, but I asked if there was any possibility.

Mr. Hallman: The network, I think, would be very difficult. I think we are doing significantly in trying to deal with questions of a general character but actual responses, it seems to me, probably have to be handled locally and if there is time that can be done.

It will still be difficult in a linear medium like broadcasting to provide adequate time.

Television is even more difficult to handle that sort of thing on a network basis but a local basis is a possibility.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortier: Mr. David, do you wish to add something?

Mr. Raymond David, Vice-President and General Manager, Canadian Broadcasting Corporation (French Network): We did somewhat the same thing on the radio with a series called "Les Maillons de la Chaîne" which was broadcasted Sunday mornings all last year. Of course the information we passed on to the public was based on data compiled from telephone calls and letters that we had received—I have statistics on the number of letters and calls over the past three months. We built our broadcasts around subject material that the listeners were most concerned about.

The other method that we used very often involved the participation of the Program Director and Department Heads in a broadcast where they presented their programming and their plans and explained the reasoning behind our efforts. Rather than sending an immediate reply to every letter that we receive, we rely on these indirect methods of answering television viewers. We answer a letters but we answer them individually.

Mr. Fortier: Do you think it's technically possible for radio or television to air the criticisms of television viewers or radio listeners?

Mr. David: Of course it's possible, for when you come before one of our reporters you are treated in just about the same way as anybody else. In other words he tries to get opinions and bring out the truth whether he is interviewing somebody from the CBC or not. So this can be done quite simply. Of course you must keep in mind that interviews of this kind cover only the main points of criticism. There is no opportunity for direct criticism such as that offered by open press conferences.

Mr. Fortier: Thank you.

[Text]

The Chairman: Mr. Fortier?

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Davidson, you described, I suppose, what I would term as reasoned pressure from parliamentarians which is exercised. Does this reasoned pressure in certain circumstances—and I have regard here to the terms of the Broadcast Act—does it extend so far as to oblige the Corporation to provide certain services somewhere in Canada?

Mr. Davidson: Well, I would take a little exception, Mr. Fortier, to "reasoned pressure".

Mr. Fortier: The term is mine.

Mr. Davidson: The point I am really trying to make in this business of correspondence and so on, I think the Members of Parliament have no less a right to correspond with the Corporation and voice their complaints than the rest of the people of Canada.

Mr. Fortier: Do they have more of a duty?

Mr. Davidson: They have more responsibility. As well as the right of a taxpayer, they do represent a constituency and it is not only their privilege but it is their responsibility to communicate to the Corporation and pass on to the Corporation the kinds of dissatisfaction or the kinds of satisfaction that they have conveyed to them in their correspondence from their constituents.

The Chairman: This is really previous to your question because you are asking a different question. Just to follow this up. There are, by rapid calculation, 365 Members of Parliament in Canada. How many of them would write you on an average? Would half of them write or a third of them?

Mr. Davidson: I would doubt if it would be half of them who would write. And there are certain Members of Parliament whose particular field of interest is in this. They may have special reasons for it. They are on the Broadcasting Committee. They may have in their part of the country a special problem and therefore they are going to write to us more frequently than a member who lives in the middle of a metropolitan area like Toronto or Montreal and who has all the broadcasting services he wants or needs.

The Chairman: Would you hear from a quarter of them in a year?

Mr. Davidson: I doubt we would hear from as many as a quarter a year. We might hear from 50 to 75 members—that would be a quarter.

The Chairman: How many do you get from Senators? Do you hear from some Senators?

Mr. Davidson: Oh yes.

The Chairman: Quite regularly?

Mr. Davidson: Not regularly, not frequently enough, as a matter of fact.

The Chairman: Thank you.

Mr. Davidson: We hear from Senator Smith occasionally and we hear from a number of the other Senators. I see from my reference sheet Senator Paul Martin on one or two occasions.

The Chairman: Well, that could lead to a whole line of supplementary questions!

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Davidson, what I am getting at is, for example, insofar as the extension of your Northern service is concerned, does anyone order you to put say a package in the Yukon?

Mr. Davidson: No—the Board of Directors, of course.

Mr. Fortier: That I appreciate, after careful reading of the Act.

Mr. Davidson: We get strong representations from the member for the Northwest Territories. We get representations from the mining companies, from the Chambers of Commerce. We establish an order of priority for our own extension of services; and there are many conflicting pressures on our capital budget. In respect of the Northern service, we have an arrangement by which an inter-departmental committee of Departments of Government who are concerned with the problems of the North, sit with us and advise on the order in which we should try to fill the needs of these different isolated communities in the North.

But, just to pursue the question a little further. You do know that before we can move into a community in the North, we have to get a licence from the CRTC. We must make an application for a licence. There are public hearings. There is a very lengthy procedure so that the only body which authorizes us to proceed with a project in the North would be the CRTC.

Mr. Fortier: But the decision has already been taken at the level of your Board of Directors?

Mr. Davidson: That is correct.

Mr. Fortier: And you are saying this decision is taken independently of any undue pressure?

Mr. Davidson: That is correct.

Mr. Fortier: ...from any Member of Parliament.

Mr. Davidson: I can say without hesitation or without qualification of any kind that the CBC Board of Directors makes its own decisions as to where priorities, in terms of its extension of coverage, are concerned and it proceeds on the basis of those to make its application to the CRTC.

Mr. Fortier: The setting up of repeater stations in remote areas of Canada—because I would like to speak about Northern services if we may for a few minutes—this comes out of your capital budget, does it not?

Mr. Davidson: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: I think we should create a distinction immediately between your capital expense budget and your operating expense budget? Correct?

Mr. Davidson: Correct. And as you are aware our operating budget comes by way of a parliamentary grant.

Mr. Fortier: Would you expand a little on both budgets, so to speak.

Mr. Davidson: Yes. Our operating budget comes by way of a parliamentary grant together with the revenues we derive from our commercial operations.

That operating budget runs in the neighbourhood of $200 million to $210 million gross a year at the present time, of which something around $40 million is derived from our commercial operation and $166 million is derived by way of a direct government grant.

This year for the first time, the parliamentary vote has been worded in a way which permits us to carry over any unexpended funds from the current parliamentary grant into next year for purposes.

Mr. Fortier: If you have any?

Mr. Davidson: That is correct. The capital appropriation, on the other hand, is a loan appropriation. It is an authority to the Governor-in-Council to lend money to the Corporation for capital acquisitions and construction.

We have to pay back that loan...

Mr. Fortier: With interest?

Mr. Davidson: With interest, which is pretty high at the present time.

Mr. Fortier: Can you tell us what it is, just by way of interest?

Mr. Davidson: The practice is for the government to charge I think one-eighth over and above the rate on Canadian Government Bonds over a 15 year period, or something like that.

Mr. Fortier: That is a standard rate.

Mr. Davidson: There is a standard rate that the government regards as being the basic cost of money to it plus a service charge.

Mr. Fortier: I see.

Mr. Davidson: And that runs us, if I recall correctly, somewhere pretty close to 9 per cent at the present time.

Mr. Fortier: What is the amount owed presently by the Corporation to the Government?

Mr. Davidson: This is shown in our balance sheet and it is something in the neighbourhood of $95 million, if I recall. That is being added to each year to the extent of about $10 million or $30 million as our borrowing for the purpose of the Montreal consolidation, to acquisition of new stations and the building of other stations, including these rebroadcasters and relay stations develops.

Mr. Fortier: Has the Corporation ever repaid any of that money?

Mr. Davidson: Oh yes. The Corporation has. This system of financing our capital budget by way of loans rather than by way of grants, commenced in 1965. There is a schedule that has been submitted to the Committee which shows our debt obligation, by the year in which it was incurred, the interest rate applicable and the repayment schedules, which all for us to repay the loans in equal installments over a period of 20 years.

May I perhaps find this in the documents we have here?

The Chairman: I think we have it.

Mr. Fortier: Yes, I just wanted a general picture.

Senator Beaubien: Last year was $11 million.

Mr. Davidson: Yes, and it is increasing each year.

This presents, I can say, a very real problem for us in terms of the year in which our budget is frozen. Next year, for example, we will have the same kind of money that we had this year—$166 million as an operating grant from the Government—but our obligation to repay, to the Government, capital loans and our obligation to pay higher interest rates on a larger volume of loans, means that our obligations of repayment to the Government in these two respects, interest and capital payments, amounts to about $4 million more next year than they did this year.

We have got to find that $4 million with the same amount of operating costs.

Mr. Fortier: On the Northern service...

The Chairman: Perhaps before you go on, are there any other questions that the Senators may have which are supplementary on this budget area?

Senator Beaubien: I would like to ask a supplementary, if I could.

The Chairman: I think we should deal with that at this point, Senator Beaubien.

Senator Beaubien: Mr. Davidson, the Montreal consolidation—how much was spent on that so far and what is left to be done?

Mr. Davidson: The Montreal consolidation budget consists really of three main elements.

There is, first of all, the acquisition of the land, the development of the plans and so on. That runs to about $9 million, if I recall, and that is past history.

The total cost of the project is estimated at about $66.2 million, of which about $35 million will consist of the construction of the building itself.

Senator Beaubien: And is that fairly well advanced now?

Mr. Davidson: It is up to about the eleventh storey now.

I will tell you how far it has advanced in a moment. The balance of about $25 million is for technical equipment that will go into the building.

Senator Beaubien: You cannot move what you had before?

Mr. Davidson: Well, we can move some of it.

Senator Beaubien: $25 million for new equipment?

Mr. Davidson: That is about correct, if I recall, Senator Beaubien.

The acquisition of the equipment is mostly ahead of us. Of the $33,675,000 that is estimated to build the building, about $25 million or more in the way of sub-contracts has already been let.

I think we expect to spend this year about $14 million altogether. Next year will be our peak year which will go up pretty close to $80 million, if I recall correctly.

Senator Beaubien: How much?

Mr. Davidson: $80 million and I am very pleased with the progress that we are making. We had proceeded on the basis of management contracts. We had put out...

Senator Beaubien: Tenders?

Mr. Davidson: ...inquiries. We got the big companies to bid not on the basis of a firm price contract, but on the basis of a management contract, with an incentive payment if they did better than their estimated cost on completion of the building and a penalty payment if they did more poorly; and on the basis of that from what we know to date we are going to bring in the building on target and probably a little bit under.

I cannot speak now for what our prospects will be in the acquisition of equipment because that is a separate problem, but the building will be brought in at less than the estimated cost that was offered by the contractors at the time they set their management fee.

Senator Beaubien: Mr. Davidson, when will you move in? When is that contemplated?

[Translation]

Mr. David: At the beginning of 1972 we are going to produce all the programming for 1972-73 at the new Place de Radio Canada.

Senator Beaubien: Is the same thing being done at Toronto, Mr. David?

[Text]

Senator Beaubien: Are you building in Toronto too, Mr. Davidson?

Mr. Davidson: Not at this stage, Senator Beaubien.

Senator Beaubien: When you get over Montreal then Toronto starts.

Mr. Davidson: When you have a capital budget next year, as we have, for $25.3 millions and about $1 million of that is being spent for further work on the Montreal consolidation, you have not very much left for the rest of the country.

Senator Beaubien: What is $25 million?

Mr. Davidson: You said that. I did not.

Senator McElman: I have a supplementary, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: I think Senator Beaubien is still on a supplementary.

Senator Beaubien: I do not have one but it is closely related.

The Chairman: Are you still on the Montreal consolidation?

Senator McElman: No.

Senator Beaubien: Mr. Davidson, you said radio, out of your operating budget of $166 million, costs about $35 million. Could you break down what the other big branches are for the rest of the $131 million. How is that going to be spent?

Mr. Davidson: I could give you, I think, a tabulation of that this afternoon.

Senator Beaubien: I want it very roughly.

The Chairman: I think the Committee has these figures or many of them. I think what Senator Beaubien wants is just a broad brush picture, if you have that?

Mr. Davidson: Yes.

The Chairman: Is that correct?

Senator Beaubien: Yes. There is $131 million not accounted for. Where is it?

Mr. Davidson: I am trying to remember the figures for the French network and English network and regional broadcasting.

Senator Beaubien: Is that $35 million for radio both French and English?

Mr. Davidson: Yes, for both French and English. My recollection is that television in French and English is somewhere in the order of $90 million, between $90 million and $100 million, and then we have separate items such as...

Senator Beaubien: The TV, you say, is $90 million?

Mr. Davidson: That is my recollection. I have not got the figure in front of me but let us say $90 million. That makes $125 million altogether.

Senator Beaubien: That is right.

Mr. Davidson: And we have something in the order of $12 million for what we call network distribution. These are the land line, the microwave links that link up the stations across the country so we are up to $137 million.

The Chairman: It might be better if you would prefer to return to this this afternoon. Perhaps our guest can prepare the figure.

Senator Beaubien: I just want a very rough figure.

The Chairman: I realize that but it might be better if you were to know about the Northern service and international service and so on.

Mr. Davidson: We can give you an accurate tabulation this afternoon first thing, Senator Beaubien.

The Chairman: I think that would be right. Would that satisfy you, Senator Beaubien?

Senator Beaubien: Yes, because I would like to ask some questions about the different costs of the different services.

Mr. Laurent Picard, Executive Vice-President, Canadian Broadcasting Corporation: If I may add something.

The Chairman: Mr. Picard?

Mr. Picard: On one of the documents you received which would be called C and X, operating expenses, you have that on page C3 and C4, a detailed analysis of the production and distribution costs and of revenue for radio services, television services.

Mr. Davidson: Could I also draw your attention to page 95 of our annual report for the last year.

The Chairman: Do you want to look at this to ask questions now? We have an extra copy of the annual report.

Mr. Davidson: Page 95.

The Chairman: We will deal with it now, I think.

Mr. Davidson: Now that you have this in front of you, Senator Beaubien, you will see that the national radio service—have you got page 95?

Senator Beaubien: Yes, I have.

Mr. Davidson: The national radio service in 1969 is made up, program costs $25.8 million, network distribution $3.2 million, station transmission $2.85 million for a total net operating requirement of $36 million radio. Correct?

Senator Beaubien: Yes.

Mr. Davidson: Do you follow me? And then the national television service is $98 million. No, I am sorry. The $98 million relates to program costs. $11.9 million in network distribution, $6 million for station transmission making a total net operating requirement for national television service of $104,500,000.

We have in addition to that international service $3.5 million, emergency broadcasting $418,000, the repayment of capital loan $3.9 million for a total of $148 million, which represents for 1969 the draw down on our public grant.

Gross revenues $41.5 million making a total of $189 million.

I should point out to you that these figures I have given you show you a net charge against the Government grant and one would have to allocate the gross revenues which are approximately $2 million on the radio side and $38 million on the television side, to the respective figures that are given here in order to arrive at the gross figures.

Senator Beaubien: Mr. Davidson, income from public funds you have $148 million?

Mr. Davidson: Correct.

Senator Beaubien: But you got $168 million last year?

Mr. Davidson: No. I am sorry. This column here relates to 1968-1969.

Senator Beaubien: Your figures are about the same.

Mr. Davidson: Our grant for the year 1968-1969 was $151 million. We drew down only $148.3 million and we turned back $2.7 million to the Treasury.

In 1970 we have a grant of $166 million and the vote will permit us to retain and carry over to next year any under-expenditure.

Senator Beaubien: Now, the repayment on capital loan, as I remember it, was $11 million?

Mr. Davidson: That is 1968-1969 we are talking about in this Statement, Senator Beaubien. In 1969-1970 I think, if I recall correctly, our repayment of capital loan goes up to $8 million and in 1970-1971 it goes to $11 million. I speak from memory on those figures.

Senator Beaubien: That is for repayment.

Mr. Davidson: That is right.

Could I make a correction on that? The figure here of $3.9 million is a repayment of loans which does not include interest. When I say there is $8 million in 1969-1970 and $11 million in 1970-1971, that is both interest and principal.

Senator Beaubien: Interest on the $95 million you had before?

Mr. Davidson: That is correct.

Senator Beaubien: Where do you put the interest figure then?

Mr. Davidson: I would have to find it. I am sorry, I do not know.

The Chairman: Do you have other questions on this. Are you finished Senator Beaubien?

Senator Beaubien: Go ahead. I will come back in.

The Chairman: All right. I just wanted to ask Senator McElman if he has a supplementary question?

Senator McElman: Yes. Because of tight money and the availability of capital, will you have sufficient, Mr. Davidson, to proceed straight ahead with the provision of French language television to cover the whole of New Brunswick?

Mr. Davidson: No sir.

Senator McElman: What is the schedule?

Mr. Davidson: I would have to get you the detailed schedule.

I should add we do our planning in relation to all of the Maritimes. We are not isolating New Brunswick. You are talking about French language broadcasting?

Senator McElman: That is right, sir.

Mr. Davidson: We have a problem of supplying service to a community of about 7,600 French-speaking persons in the Southeastern part of Cape Breton Island, about the same number of people, about 7,500 in the Halifax area, a smaller number of 4,600, as I recall, in Saint John in New Brunswick and about 2,600 in the Fredericton area. There are a couple of thousand up in Sydney who are beyond the Mulgrave reach where we are planning a centre for one of our new rebroadcasters.

There are these five areas in which there are substantial numbers of French-speaking people. We are trying to sort out what our priorities are in these areas.

The reason for giving special attention to these areas is that they are now receiving no services at all in their mother tongue.

The problem of north-eastern New Brunswick is a somewhat different problem. There are many more people of the French language in this area, obviously, but they are not at the moment totally deprived of services in their mother tongue because they are receiving services from two stations in the Gaspé Peninsula, one in New Carlisle and the other—I have forgotten where it is.

Mr. David: Carlton.

Mr. Davidson: Carlton, which broadcasts into this area. I do not suggest it is an adequate service for the people of northeastern New Brunswick. These are private stations affiliated to us.

We certainly would like to be able to serve the people of North-eastern New Brunswick in the way we think that they are entitled to.

When one has to establish priorities, one has to think of the fact that there are 20,000 or 30,000 people in the five districts, to which I have referred, in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick that at the present time are completely lacking any service at all in their mother tongue. We believe that requires us to give our first priority and attention to them.

Now, we are hoping to begin in 1970, 1971 and 1972 with a series of applications to the CRTC that will progressively cover these areas that completely lack services. We have to get this into our capital budget availabilities, and we also have to try to find the means of providing a better service to the people of Northeastern New Brunswick, but I cannot give you a specific date.

Do we have a specific date in our planning schedule for north-eastern New Brunswick?

Mr. Fraser: Not that I have, sir.

Senator McElman: You are proceeding to originate the program; am I correct?

Mr. Davidson: We have established a production centre in Moncton. I believe on the 1st of April, the first elements of our service will move into that building and begin operating from that new building. But the very fact that we have had to spend a substantial amount of money on the development of the Moncton production centre and on the Yarmouth French language station and on the micro-wave stretching down the south shore to reach the Yarmouth community—all of that in the French language—this very fact has meant that we can only do that much in this area and we have to adjust our future capital budget to take care of the other projects.

Senator McElman: Is the intention that the prime feed for the Acadians will be out of Moncton with relays or micro-waves?

Mr. Davidson: Moncton will be the mother station for the French language broadcasting in this area. It will carry the French network feed from Montreal, which is a national service. It will supplement the French network feed with some local production. That local production will be very modest, I have to say to you, at the beginning.

I do not want to create the impression that we are going to be able to do more than we can. It will be a very modest amount of local production to begin with, and as we are able to manage it, we hope to be able to increase the amount of local production coming out of Moncton to serve a community that you have described as being the Acadian community.

Senator McElman: This is recognition of the fact that the Acadian Community has a rather distinct cultural heritage. Is that correct?

Mr. Davidson: That is not, I would say, the explicit or prime reason.

The reason that we would want to produce program materials increasingly out of our regional production centre in Moncton is that this is in discharge of the mandate of the Corporation laid down under the Broadcasting Act.

The mandate does not distinguish between French-Canadians and French-Acadians but it does say the Corporation must show the different regions of the country one to the other and must encourage and develop regional production, and it is in fulfillment of this mandate that we hope to develop increasingly regional production capacity in the Moncton centre.

We will do it for English as well as for French.

Senator Beaubien: Mr. Davidson, what would you have spent on the production station in Moncton? What kind of money are we talking about?

Mr. Davidson: I think if I recall correctly over a two year period...

Mr. Picard: The operating costs of Moncton...

Mr. Davidson: No, the capital costs.

Mr. Picard: The capital cost is about $1.2 million. It is not a station that is totally new. There was an English operation before the television. There was a radio operation.

[translation]

Senator Beaubien: The C.B.C. owned it?

Mr. Picard: Yes. What is happening is this—the creation of a French television station, the creation and combining of French radio and English radio and English television.

Senator Beaubien: What do you mean by creation? Are you talking about a big building or something like that?

Mr. Picard: No. This means two things; it means a building has been bought and in this building previously separate operations—radio and television, French and English—have been brought together, namely English radio, French radio and English and French television.

Senator Beaubien: You put all this together?

Mr. Picard: Yes we put it all together and at the same time we set up a station for French productions...Raymond, would you like to add anything else?

Mr. David: There has been a station at Moncton for a number of years but it is a repeater station. In other words all of its transmissions originated in Montreal except in cases where it tied in with a telefilm network. Beginning this September they will have...

Senator Beaubien: September of this year?

Mr. David: Yes, of this year, they'll have fifteen minutes of local news and perhaps half an hour a day of public affairs. This means that they'll cover not only the activities of the Moncton area but the activities of French speaking New Brunswick as well. As we said earlier, this service will be distributed through Yarmouth beginning this fall. This means that this station will no longer be just a distribution station for Montreal productions but a station with its own personality serving the Acadian people.

Senator Beaubien: Mr. David, where are you going to find the personnel to do all this?

Mr. David: There is personnel available because we have had a radio station at Moncton since 1956. There is a local production unit and there is a French news-room which is used only for radio at the present time. So, there are around sixty people at Moncton.

Senator Beaubien: There are sixty people there?

Mr. David: Yes and there are about a dozen down there who are already involved in television because you have to have announcers for station identification. Even though the programs originate in Montreal we have to have technicians to look after the transmitters and the operation of video tapes used in tele-films.

What they did not have was a local production unit. Anyway there is the nucleus of a production unit in the radio personnel and the nucleus of a technical unit in the people who serviced the transmitter and made transmission arrangements. All we have to do now is add the personnel required to make direct broadcasts from the studio that they'll have in the fall.

Senator Beaubien: And in September when everything is in full operation, how many people will there be?

Mr. David: Of course I don't know exactly how many staff we'll have to add in the fall; personally, I think we'll have to have around fifteen more people.

Senator Beaubien: Are the people you hired from Moncton?

Mr. David: Yes, because Moncton is a pretty big centre. Of course there has been some movement of personnel but generally speaking the staff at Moncton is Acadian.

[Text]

The Chairman: I wonder if I could ask just one question about a comment you made a minute ago.

You said a moment or two ago that you were going to have, as I understand it, and please correct me if I am wrong, to find somewhere or economize to the extent of $4 million. I think it would be an unfair question to ask you where you are going to find the $4 million.

But I think it is a fair question to ask you where, in making that determination, you will place your priority; in which areas will you look to save this kind of money?

Mr. Picard: Well, I am sorry, I did not hear the question.

The Chairman: You have, as I understand it, to find $4 million somewhere this year. I was not asking you specifically where you will find it. I am curious to know what your priorities will be in looking for it?

In other words, there are some areas you simply cannot touch and other areas you will.

Do you understand my question?

Mr. Davidson: Yes.

The Chairman: Not the specifics, but what are the priorities in making that kind of judgment?

Mr. Davidson: I think that our priorities are we must maintain our programming budget as intact as we can make it. We may have to make adjustments elsewhere but in terms of budget that we allocate to programming, we must make every effort to keep these funds intact.

I will say this to you that the CBC Management, in this situation, exercise what I think is commendable foresight. I saw this coming.

It was fortunate this year in getting the consent of the Treasury Board to include in the wording of the parliamentary vote, a provision that we could carry over any unexpended balance from this year's operating budget. Mr. Picard and I, very early in the game, anticipating that we might be in some sort of freeze, required a certain portion of this year's budget to be set aside in reserve to protect ourselves against the possibility of a freeze in the coming year. And so we will have some unexpended balance to carry over into next year to meet our increased wage costs and increased capital costs.

Senator Beaubien: $14 million.

Mr. Davidson: More than that. Please do not ask me how much more.

We have protected ourselves against next year. What we would do if there was a repetition of this experience a year later, I do not know. It would be much more serious.

The Chairman: Mr. Fortier, do you have question?

Mr. Fortier: Yes. Just to sum up, Mr. Davidson, if I may: to what extent does the freeze or this restraint prevent the CBC from properly fulfilling its function which Parliament asked it to fulfill when it passed the Broadcasting Act in 1968?

Mr. Davidson: Well, it limits our ability to proceed as quickly as we would like to proceed in terms of extension of services.

Mr. Fortier: Do you feel there is a need in Canada, sir, to proceed quickly in those areas?

Mr. Davidson: Yes. There is a need certainly to proceed quickly in areas which are completely unserved at the present time and to include in unserved areas, I may say, an area in which there is an element of the Canadian population which is not now being served in its mother tongue so we will regard that area as being unserved in respect of that population.

Mr. Fortier: As you said earlier, you are prevented at the moment from extending the CBC?

Mr. Davidson: We are unable to move as quickly towards extension of services as we would like to and as quickly as we think the Canadian people in many of these areas are entitled to because we do not have enough funds to make all the extensions of services that we would like to.

Mr. Fortier: And as indeed Parliament asked you to do.

Mr. Davidson: Well, in fairness to Parliament...

Mr. Fortier: "As the funds become available".

Mr. Davidson: Yes. Parliament says "As the funds become available".

Mr. Picard: Could I add something to that? One is the demand of the CRTC to increase the Canadian content and the cost of Canadian programming is high. This is for next year and obviously it creates a new pressure on the funds.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortier: You're going to save a lot of money because you'll no longer be paying fantastically high prices for American programs.

[Text]

Mr. Picard: Well, the cost of an American program and the cost of a Canadian program is different.

The Chairman: Excuse me, Mr. Fortier and Mr. Picard. I think this might be a useful time to adjourn. I think our reporters might think that they are unserved areas. I promised them a break and I think perhaps they deserve it.

I think we will now, with your forbearance, adjourn for 10 minutes and we will reconvene at 11.50.

—Short recess.

The Chairman: Honourable Senators, if I may call the session back to order. May I say for the benefit of Senators and others it would be my intention that we use the balance of the morning, if this would meet everybody's approval, to deal with other than programming matters. I know many of the Senators have questions on programming. Certainly I do.

Perhaps we could confine ourselves to other matters and heaven knows there are many of them and then we could proceed this afternoon and turn more directly to the question of programming.

I think this would be a sensible arrangement.

It is my understanding that Mr. Picard wishes to make a brief statement.

Mr. Picard: I would like to clarify three points, Mr. Chairman.

One is that on page 95, this is for Senator Beaubien, the interest is not there but this is just a series of statistics on page 95 of our Annual Report.

The statement of operations is on page 90 and 91 with the source of funds and all that so page 95 does not give all the expenses. It gives a series of statistics.

Senator Beaubien: Yes.

Mr. Picard: The second point I would like to make is I think I misunderstood a question about the $4 million. I do not know if the real meaning of the question is that, but the increase in costs for the Corporation is much over $4 million. It is about $12 million to $15 million every year, depending on the kind of increase of services and new stations we buy every year.

It includes an increase in wages and salaries in the order of $8 million to $9 million every year, so it is much over the $4 million about which we were talking.

The Chairman: Senator Beaubien, do you want to comment on that at all or have you any other questions in this area?

Senator Beaubien: Yes, I wanted to ask some questions. In talking about costs of your overseas broadcast—it is in here somewhere...

Mr. Davidson: Yes, international services, $3.5 million.

Senator Beaubien: Mr. Davidson, of that, how much is the cost for the services to the armed forces?

Mr. Davidson: I think I am correct in stating, Senator Beaubien, that the services to the armed forces does not appear in this because it is fully reimbursed by the Department of National Defence.

There is a document in the material that we have supplied to the Committee in advance which indicates a total cost of supplying services to the armed forces overseas.

I could get that for you and present it this afternoon.

Senator Beaubien: Well, it is not in your budget.

Mr. Davidson: Well, I think we are fully reimbursed by National Defence for it.

Senator Beaubien: And as there are less soldiers overseas, they will require less service?

Mr. Davidson: Correct.

Senator Beaubien: On your $3.5 million for the overseas services, exactly what do you do for overseas service?

Mr. Davidson: Well, our overseas service, as you may know, operates out of Montreal. We have a staff of persons there who are experts in different languages and they broadcast to some 26 different countries in Europe. Behind the Iron Curtain, in Africa and in Latin America.

I could give you the names of the countries that we reach and the languages that are used, if it would be of interest to you.

Senator Beaubien: Mr. Davidson, what is our aim? What do we do it for?

Mr. Davidson: Well, I feel the aim is the same essentially as that of all of the countries that engage in world wide broadcasting. We are trying to project an image of Canada abroad.

Senator Beaubien: Is it a sales effort, Mr. Davidson?

Mr. Davidson: Not a sales effort, no. An interpretation of Canada and things Canadian. There is a Canadian presence abroad. There are many Canadians travelling abroad. There is a great interest in immigration to Canada on the part of people from other countries.

I think our reason for having an external service at all is in some respects the same as our reason for having a foreign service.

We do want Canadians to be known by their works and by the kind of people they are. We want to project Canadian music abroad and the story of this country. And I think it is part of this that motivates us to maintain this international service.

It was, as you may know, Senator Beaubien, voted as a separate Parliamentary vote up until 1963-1969 because Parliament was in effect saying that in addition to the responsibility of the CBC to provide broadcasting services within Canada to Canadians, we do feel there is an importance for Canada to have a presence broad as represented by an international broadcasting service and that is the basic purpose of the IBS.

Senator Beaubien: Mr. Davidson, one of your big responsibilities is to serve the unserved, as you call it, areas and so on.

Of the 27 AM stations that you have, how many of them are right in the big centres?

Mr. Davidson: I would say we cover all of the major population centres, but you will notice, if you have that tabulation in front of you, Senator Beaubien, we have 175 auxiliary stations linked up to these 27; and where we will have a radio station in a given community, through the rebroadcaster that is attached to that radio station or through the low power relay transmitter, we will reach the outlying communities with the service that is provided in the city itself.

Senator Beaubien: I was wondering if you could not save a lot of money by closing up the stations where there is adequate coverage already?

Mr. Davidson: I would have to say to you, Senator Beaubien, that in terms of the kind of program service that we think we provide through the CBC radio, there is no other service in the metropolitan areas that has the same kind of service as the CBC radio service.

Most of the commercial radio stations, without reflecting upon the quality of their programming, conform to a certain pattern of program material. They rely upon phonograph records to a very large extent, on frequent news bulletins. They are geared to the local interest of the local population.

There is no radio station in the country that attempts to provide a national broadcasting service and the CBC has got this responsibility put on it by Parliament to provide a national broadcasting service in which the regions of Canada are reflected one to the other.

You can listen to your local radio station. It may be the best station that you can pick. You can listen to your local radio station from morning till night and you will find its program material is either recordings or its non-recorded material is concentrated on matters of local interest. It doesn't pretend to provide anything in the way of a national broadcasting service or a service that reflects the different parts of Canada, one to the other.

I think that is a fair statement. I mean that not as a reflection on the local radio stations but their raison d'être is completely different from that of the CBC national broadcasting service.

Senator Beaubien: Would you say that your TV stations are in the same way different from the other?

The Chairman: Well, Mr. Davidson, just before you answer that, may I say on the radio programming, I have some questions I am going to put myself later on.

Senator Beaubien I have no objection to you putting the question you have but I think perhaps we can deal more with programming this afternoon. I think you have raised an interesting point and one which I would like to discuss but I think I will confine any observations or questions until this afternoon.

I am not ruling your question out of order. So please go ahead and answer it.

Mr. Davidson: Well, I think we would feel the same way about our television service. We have once again the responsibility to provide a national broadcasting service reflecting regional cross-fertilization.

It is true that the CTV Network takes on the dimensions of a national service in the English language but not in the French language.

Our position here is basically the same—that we cannot provide as locally an oriented service and we do not attempt to provide as locally an oriented service as most television broadcasters do; but we do provide a service which is distinctive and different in many respects, not all but in many respects, from that of the private television broadcaster.

Senator Beaubien: I was going to say in the United States they seem to get along very well without a Federal authority getting into broadcasting. It seems hard to understand...

Mr. Davidson: In the United States they do?

The Chairman: No, I think what Senator Beaubien was saying is that there are private stations in Canada which are quite successful.

Mr. Davidson: Did I understand Senator Beaubien to say in the United States they get along...

Senator Beaubien: Well, they have not got a national broadcasting system.

Mr. Davidson: May I say something about that? If we had the power and resources in this country to provide such an overwhelming avalanche of Canadiana to the 200 million Americans, that we would not need to be worried about being drowned in the avalanche that comes across the border from the South.

You might say there is no need for doing anything but leaving it to the private broadcaster; but in a very real sense I believe that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is one of the buttresses, one of the...

Senator Beaubien: Bulwarks.

Mr. Davidson: Bulwarks of Canadianism in this country and with the greatest respect to the private commercial broadcasters, I do not think there would be much chance of avoiding a completely overwhelming domination of the Canadian airways by American program material, if it were left to the private commercial broadcasters.

I think there is evidence of that in the program mix that exists at the present time in the commercial field and in the private field. I will go on and say I think the CBC has gone too far in that direction itself. But, the proposed ruling of the CRTC about Canadian content and the different reaction of the CBC from the reaction of the private broadcasters, I think, tend to remind us that the CBC has done more in terms of Canadian content broadcasting in the past and it is in a better position to meet these more stringent requirements without disruption of their arrangements than are the private broadcasters of the country.

This is why the private broadcasters are so much more concerned about the 60 per cent proposal than is the CBC because the CBC comes very close to meeting it at the present time.

The Chairman: Again I have supplementary questions of that topic but I think I will perhaps hold them until this afternoon.

I do not want to prolong budgetary questions but earlier this morning, I was asking you about priorities, Mr. Davidson. Very often the Senators of this Committee lapse into representing their regional interests.

I would like to represent mine for a moment. I am from Toronto, as you may know. I have no objection to the Montreal consolidation. I think it is very essential. I also hasten to add that Mr. Hallman did not ask me to ask this question.

I must say, as a former broadcaster, and as someone who has spent most of my life in Toronto, and who is interested and knows a little bit about the CBC, I think your facilities there are just barely adequate; in fact I think some of the things are archaic.

The diffusion of facilities is a sight to behold. I hope I am not being parochial but when on earth are you going to do something about this diffusion and confusion in Toronto?

Senator Beaubien: Mr. Davidson gave us a hint, as soon as he gets through Montreal he will start on Toronto.

The Chairman: Well, I could comment on that.

Senator McElman: It is all a matter of priorities, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: No. My question is very serious, as I am sure you know.

Mr. Davidson: I just want to assure you, Senator Davey, that the Corporation management and the Board of the Corporation are actually very much concerned about the situation in Toronto.

They are also very much concerned about the consolidation requirements in a number of our regional centres, notably Vancouver and Halifax.

We will certainly not neglect any opportunity to press the needs of the Corporation in terms of a proper capital plant at the English network centre in Toronto and at these other locations I have mentioned just as soon as we can persuade the Parliament of Canada, and that includes the Senate as well as the House of Commons, that our needs do deserve recognition in terms of a greater measure of financial support than we are able to persuade them that we are entitled to at the present time.

Our real concern here—will you allow me to say this?

The Chairman: Of course.

Mr. Davidson: With great respect everybody's interested in hardware and everybody is interested in buildings and the needs of Toronto touch your heart in terms of the physical capacity.

We cannot have a building in Toronto, we cannot have a plant in Montreal, without having to incur the operating expenses of running that plant. When we are put in a position where on every cent we borrow we have got to pay 8 or 9 per cent interest and add that to our capital repayment schedule and add it to our operating budget, we have to know where we are going in terms of our ability to operate our Corporation successfully, as well as build the building.

I cannot give you a date as to when we are likely to be in a position to move in Toronto because I do not know what the future holds as far as our capital budget is concerned.

The Chairman: I take your point but surely would you not agree with me that there becomes a point when hardware does become a priority.

Have you ever been in Mr. Hallman's office?

Mr. Davidson: Yes, it is a very comfortable office.

The Chairman: He did not ask me to ask you that.

Mr. Davidson: Mid-Victorian in its atmosphere. I would not say it is consistent with Mr. Hallman's outlook on the broadcasting world but...

The Chairman: Well...

Mr. Davidson: Have you ever been in Vancouver where we are operating and we are producing some of the best dramatic programs that we have produced in many a long year in a studio and in a production plant which was an old garage; the ceiling is 12 feet above the floor and how you can produce television programs there, I do not know.

The Chairman: I have not been there, Mr. Davidson, but I have been in the Ottawa headquarters which I think are adequate.

Mr. Davidson: Well, I would be glad to move those some place else if you would like me to.

The Chairman: The point I am making—I agree with you completely—but I think the situation, and I do not want to labour it, in Toronto, which is a major production centre, is just atrocious.

Mr. Davidson: I agree.

The Chairman: Senator Beaubien, I interrupted you.

Senator Beaubien: No, go ahead.

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Davidson, you have spoken of two priorities; one an extension of service to blanket all of these areas where there is presently no service either in French or in English and also the material side of the CBC operations, the hardware.

Supposing Parliament, in its wisdom, decided that your grant would be increased by 100 million. What would be your immediate priorities?

The Chairman: Senator Beaubien just about had a seizure.

Senator Beaubien: I would drop dead.

Mr. Davidson: So would I, Senator Beaubien. I think that our first priority under our mandate is the extension of service, basic service to all the people of the country. This is a very expensive proposition.

I think our second is programming.

Mr. Fortier: Can you make a reasonable forecast as to when all the CBC services will be available to all Canadians or is that...

Mr. Davidson: I was going to say...

Mr. Fortier: ...Utopia.

Mr. Davidson: ...never because there will always be some pockets where there is no service. We have got it down, I think, to a respectably small proportion of the total population.

Mr. Fortier: But our national broadcasting service will never really be national?

Dr. Davidson: Well, when we get the domestic satellite, if you can get the domestic satellite up there with enough earth stations to be able to reach the outlying areas of the country and this is a big "if", you can expect theoretically to get 100 per cent coverage. But the fact is that from the point where we are now, where we have got up to between 95 and 100 per cent coverage, the cost of reaching these marginal numbers of people who are beyond the reach of our television and radio signals now, this cost is fantastically high.

We made an estimate a few years ago of the cost of providing radio coverage to every community 500 and over in Canada and providing television coverage to every community 2,000 and over in Canada—this does not mean 100 per cent of the people—it was going to cost us an additional $63 million three years ago to extend.

Mr. Fortier: A year.

Dr. Davidson: No, the capital to extend the capital plant through rebroadcasters and low power relay transmitters to cover these additional elements of our population.

We are continuing to do this through rebroadcasters and LPRT's and so on up to the present time but frankly we are barely keeping pace with the population growth. We may get an additional 15 or 20 new communities who have grown to their population size that puts them on our list for future coverage.

Mr. Fortier: Do you find there is a point of saturation in those towns where it reaches a certain population quantity-wise and then a local private broadcaster gets into the act.

Mr. Davidson: Not in the areas that are not covered now. The areas that are not covered now are the areas in the Northwest Territories—areas of 2000 or 3000 population for TV, 500 to 1500 for radio.

Mr. Fortier: You do not envisage there will ever be private broadcasters in those areas?

Dr. Davidson: We have encouraged through the Mid-Canada Development Foundation, private broadcasting to enter into big-brother arrangements with communities in the far North for the purpose of helping local communities in the far North that do not have radio services to establish a radio service other than the CBC service. I am glad to say one private station located in Toronto has started off by agreeing it will sponsor a local radio service in a community in the Northwest Territories.

The Chairman: Which station is that?

Mr. Davidson: CHUM.

Mr. Fortier: What about places like Churchill Falls, for example, which has expanded considerably in a very short period of time? I believe you have two stations now in Churchill Falls, one French and one English?

Mr. Davidson: We have an English frontier coverage package and a French frontier coverage package going in now. It has not opened yet, I do not think.

Mr. David: We have radio service in there and now we are starting to give service like on the Island of St. Pierre. There is another scheme with the frontier package in the small communities.

Mr. Davidson: You know what the frontier coverage package is?

Mr. Fortier: Yes, I do.

For example, let us take Churchill Falls. Do you not conceive that now that the taxpayer has effectively paid for the creation of the radio and television stations in a community such as this one, that the private broadcaster will come in?

Mr. Davidson: Churchill Falls may be a bad example because the population of Churchill Falls is projected to decline within a four or five year period once the major construction phase of the operation is complete.

Mr. Fortier: There is a great turnover also, of course.

Mr. Davidson: Yes.

The private broadcaster—and this is what he is in business for—will go into a community where he can make money.

Mr. Fortier: You do not think the CRTC should force him to go into communities where he will not necessarily make money?

Mr. Davidson: The CRTC has taken the position in terms of private network television, the CTV, that it has a responsibility to extend services into marginal communities which are not guaranteed in advance as being money-making centres.

Mr. Fortier: As in the New Brunswick decision of the CRTC.

Mr. Davidson: Well, I am not sure this is a deficit operation that they are engaging in there.

Mr. Fortier: What if the CTV should say "To heck with you, CRTC, we will not do it."

Mr. Davidson: Did you ask Mr. Juneau that question?

Mr. Fortier: Yes, we did.

Mr. Davidson: I will subscribe to his answer, whatever it is.

This is a very interesting question as to the extent to which the CRTC has the right to give any directions or orders to broadcasters, the CBC as well as private broadcasters, that they must build a station some place.

There is no question about their right to say we will not give you a licence to build there but the other question is whether the direction to add to a service is within the purview of the CRTC.

Mr. Fortier: Do you find as president of the Corporation you should not be the only broadcaster obliged to incur expenditures and that private broadcasters also should be obliged.

Mr. Davidson: Well, the CBC certainly thinks that private broadcasters have a public responsibility. They are licenced to exploit the Canadian airwaves, the airwaves, the law says and we all agree, belong to the people of Canada. They are not to be reserved for private exploitation and therefore the private broadcaster who receives a licence to operate, accepts an obligation and it is a matter of spelling out in detail what the extent and nature of that obligation is.

Certainly the obligation extends, in my opinion to serving the people of Canada and serving them in a way that is not solely and exclusively directed to gaining a profit.

Mr. Fortier: If you follow this reasoning to its logical end, I would think I would have to ask you, what you see as the main difference between the so-called private broadcasters using the public waves and the CBC also using the public waves?

Mr. Davidson: Well, I think the difference essentially is, even granted what I have just said, that the private broadcaster does have a responsibility and a public obligation to do something besides use the airwaves to make money.

I think it is still his basic objective in going into the business to make a profit and that is his prime objective. He will pursue that objective while, if he is a good broadcaster giving due consideration to obligations upon him to serve the public in the process of making a profit.

Our position is exactly the reverse. We are in business primarily as a public service broadcasting organization. The making of a profit, while I am not saying it would not be important if it were within the realm of possibility, the commercial aspect of our operations are definitely secondary.

That is demonstrated by the fact that the Broadcasting Act says a great deal about service to the communities of Canada. It says a great deal about programming but it does not say one single word about the commercial operation of the Corporation.

Mr. Fortier: I was going to suggest to be fully consistent, should not the CBC have nothing to do at all with the commercialism, with the business aspect of running a radio or TV network?

Mr. Davidson: With the business of running it or with the commercial aspect of advertising?

Mr. Fortier: Of advertising, yes.

Mr. Davidson: Well, I would myself not wish to see the Corporation entirely remove itself from the commercial side of the operation partly because I think it helps to keep us in touch with the real world in a way we might not if we were off on cloud nine programming without any regard whatever to the community and to the practical tastes and interests of the community which we are supposed to be serving; but I think that Parliament has left it open to the Corporation to decide whether we are in the commercial field or whether we are not.

There is nothing in the Act says we must be or shall not be. What has driven us into the commercial field has been the sheer necessity of receiving additional funds to meet the obligations which we feel we have to meet; that, together with the advice that has been given to us from time to time by successive committees and Commissions of Inquiry like the Glassco Commission, the Fowler Commission; all of which have urged the CBC to get further into the business of commercial advertising than it is already.

When I go before the Treasury Board, instead of them complimenting us because we have raised $40 million from commercial advertising, they say "Why aren't you raising 30 million?"

Senator Beaubien: Mr. Davidson, with this tremendous need for funds all the time, have you ever thought of recommending to the government that the reintroduce the licensing system for radio and TV?

Mr. Davidson: I have discussed this as recently as the last 48 hours with some of my colleagues in the Corporation.

This question arose when I was on my trip to Edmonton in the last two days.

I believe that it would be in effect turning the clock back, Senator Beaubien. The government's policy, as you know, was to have a licence back at the time when radio was the prime instrument of communication. Problems of enforcement were found to be very considerable there. There was a great deal of evasion as there is in the British experience at the present time and they rely upon a licence fee and my own personal view is that a licence fee is in order when you are providing through public means a service which is not made available to the vast majority of people in the community.

If only 50 per cent of Canada were being served by radio and television today, I would say there is a strong case for a licence fee to make certain that those people pay for the service, and the people who did not get the service would not have to pay for it.

Senator Beaubien: How much are you covering now, what percentage?

Mr. Davidson: We are covering 98 per cent in radio and 96 to 97 per cent in television.

Therefore, when you get to that degree of universality, when you get upwards of 6 million television sets in Canada in almost all Canadian homes and when you get more radios in Canada than there are people in Canada—There are more radios in Canada than there are people in this country right now.

Senator Beaubien: What about TV sets?

Mr. Davidson: Between 5½ and 6 million.

Senator Beaubien: TV sets?

Mr. Davidson: TV sets. The device of a licence becomes a little bit contrived and artificial, it seems to me, under those circumstances.

Senator Beaubien: When the radio licence was abolished, of course, the cost to the public of the Corporation was comparatively nothing but now, as you have pointed out, you could make a very good case for spending a lot more money. When you see we are paying the highest taxes in North America now, before any increases, and that your costs are going to go up, it would seem to me that those who use it should pay a small fee.

Mr. Davidson: Well, those that use it are paying for it now. All the people of Canada are using it, except for the one or two per cent, and all the people of Canada are paying for it.

Now, I think there are one or two percentages of the people of Canada who would be justified in saying "We should not be paying for this through taxes because we are not getting any service."

Senator Beaubien: They are probably not paying any taxes either.

Mr. Davidson: That is another question.

The Chairman: I have an editorial here somewhere from the Toronto Star on this question of advertising in the Corporation and it takes the position that the CBC should cease and desist and get right out of the business of selling commercial advertising. I cannot put my hands on it.

Mr. Fortier: It is the last one.

The Chairman: Well, if it is I just could not see it, but I do not need to find it to ask the question. You said that various committees, commissions, the Fowler Commission and others, recommended to you that the CBC should be in the advertising business and when you go to Treasury Board they say "Why have you not sold more advertising?"

What kind of recommendation in this area would you hope this Committee may make? What kind of recommendation would you like to have? Would you like to have this Committee recommend that the CBC get out of commercial advertising or would you like to stay in? What is your own preference?

Mr. Davidson: My own preference is to remain in a limited way in the field of obtaining commercial advertising.

My personal belief is that we are excessively dependent upon commercial advertising now. It is showing signs of affecting the quality and nature of our programming in prime time.

The Chairman: Can you give us some examples of that?

Mr. Davidson: Well, I have seen some dramatic programs on the CBC in the English network in the last few months that were excellent programs that cost several tens of thousands of dollars to produce and I think were harmed by the fact we chopped them up and stuck a commercial in and interrupted the flow and the tension. I do not like to see that. I know why it has to be done.

Senator Beaubien: Is it necessary? I mean, could you not put the advertising on at each end?

Mr. Davidson: Well, your advertiser will not buy it on that basis. They object to what they call the cluster of the advertising.

The Chairman: Do you differentiate in this area of commercial broadcasting as between radio and television in terms of the CBC?

Mr. Davidson: Well, in radio—the commercial revenue we derive from radio is about $2 million a year gross, and it represents such a small element in our total financial picture that I have raised, since I came to the CBC, the question as to whether or not we should not get out of advertising on radio even if we have to stay in on television.

Financial necessity keeps us in it in television. You cannot throw away $30 million lightly. You cannot even throw away $1 million lightly.

The Chairman: Could you comment on the adequacy of your advertising sales solicitation department.

Mr. Davidson: Well, I have to rely here on the advice of the officers of the Corporation who are directly responsible.

Mr. David and Mr. Hallman can give their own view of this.

I have to except the view and I do accept the view, that our sales force is competent, it is able, it is aggressive. We are getting complaints from the competition about the extent to which we are affecting their viability. They blame it on what they call our subsidized rates, which if of course an inaccurate way to describe it.

The Chairman: I wanted to ask you about that because this Committee has heard a great deal about this, in submission after submission after submission and as recently as yesterday when we had the weekly publishers. We had the magazine people a week or two ago.

Recurring in these briefs is this theme that the CBC is subsidized and it is unfair commercial competition to these various other media.

I wish you would expand upon your views in this area.

Mr. Davidson: Well, I would like very much to have all of the newspapers and the radio and television stations in Canada which compete with us for the advertising dollar get out of the business too.

You know, I would like to have the field all to myself because that would give me the whole pot of advertising money; and if that were the case, I could set my rates at any level I wanted to. I could make a mint of money. I would not have to worry about anything.

I do not blame the competition for saying they would like the CBC to get out of the advertising field and for using every complaint that they can use and every argument that they can use, which is that we are subsidized by the government, and saying this is unfair.

We are not subsidized by the government to provide advertising competition to the commercial stations or the newspapers. We are subsidized by the government to provide a public broadcasting service to the people of Canada. We are using advertising as a means of reducing the dead weight burden of the post to the people of Canada.

That is what we are doing. When we produce a program, which it is our responsibility to produce, a good dramatic program or a good dramatic hour, it costs us $25,000 or 30,000 to produce or more than that sometimes, and we cannot go to an advertiser and ask him to pay the $30,000 plus station and network charges for that program because he could not buy it at that price. He will buy an American network program that the private stations or ourselves are willing to supply him for a much lower price.

We therefore have to make up our minds. Are we going to continue to make the people of Canada bear the entire cost of that program or are we going to try to recover what we can recover and relieve to that extent, as much as is possible, the burden on the Canadian taxpayer.

We resort to this last device and we try to recover from the advertiser, to whom we sell that program, as much as we can get him to pay for it. What he will pay for it, he measures in accordance with what he can buy another program for.

Therefore we have to sell to the Canadian advertiser expensive Canadian programs at about the same price he can buy a relatively inexpensive U.S. program for.

That is what governs our position and it is a distortion of the facts to interpret that as meaning we are subsidizing the Canadian advertiser.

The Canadian advertiser, it would be just as accurate to state, is subsidizing the Canadian taxpayer by taking that much of the burden of program production costs off the Canadian taxpayer's shoulders.

Now, neither one of those statements is an accurate presentation of the facts.

The Chairman: Yes, Mr. Picard.

Mr. Picard: Well, there are three minor points I would like to make. First of all there is the affiliate system—we are giving money to the affiliate when we get money from the advertiser—so if you are thinking of getting out of advertising, you are creating a problem for the affiliates which very often get the marginal income they need from CBC advertising.

The Chairman: Yes, but what proportion?

Mr. Fortier: What is the proportion they get?

Mr. Picard: It is $5 million.

Mr. Fortier: What proportion of the advertising revenue is paid over to the affiliate stations?

Mr. Picard: $5 million.

Mr. Fortier: Out of $40 million?

Mr. Picard: Yes. That is the first point. The second one is...

Senator McElman: Is that radio and TV?

Mr. Picard: Yes, I think so.

Senator Beaubien: What are the affiliates?

Mr. Picard: The affiliates are stations which are not wholly owned by the CBC but are carrying part of our programs. They are mostly serving markets which are low density markets and not high density markets.

The second point I would like to make is that most stations who ask for a licence in the past—this was true of the third network—always put it on the basis that when a new station comes on the market, it might slow down for a while the advertising that comes for other stations.

After awhile all stations go faster than in the past because of the effect of a new outlet for advertising, which tends to increase by that much the advertising revenue of the total group of stations there. So while on the one hand they come to the CRTC and say that, on the other hand they want to have the CBC out of advertising and I think this is a very strong contradiction.

The third point I would like to make is that the programs which cost more are Canadian programs. We have more Canadian programs than the private network. The programs which sell less are Canadian programs, so that inasmuch as we are making more Canadian programs, we are less of a competitor than the station which provides more American programs.

Mr. Fortier: Yes, but do you not direct advertising to the Canadian programs rather than the U.S. programs?

Mr. Picard: We try to direct it but it is harder to sell Canadian programs than American programs, so that you cannot pay for Canadian programs out of advertising.

Senator Beaubien: Mr. Chairman, I have an engagement I have to go to. Are we going to be much longer?

The Chairman: Yes. I would like to sit until one o'clock, Senator Beaubien, if we can. We are not going to sit this evening.

Senator Beaubien: No, but we are sitting at two o'clock.

The Chairman: No, 2.30.
Yes, Mr. Davidson.

Mr. Davidson: I was going to say that our experience in trying to sell Canadian and American programs drives us into a position where in selling we package two together so that if an advertiser wants to get a piece of the choice U.S. program, we may say to him "We can give you a piece of that choice U.S. program, if you will also buy a piece of a choice Canadian program."

Mr. Fortier: What if he says "No."

Mr. Davidson: He does not get the U.S. program.

Mr. Fortier: And you do not get his dollars?

Mr. Davidson: No, we do not get his dollars.

Mr. Fortier: And he does not get the advertising.

Mr. Davidson: No.

Senator Beaubien: May I ask a supplementary?

The Chairman: Yes, Senator Beaubien.

Senator Beaubien: Mr. Davidson, is there any reason why the Canadian programs would cost a lot more?

Mr. Davidson: Oh yes.

Senator Beaubien: Why would that be?

Mr. Davidson: Because you get an American program like, let us take, "Bonanza".

Senator Beaubien: You mean because it is sold on a big big market?

Mr. Davidson: Yes, they will spend $200,000 on every episode of "Bonanza". Their costs are much higher than ours but they can spread the cost and when it comes to the Canadian market—I do not like to use the word "dumping" but they are dumping their U.S. programs into the Canadian market at prices that are far lower than what we can produce a comparable program for simply because they have got the distribution and the market and the volume and we have not.

Senator Beaubien: It is the same thing with Life and Time, of course. Every copy of Time would cost a tremendous amount of money but they sell it all over the world.

Mr. Davidson: That is correct.

Senator McElman: What about the rate Mr. Chairman? Are the rates you charge approximately parallel with what the CTV would be charging?

Mr. Davidson: We can argue about that endlessly, Senator McElman.

Senator McElman: I did not want to go into detail but in general terms.

Mr. Davidson: Well, if you look at what we sell a minute of advertising for, you will probably conclude that we were selling below CTV.

If you look at it in another context as to how many thousands of viewers you deliver, and we regard that as being a valid rate, our rates are comparable.

We keep them competitive.

Senator McElman: Then in this sense you would regard that instead of other media, when they talk about the advertising dollar, they should be talking, not about the CBC, but they should be talking about television as such as their competitor.

Mr. Davidson: Well, they cannot complain about CTV because CTV is in the money-making business. They operate a strictly commercial enterprise, the same as individual stations or the newspaper business; but CTV is not under the same obligation as we are to produce Canadian content program, in the volume we produce Canadian content programming, at the cost levels that we produce Canadian content programming.

With all respect to CTV, you do not see very many major productions of ballet or orchestral programming or drama, of heavy serious music. You do not see a great many of those on the CTV network. A limited number they produce. The amount of money they spend on Canadian talent compared to the amount of money that the CBC spends on Canadian talent, music, dancing, ballet and all the rest of it—I refrain from giving you his figures but there is a very real contrast between the amounts of money that are spent by the respective networks in this area.

Senator McElman: To take it another way, if I may. What is the total TV advertising dollar in Canada and what is the breakdown between the CBC? You get approximately 30 million from television.

Mr. Davidson: $38 million gross of which a certain amount has to go to the advertising agencies and a certain amount has to go to affiliates so we get about $28 million net.

Senator Beaubien: That is only $41 million for the whole operation and only $3 million for radio?

Mr. Davidson: Yes.

The Chairman: Yes.

Mr. Davidson: $2 million for radio.

Senator McElman: I would like to get this breakdown if it is, in general terms, available, Mr. Chairman, because I think it will give us a much better picture.

The Chairman: I am sure we have it, Senator McElman.

Senator Beaubien: Is he talking of total radio advertising?

The Chairman: No, he is talking of total advertising and total expenditures.

Senator McElman: In view of all the testimony we have had, I think it would be useful on the record, Mr. Chairman, to have that.

Mr. Davidson: Have what, Senator McElman?

Senator McElman: The total TV advertising dollar in Canada and how much of this breaks out to CTV and how much to CBC?

Senator Beaubien: And radio too.

Senator McElman: I would like to stick to television.

Senator Beaubien: But radio is very important if you are only getting $2 million.

Mr. Davidson: Well, I do not think we are in a position to give you the CTV figures. We may be able to give you from the Dominion Bureau of Statistics the total television advertising revenues and of that how much is CBC and how much is private but the private would include the CTV and a great many others as well.

Senator McElman: That is what I want.

The Chairman: I think we have some figures here. Perhaps Mr. Hallman or Mr. David could refer to them for us.

Mr. David: What is the basis? Vis-a-vis net advertising revenue, broadcasting industry CBC $30 million, private $180 million for a total of $210 million.

[Translation]

Mr. David: It's on page 72 of our Annual Report Table 20. It states: "Net Advertising Revenue Broadcasting Industry: C.B.C., 30 and Private, 180, making a total of $210,000,000."

Senator Beaubien: $210,000,000?

Mr. Fortier: 15 per cent.

Senator Beaubien: And what about radio, have you any figures for radio?

Mr. David: It says "Broadcasting Industry" which means radio and television.

Mr. Picard: All the figures are in the D.B.S. Report.

[English]

The Chairman: Mr. Picard, the book is covering your microphone, I think.

Mr. Picard: I said in the publication of DBS, 56-204 Radio and Television Broadcasting, you have all this data separated from private and CBC.

The Chairman: I am sure we have that file in our office across the road but you would like to get it on the record now?

Senator McElman: Yes. I want it on the record because of the testimony that has gone on the record already and because I think it points out for us on the record where the real competition for the advertising dollar lies.

The Chairman: This may be the information you want, the growth rates.

Mr. Hallman has just pointed out to me that the CBC has gone from $23 million to $30 million from 1962 to 1968. Private television networks have gone in the same period from $93 million in 1962 to $180 million, and this is an estimate so it is a total of $210 million.

Perhaps I could give you the figures for 1962 and for 1968 just for comparison. They have here in 1962 the CBC $23 million, private $93 million, all media $641 million.

Then in 1968 the CBC is $30 million, private is $180 million and all media is $978 million. That, of course, is now passed the billion dollars, as you know.

Senator Beaubien: What does "all media" cover?

The Chairman: That includes everything, newspaper, radio, magazine, bill boards, everything.

Senator Beaubien: But the radio figure is not separated anywhere?

The Chairman: We have that as well.

Senator Beaubien: That will be in there then?

The Chairman: Well, it is not in this report but we can get the radio figures for you.

Senator Beaubien: I think that would be very interesting to see, Mr. Chairman, to have the breakdown for radio.

Mr. Picard: Can I give you the figures for all private stations, $93 million in 1968?

The Chairman: In radio?

Mr. Picard: In radio.

Senator Beaubien: How much?

Mr. Picard: $93 million.

Mr. Davidson: Ours is $2 million of that.

Senator Beaubien: Yours is $2 million.

Senator McElman: So, Mr. Chairman, the growth pattern then from 1962 to 1968 shows that the public broadcaster the CBC has increased four fold while the private broadcasting revenue from advertising has increased six fold. That points up rather clearly...

The Chairman: No, I think you are wrong. Would you state your statistics again.

Senator McElman: I am sorry. The private was four times in 1962 what the public was and it has now become in 1968 six times the public.

The Chairman: That is correct.

Senator McElman: So that rather points up where the competition lies for the advertising dollar.

Mr. Davidson: When the weekly newspapers worry about our taking $30 million of the advertising pool, one wonders why they do not worry even more about private broadcasting taking $180 million.

Senator McElman: This is the hole in the testimony I wanted to get at. Your data it seems to me is accurate and that points up quite clearly what the situation is.

The Chairman: I wonder if I may ask Mr. Hallman a question which I think is related to this subject. Those people who think that the CBC should be in the advertising business—and we have had those before the Committee as well—tell us that your Commercial Acceptance Department, if I quote one of the people who stated this to us correctly, does its very best to make it impossible to buy time of CBC television and radio.

The example that was given, Mr. Hallman, was a radio example and it was some years ago—I should not say some years ago—certainly, as I understand it, it was within the time on the chart.

As I understand it it was a local advertiser in Toronto who purchased time and the announcement said that the TTC stopped in front of his particular establishment. The Commercial Acceptance rejected that and it had to come back to Ottawa for a ruling. There was a great long bureaucratic procedure and the copy was amended to read that "the streetcar stops in front of this establishment" and that was accepted.

Is this a real problem, and does it still exist?

Mr. Hallman: Well, I think we do regularly review our commercial acceptance policy. I think we should be very proud of the kinds of standards that Commercial Acceptance over the years has established, not only in the CBC but I think in a great degree throughout the broadcasting industry in this country.

I think there was a period perhaps when our standards were somewhat rigid, somewhat closed, but the case you cited, I think, Mr. Chairman, is an indication of the way in which piggy back riding of one advertiser on another is possible.

There are all sorts of commercial messages on television and on radio in which somebody will in fact plug another product.

The Chairman: That is hardly plugging another product. The TTC, you know, is the only streetcar service in Toronto.

Mr. Hallman: Yes, but the TTC also spends advertising dollars. It has to. It is a service that is selling its product to the public. It may be subsidized heavily but it also is, as any other enterprise, purchasing advertising space in every medium.

If we were to do this and somebody else did not, then we would be equally criticized for being unfair.

The Chairman: Do you not think that the Toronto Star would accept that ad, and do you not think that CFRB would accept that ad, and do you not think that CFTO would accept that ad, and do you not lose business because you did not accept that ad?

Mr. Hallman: I think this is a specific case in point. It may be true. I agree with the principle, on the other hand...

The Chairman: I agree.

Mr. Hallman: ...of maintaining the integrity of the advertiser where he spends his money for a particular message and no one should get a free ride on his back.

Mr. Davidson: You do not know how many times there is the temptation on the part of an advertiser to go to somebody who is appearing on the television screen, an announcer or commentator, and try to persuade him that if he were holding for example a package of the right kind of cigarettes in his hand—this was in the days when we accepted cigarette advertising—that this would be a very natural thing for him to be doing while he is making his announcement.

You get this back door approach to advertising.

The Chairman: It is called "payola" I think.

Mr. Davidson: It is a perfectly legitimate attempt on the part of the advertiser.

The Chairman: Does that still happen?

Mr. Davidson: There is nothing wrong with it if you can get away with it.

The Chairman: Where do you draw the line?

Mr. Davidson: This is exactly Mr. Hallman's point.

The Chairman: I heard on CBC radio, to which I listen quite regularly, Gerussi is doing a promotion of sorts with the Lloyd Percival Fitness Institute and the Toronto Telegram.

Well, the Lloyd Percival Fitness Institute and the Toronto Telegram are both in business just as the TTC is and probably more. I would agree there is so much judgment involved and perhaps I may seem critical. I am not being critical. It seems to me in your very ambivalence in your commercial business you are maybe getting the worst of both worlds.

Mr. Hallman: Well, I do not think we are as ambivalent as is being suggested by these examples, Mr. Chairman.

I think when we compete we are as aggressive as anyone else in the business. Certainly our affiliates keep us on our toes. We have got to maintain a flow of revenue to those who distribute the national service in those markets in which we do not operate stations.

I think that is something that tends to be forgotten sometimes. They take a great deal of national programming for which there is no advertising. Their only income from being part of the CBC network is really those sponsored programs or programs which accommodate advertising.

I think that is very critical and particularly in the minor markets. It is not so critical in the major urban areas but in these minor markets it is of major importance—at Swift Current or Medicine Hat or a small station—because the proportion of national advertising business he can get on his own is really very limited.

I think we have to be aggressive in this. I think our commercial acceptance policy is under constant review and we do not want to be either Victorian in our approach or purer than pure.

I think, as the President has said, there are bound to be people who want to come in with certain products and so on. We are not going to write off any policy that that is permissible. We try to monitor it and supervise it as much as is possible.

The Chairman: There is an evolutionary process in your commercial acceptance, is there not? There are Pilots, for example...

Mr. Hallman: Yes.

The Chairman: Which are now acceptable on CBC that were not last year or one year ago?

Mr. Hallman: Yes.

Mr. Davidson: Yes, definitely. I think Mr. Hallman would agree that the TTC example draws the line pretty fine in terms of this differentiation we try to make.

The Chairman: Well, the client was Woodbine Race Track and I think the people who go out there by streetcar do not really care how they get there, as long as they get there, but basically you do not think your Commercial Acceptance Department is a road block and that is what I wanted to find out.

Are there any other questions on this area, Mr. Fortier?

Mr. Fortier: Another aspect of the commercialization of the CBC, but one which has nothing to do with advertising, is in your program purchases. We have heard it suggested that you can compete unfairly with the CTV Network and the example which was given was the program "Laugh-In". CTV first bought Laugh-In and when it proved to be a success then you went out a year or two later and outbid them. They said "That is the taxpayers' money and we could not do a thing about that."

What is your attitude about that? Do you feel that is exactly the sort of thing that the CBC should be doing? It should be able to outbid a private TV station in order to bring in an American program.

Mr. Davidson: Not irresponsibly, no, but where there are valid reasons for differentiation in the amount of the bid, there is a valid reason for doing so.

Mr. Fortier: What would be the valid reason?

Mr. Davidson: Private enterprise wants competition, does it not?

Mr. Fortier: That is what they keep saying?

Mr. Davidson: All right. When they get competition, sometimes they do not like it too much.

Mr. Fortier: Because they say it is private enterprise on the one hand and it is public funds on the other.

Mr. Davidson: In one case the CTV is buying the "Laugh-In" program as a sleeper, as an unknown program at the time.

When the time came for us to bid on it it was the number one program in the U.S.A. and it has a very high rating in Canada. Obviously that program is worth more when the second round of bidding comes along than the first round of bidding.

Number two: CTV is purchasing for showing over 14 stations. When we bid on a program we are purchasing it for showing on 11 English language television stations plus 20 affiliates. We are purchasing it for showing to a larger potential audience than CTV and that affects the price that we pay.

The Chairman: How much larger?

Mr. Davidson: Well, Murray Chercover and I disagree on this. We say it is about one third larger. Murray Chercover, I think, was not prepared to go beyond 18 per cent but anyway it is larger and this affects the price.

I would like to know what the CTV bid on that program when the second round of bidding came along.

And I will bet it was a good deal closer to the price that we finally paid for the program than the price they refer to as being the price they originally paid for it.

The Chairman: Mr. Hallman wants to comment on this, I think.

Mr. Hallman: I think there are two very important aspects to this and I think the President has indicated the basic situation. The CTV occasionally outbids us. I think that should be known right off the bat even on a much more limited basis of a market situation in which they are looking for a particular kind of program.

The Chairman: Would it be fair to ask you for an example of a program in which they outbid you?

Mr. Hallman: I would rather not.

I think this would be unfair to our colleagues in CTV.

Mr. Fortier: Perhaps the Chairman is thinking of football.

Mr. Hallman: Well, there was a program replacement in the last six weeks.

In addition to this I think the question has been raised in relation to our being in or out of the commercial business.

If we were out, we would still have to compete in the market for the best programs we can get for the audiences that are not served by any other broadcasting agency, and for us to reduce our competitive situation in respect to the 40-odd stations that we serve compared to 12 serving a more limited area...I think the BBC outbids ITA in the U.K. all the time. They have to. This is the nature of the enterprise that we are involved in and it is not purely a matter of commercial activities. It is serving the audience.

Mr. Fortier: Which would lead me to take the suggestion which has been made in some quarters that not only should the CBC withdraw from the commercial sector, both from the aspect of advertising and also the aspect of purchasing U.S. programs, but they should become exclusively an exhibitor of Canadian talent or a producer of Canadian programs exclusively.

Mr. Hallman: Well, I would think this would be a disaster for Canada. I think one of the major responsibilities and one of the major reasons for the Corporation in radio or in television is not simply to be Canadian. This is its initial impetus but also it should record the best from the rest of the world.

If you determine that on a purely market basis, in which a program has to perform exclusively in the market place, in terms of earning advertising revenues, this would exclude very important kinds of services which we think the public, which is financing the Corporation, wants us to provide, whether it be Sir Kenneth Clark's Civilisation or the Forsythe Saga or programs of a major character which are not going to be attractive to advertisers; but they should be available to Canadians, and I think to make us exclusively and narrowly Canadian would really be detrimental to the services we should provide to the Canadian people.

The purely market broadcaster is naturally constrained by the market place, by having to show a profit. He has that as his primary obligation. Our job is to provide a varied and comprehensive service.

The Chairman: I think perhaps that may be a useful point at which we can adjourn although I will take your supplementary question, Senator Beaubien.

Senator Beaubien: Mr. Hallman, in getting a top rated American program, do you earn any money indirectly?

Mr. Hallman: Do we earn...?

Senator Beaubien: Does it earn you any money indirectly? Does it give you a better rating to the people who look at it?

Mr. Hallman: A major U.K. or U.S. program with which the advertiser is associated, pays for itself. The advertiser pays the full cost of the program. He pays for the time and micro-wave for distributing the program and showing it on all of the stations. Really the aggregate cost of a very large network like the Corporation in English means he has to pay a good deal.

Senator Beaubien: Then, Mr. Hallman, when you outbid the CTV on this program about which we were talking, you did not necessarily use any money?

Mr. Hallman: Oh no, not at all.

Senator Beaubien: Well, I just wondered.

Mr. Davidson: We made money.

Senator Beaubien: Well, that is what I hoped.

The Chairman: Perhaps, Mr. Davidson, it will comfort you over the noonhour break to know that you have made Senator Beaubien's lunch hour happier.

I am going to suggest that we adjourn now. We will be back at 2.30 and while we will tend to concentrate on programming or should I say focus on programming—do you wish to make a comment?

Mr. Fraser: Mr. Chairman, if you wanted those mail figures for any reason, we have them.

The Chairman: Do you want to read them?

Mr. Fraser: Yes. There are two types of mail. There is spontaneous mail and solicited mail. I assume from the conversation this morning the Senators were interested in spontaneous mail.

The Chairman: Yes.

Mr. Fraser: The English service in the 1968-1969 fiscal year received 29,140 and the French service 4,800 for a total of 33,940.

Solicited mail-English 42,350 and French 278,900 and that total would be something close to 325,000 roughly.

Senator Beaubien: 325,000 all told?

Mr. Fraser: That would be just solicited, Senator.

Mr. Fortier: Would you care to explain the discrepancy between the French solicited and the English solicited.

Mr. Fraser: Yes, it would depend on the type of program. There might have been contests and the solicited mail would include contests and thus the discrepancies.

The Chairman: Thank you, Mr. Fraser.

Now, this afternoon at 2.30 we will not necessarily be confined to programming but I think we might try to focus there.

The meeting is adjourned. Thank you.

Upon resuming at 2:30 p.m.

The Chairman: Honourable Senators and ladies and gentlemen, perhaps I could call the session to order, and I would be remiss, I think, if I didn't welcome Senator Quart back. She has been ill, and we are happy you are back. You are recovered, I hope?

Senator Quart: No, I have come to share my microbes; share and share alike!

The Chairman: To resume perhaps, Mr. Davidson, I could put a rather general question to you: I think it's rather germane to the work of the Committee, and I think it would be of great interest. I think it is fair to say, as a rule of thumb, that at great many Canadians seem to approve of the idea of public broadcasting in general and the CBC in particular. Perhaps instead of many Canadians, I could even say "most Canadians"; yet, at the same time, the CBC is the most unloved institution in the country.

Now, I am wondering, is there something more to this than the normal antagonism which pertains towards any government agency?

Dr. George Davidson: I think there is, Mr. Chairman. I was invited out to Vancouver on the 14th of February to speak on the subject, "Do Canadians Really Love the CBC?", and I took the liberty of changing the subject to another slightly related subject, and I spoke on "Does Any Canadian Really Love the CBC?" because there are times when, on the basis of the mail response, we begin to wonder if anybody listens to—feels kindly disposed to us.

I think there is some explanation for this. Mr. Chairman, arising from what it is that the CBC is endeavouring to do. The CBC is endeavouring to use basically a single channel of communication to fifteen, sixteen million English-speaking people in Canada all at the same time, and a single channel of communication to six million French-speaking people of Canada all at the same time. Those are people of diverse tastes, and diverse interests; and whereas if you were writing a letter to the individuals who make up the Canadian population, you could tailor your letter to the particular personality of the individual Canadian to whom you were writing, when you are broadcasting, you are broadcasting exactly the same programme fare at a given hour of the day to all of the people who happen to be tuned in to that particular programme. Now, our job, according to our mandate, is to provide a balanced fare of entertainment, information and enlightenment to Canadians of all ages, in all parts of Canada, representing different interests and you know how the wording of the Act requires us to do all of these things at the same time.

We have two options. One is to provide what I call "mass audience programming"—something that is reduced to the lowest common denominator of acceptability and taste and is designed therefore to get by with pleasing the largest possible number of people. There is a certain sameness that develops from that programming approach.

The other programming approach—and the one which we adopt because we believe that it is our responsibility to follow this alternative course—is to programme a wide variety of programmes, most of which appeal to minority audiences. We may have a programme called “Action Set” on Saturday morning that is designed to appeal to the teenage group who are listening and if it appeals to the teenage groups, it’s almost certain that it will not appeal to the middle-aged and older group who are listening at this particular point in time. We will have a...

The Chairman: Am I middle-aged or old-aged?

Mr. Davidson: It is in the eye of the beholder!

The Chairman: I make the point simply to aver that I do listen to “Action Set” and as a matter of fact, last Saturday morning there was an interview on it about life in Northern Canada. That should be on the broad service; it was so interesting.

Mr. Davidson: Well, I am glad to hear it, but basically I think my point really still is that there are certain programmes which we aim at the younger people, and when those programmes are aimed at the younger people, the tendency is for the older listener to whom that programme is not being specifically directed to say, “Well, this doesn’t interest me. I will turn over to another station. Why is this on the air?”, and in the same way, you will get drama. A reference was made this morning by Senator Smith, I think it was, to the kinds of programmes we put out from time to time based upon the theme of the permissive society.

Some of our dramatic productions, I am sure some of the Senators will think, are pretty racy. They question whether we should be dealing with these kinds of subject matter. We are living, however, in a permissive society in which tastes and concepts of living standards and moral standards change. There is a substantial segment of the Canadian population that is interested in the kind of dramatic productions that some of us in this room would not approve of and would not, naturally, want to see. We try to provide a varied fare that will appeal at different times to the different elements in our Canadian population.

We had a programme series last year called “Festival” and we received violent complaints from some segments of the Canadian community about certain of the programmes that we put on in that series on the grounds that they were off-colour; that they weren’t suitable family viewing, but in that same series, we had dramatic productions like “Reddick”, for example, which was the story in two parts of a clergyman and the effort he was making to deal with a hippie element in his particular parish. That was part of that total “Festival” series, and we tried to introduce into that “Festival” series a variety of different dramas, some of which would appeal to different segments of the population, others of which would be objected to as dull or even more than dull. We do the same thing with our Public Affairs programming.

The Chairman: Let’s for a moment stay with the permissive society. Your brief said at page 20 that the permissive society was not created by the mass media. Has the permissive society, on which, incidentally, I am not passing judgment at this point in time, but has the permissive society advanced because of the mass media; in other words, didn’t the CBC perhaps offer leadership in the permissive society?

Mr. Davidson: This is a matter of opinion, Mr. Chairman, in which everyone, I suppose, is the oracle. I would have to say that I do not believe that the CBC, or the broadcasters as a group, can be said to be leading the way in the development and the encouragement of the permissive society.

What we are doing is reflecting the facts of today’s living and world, and in doing that, we are reflecting the trend in the direction of the permissive society.

The Chairman: Where should the line be drawn?

Mr. Davidson: The line should not be drawn in terms of concealing from Canadians the facts of life and social change in Canada. I think that if I may say so, a great many of the complaints and criticisms that we get about the permissive society and about the unpalatable elements of Canadian life and society that we portray on the screen, come from people who wish that the trends that they see reflected in our programmes were not developing in the direction in which they were developing. It is this, the wish that these things were not happening to our Canadian society that prompts individuals to say, "You shouldn't show that on the screen because it is not a good thing to encourage that sort of thinking or that sort of trend".

Very relatively seldom in this kind of argument, do you get the proposition that what we are showing is not, in fact, happening to our society. When we are showing something on the screen about the developments in the field of use of drugs, people don't complain about the fact that that isn't true, that that isn't happening—the people are saying, "You should really soft-pedal that. You should not show that it's happening to the extent that you show it's happening."

The Chairman: How quickly should you respond to what's happening? Let me be more specific. The best selling book in Canada not many weeks ago was, for example, "Portnoy's Complaint". It contains all the four-letter words. The movie, "I am Curious (Yellow)" was running certainly in Toronto and, I believe, presently in Ottawa, and yet I doubt if you would run the movie "I am Curious (Yellow)" on the CBC. Perhaps you would. But there is a line that's drawn, and I would like to know if you could tell us, Mr. Davidson, where you draw it. Where do you make that judgment?

Mr. Davidson: Well, it is a difficult if not an impossible question to answer. Obviously, you cannot be running at the head of every fad or trend that develops in our Canadian community.

There are a great many groups and individuals who pride themselves on being avant-garde and who want to beat the head of every parade in development. I don't think that this is the place for the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation to be in every instance.

I do not feel that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation have to maintain pace with the essential developments of our Canadian society, and we have to rely upon the judgment of our programming people to maintain a balance between what are the elements of change in our social customs, in our attitudes, which should be reflected on the screens, and what are the peripheral extremist, avant-garde attitudes which do not represent mainstream development.

The Chairman: But presumably this is set against a background also of regional problems. We had the weekly newspaper editors yesterday, and I asked the publisher of the paper in Estevan if he had ever done in-depth articles on drug problems and he said, "Well, there isn't a drug problem in Estevan".

I am sure that the permissive society is more advanced in Toronto, for example, than—perhaps I am wrong—please correct me. It may be more advanced in Toronto than it is in Red Deer. That must be a problem for you.

Mr. Davidson: This is a very real problem, and I think this accounts for quite a lot of the criticism that we get about some of our dramatic productions, for example, where you are producing in Mr. Hallman's Toronto network centre a dramatic production which perhaps is not unacceptable, at least it's not going to raise a storm of protest from your Toronto viewing audiences, but because the Toronto viewing audiences among other things have a choice of channels, and if they turn on the CBC and they see something that they don't think is what they want to see, that they don't regard as being suitable for family showing, or it's not right for some other reason—they can at least turn their dial to another channel and get something that is more acceptable to them; but if you are out in Nokomis, Saskatchewan, it may very well be that the CBC is the only channel that you have got to watch, and you either watch what's coming over the CBC on Sunday night or Wednesday night or you don't watch anything at all. If what CBC happens to be broadcasting at that particular point in time is a programme that is more urban-centred or more sophisticated than that community is accustomed to seeing, and they regard as being good family viewing, they can't turn elsewhere for their entertainment, and they resent the fact that they have only one channel to watch. They have got to turn it off if they don't like it, and they are taxpayers like anybody else, and this is where we get a great deal of trouble.

The Chairman: Mr. Fortier, you have a supplementary?

Mr. Yves Fortier: Yes, Mr. Davidson, in the brief under the heading of "The Permissive Society", you raise a very important question, and I wonder if you have any study presently being made at the Corporation, that is, the extent to which the presence of a mass media particularly television, acts as a precipitant of these events themselves? Is there any study being made at the CBC or on behalf of the CBC in this respect?

Mr. Davidson: I don't think I could honestly say that we are making a formal study, Mr. Fortier. What we are doing and have done for sometime—we have tried to gather together the experience and experiences of other broadcasting organizations, particularly networks on the U.S. side of the line which have had experience in this field. We know of certain situations—the Chicago situation is one—other situations at Columbia University present other examples. We have had some examples in Canada where there has been reason to believe that the presence of the visible, the large-scale television apparatus, has aggravated a situation, and we have, in some instance, deliberately played down our part in this situation by leaving our heavy equipment at home and sending out a single cameraman with a portable piece of equipment that is designed to attract as little attention as possible, and our cameraman arrives on the scene with his little visible equipment, trying to be as inconspicuous as possible. He finds all the rival television broadcasters there with their mobile vans, their floodlights, and sometimes you really wonder just what good it is unless there were a concerted approach to the problem.

Mr. Fortier: Yes. Has the CBC ever suggested a concerted approach to that problem with the independent networks?

Mr. Davidson: I can't say that we have, but I think we do appreciate that there is a problem here. We have tried in individual instances to do our part in playing it down, and haven't felt completely rewarded by the results of our experience.

Mr. Fortier: Are there any subjects which are considered to be taboo by the CBC? Let's speak of television first and then turn to radio.

Mr. Davidson: I would like to turn this one over to those who are closer to it.

The Chairman: Mr. Hallman?

Mr. Hallman: I think the traditional position has been that there are no taboo subjects. I think it's really the treatment that is the critical aspect of it. Anything that is unthinkable cannot be dealt with. If you think of anything, one really has to make a judgment then whether the treatment, verbally or visually, can be handled in an appropriate manner; so, I don't think there are subjects which are taboo.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortier: Mr. David?

Mr. David: I should like to add something. Obviously we are talking about drama and there are plays that are, shall we say, daring, and of course, cause some shock to the sensitivity of a large part of the population. What we are mainly trying to do is to put on the schedule programs that might once again clash with people's feelings or else beliefs. A wide part of the population will be affected. So we're going to carry that on the schedule in the period, let's say, after 10 o'clock. We have seen, dramas that had been prepared for "Les Beaux Dimanches" and were to be shown around eight thirty, and then after going into the matter with the producer we decided to put on those programs at ten o'clock, or else some films. As you know, we have film programs at the end of the evening, while the President still puts up with them. At the end of the evening we show films with pretty special moral problems, and we play much more with the schedule than in a rigid value position.

Mr. Fortier: In this area of films have the views of the CBC changed? Have the morals of the CBC changed along with the malaises of the time?

Mr. David: Quite. I remember the time when there were problems with "Hiroshima, Mon Amour". A few years ago, we had to put that on at the very end of the evening. Now there is no longer any hesitation about a film like that. The CBC has been changing at the same time as society in the widest sense of the word.

Mr. Fortier: Has it been changing at the same time, as you are saying, or has it been changing ahead of society generally?

Mr. David: We can make the same distinction as a little while ago. In French Canada, we can be sure, the change is much faster in say, a city like Montreal than in the more remote regions, and it's more the change in Montreal that has inspired our action. And there again you sometimes have thing that would be acceptable in Montreal, and not elsewhere, and we do the best we can to find a balance among the changes in the various communities. It's quite certain now that television, according to the sociologists, doesn't create any values, but can speed up the process. It's a speed-up because you give them a much bigger audience whereas formerly, it was received by a much smaller circle. It's not value creation but rather perhaps acceleration that takes place in a society.

Mr. Fortier: In your opinion, should government radio or television reflect this change?

Mr. David: Oh! sure, there's no doubt about it.

The Chairman: I think Senator McElman has a supplementary.

Senator McElman: I want to go back from this item of discussion.

The Chairman: Mr. Fortier, do you have a further question on this same subject or another one?

Mr. Fortier: No, it is on the same subject, but I think I wish to direct it to Dr. Davidson.

The Chairman: Was yours on the same subject?

Senator McElman: No, I wish to backtrack to the previous question.

The Chairman: Well, why don't we finish this one and then we will backtrack.

Go ahead, Mr. Fortier.

Mr. Fortier: My question, Dr. Davidson, is whether in this respect, the national broadcasting system has a responsibility which is in any way different from that of the private broadcasters?

Mr. Davidson: I would say no. I would say that in both sectors of the broadcasting industry, we have essentially the same role, the same function, which is to reflect and keep pace with all of the significant elements that make up our Canadian social fabric. I would not feel that the public broadcasting system, merely because it derives its funds from public sources, is obliged to be more cautious or more timid in presenting the valid facts of social change than the private broadcasters.

I suspect, in fact, that there may be a tendency for the public broadcasting system to be a little less timid in presenting the realities of social change; perhaps because it doesn't have to be quite as concerned about the sensibilities of advertising as do the private broadcasters.

I am not sure that the private broadcasters would have presented a programme such as "The Air of Death". It is hard to believe it now but you may recall the Corporation was severely castigated and criticised from numerous quarters for the terrible irresponsible job it did in presenting this programme, "The Air of Death".

I don't think anybody now is unaware of what the problem of pollution, air pollution, means, not just a few Canadians, but in all Canadian communities. I say that the CBC programming "The Air of Death" triggered off two or three years ago—and here is one place where perhaps we were in advance of public opinion—a great deal of what has now become the major concern of these people and governments in Canada with the problems of pollution of air and water.

Mr. Fortier: And you see this as, indeed, one of the essential roles of the national broadcasting system, do you not?

Mr. Davidson: I do, yes.

The Chairman: Was there a supplementary, Senator Beaubien?

Senator Beaubien: This is on what Dr. Davidson said. Surely there is a tremendous difference—Dr. Davidson—between playing up pollution and trying to have a control of pollution, which, of course, everybody knows is very bad for everybody, and putting on the air a whole lot of stuff about youngsters using narcotics; surely we are not talking about the same animal?

Mr. Davidson: We are not talking about the same animal at all, but this does not mean, Senator Beaubien, that if there does exist a problem of drug abuse among the young people in this country—surely it does not mean that the broadcasting agencies, public or private, have an obligation or are required to hush that up only because the facts are unpleasant to adult Canadians.

If there is a drug problem among young people in this country, the responsibility of the media, I maintain, is to reveal the existence of that problem so that the leaders of our country, the leaders of our governments, leaders of our professions, can then take action to cope with that problem; and it would be a disservice to our society to hush this up and sweep it under the rug merely because facing the facts is unpleasant.

The Chairman: Senator Quart?

Senator Quart: I would like to just say one thing more, Mr. Chairman. I think so much of the adverse reaction we get to a broadcast programmes in this area, is not so much a protest that the facts are not basically correct, but rather it's an unwillingness to face the fact that that is a problem in our society.

Senator McElman: The complaint, Mr. Davidson, with the programme "The Air of Death", wasn't that you were doing this on pollution; the complaint was that there were many parts of the report which were, in truth, at variance with the facts. Isn't that what the complaint was?

Mr. Davidson: There was argument to that effect.

Senator McElman: But this is still to be decided, isn't it?

Mr. Davidson: Yes, I would be very much interested—I am waiting still—I don't know how long—for the report of the Canadian Radio and Television Commission.

The Chairman: Senator Quart?

Senator Quart: This is just going back about two minutes.

Dr. Davidson, you mentioned that you didn't think that the private stations had to be so cautious as the CBC.

Mr. Davidson: No.

Senator Quart: Or did you? I think I misunderstood that.

Mr. Davidson: I said I thought there was no real difference between our responsibilities.

Senator Quart: Oh!

Mr. Davidson: I said I thought that the CBC probably in these controversial areas was more venturesome.

Senator Quart: Venturesome—Oh, now, I can understand, and I am sorry for the misunderstanding. I know when we delved a few years ago through all this CBC business, that the private stations naturally had to consider their advertisers...

Mr. Davidson: Right.

Senator Quart: ...very much more, and therefore had to be more cautious.

Mr. Davidson: That's right. That's what I said.

Senator Quart: Thank you.

The Chairman: Senator McElman, we will go back to your questions, which I gather is not on permissiveness.

Senator McElman: No, I would like to go back to the line that Mr. Fortier developed earlier on and that is what part the TV camera plays in the development of events. I will refer to two instances. One took place last year at the University of New Brunswick in Fredericton where there was quite a bit of student unrest. I shan't go into the basis for it, but in the course of it, there was, for that campus, one giant parade, a demonstration, non-violent, with the carrying of a coffin and so on. It was the sort of demonstration which made for good TV tape, and to my recollection, the CBC crew came in from either Toronto or Montreal by air to cover it.

The demonstration had begun, and the leaders of the demonstration got up and said, "Pierre, let's stop here now. These people are good enough to come all the way here. They haven't arrived, they are good enough to come all the way here from Toronto or Montreal, whichever it was. We should have the decency to wait until they can cover us." This is one incident, obviously laid on in advance. The other, reportedly—I am sorry, I can't give you the name, but it is a person involved with the York University who has told me that he personally received information from some of the student leaders that they had been contacted by—I suppose they would be called "directors of programming", that at any time they were going to have a demonstration, if they could give them an hour's notice, they would have cameras on hand to cover it.

Now, I can only say about these incidents—one of them, the one at U.N.B. I know about. My son was not involved in the demonstration, but he was present when the comments were made, and the TV cameras came very quickly after.

Mr. Davidson: And they were from Toronto?

Senator McElman: It was from outside New Brunswick. The crew flew in. This is the information I have. If it's inaccurate, I would like to be corrected because it would ease my mind at least.

The other one I have from a person whose veracity I have never had reason to doubt in any degree, and he has told me this as his personal knowledge of the situation that did pertain just around a year ago at York. I would take it you would be surprised if such things were happening?

Mr. Davidson: Yes, I would. I don't suggest that our people in some instances do not show unusual initiative in trying to reach out for a story, but I would like to be more certain than I am on the basis of what you have said to me, Senator McElman, that you have all of the facts of the story before concluding that that is in fact what happened.

I have had just as personal experiences, I can assure you, with very responsible individuals in government and out of government, phoning me and telling me that they have it from the most reliable sources in the world that we have sent a crew overseas to bring some character from a foreign country here to be shown on "Front Page Challenge", and what am I going to do about it. I have explored these stories, and I find that in a great many cases, the real facts of the story are so far from the story as given to me there is really no basis for establishing a position on it.

Now, I think, under certain circumstances, there would be justification for sending a camera crew into a community such as Fredericton, either from Halifax or some other available place, and don't think it necessarily condemns the camera crew because they come from Toronto. I say that in deference to the Chairman. We have no facilities in Fredericton for production. There are circumstances which would justify this but as long as our camera crew acted responsibly, I don't quite see what there would be to criticize.

Now, if they entered into a conspiracy with the leaders of the demonstration ahead of time to put up a synthetic demonstration and to hold off the demonstration until our camera crew arrives, that would be something else again.

The Chairman: What would you do if you found out that had happened?

Mr. Davidson: I would say to Hallman, "Don't let it happen again". What would you do, Gene?

Mr. Hallman: I would try.

The Chairman: Senator Kinneear?

Senator Kinneear: Yes, Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask Dr. Davidson: if there is a drug problem in Canada—surely they feel there is a drug problem because of the many times it's been shown in court cases across Canada—I am wondering if he has considered a documentary on the treatment of the drug situation because I think it's advancing at a rapid rate.

Mr. Davidson: I wonder if I could turn this question back to the chiefs of the network who are in closer contact with the programming.

The Chairman: Mr. David, do you want to answer that first?

[Translation]

Mr. David: Yes, we had a "DOSSIER" programme on it last year, a one-hour program with psychiatrists, chemists, and psychologists, showing the content of the drugs and the danger of each. And we were also in a rehabilitation centre, and showed how to rehabilitate people addicted to drugs. But the acceptance by the public is so slow. I remember one example...on "Aujourd'hui", we had a former addict who had come to tell about his experience, and he complained and rightly so that there were not enough rehabilitation centres such as society had set up for alcoholics. There was an unbelievable number of telephone calls telling us that such subjects should not be dealt with on television, that it was an encouragement to the use of drugs. The television audience became so wrought up at that time about the subject that our intention was completely lost...our intention was precisely to show the kind of positive initiative that society ought to take. Anyway, I remember those two examples when we tried, not only to raise the problem, but to show the techniques for curing such diseases (because, after all, they are often diseases) and also the means society should take to allow that kind of therapy.

The French program, "Aujourd'hui", was broadcast over the three main stations, i.e. Ottawa, Montreal and Quebec, as well as Moncton. "Dossier" was broadcast over the full television network, i.e. from Winnipeg to Moncton, the network we have right now.

[Text]

Senator Kinneear: It was on in French thank you.

The Chairman: Perhaps Mr. Hallman can answer for you, Senator.

Mr. Hallman: Yes, I don't think we have done a documentary, Senator, but we have continuing reports both in news, national as well as regional and local, and also on programmes like "Weekend" and special programmes.

I think one of the most moving and distressing pieces was last fall in the late part of "Weekend" on a Sunday night. This was the question of "speed", not just marijuana, but amphetamines, and it was a pretty hair-raising kind of presentation. But its a continuing responsibility. We also provided the coverage of the Committee on Drug Abuse right across the country.

It is a question of how you treat it... whether a single documentary from time to time is the major question. We are in touch, certainly, with the new organizations set up by the pharmaceutical companies in Canada, and of course follow Mr. Munro's action in this field as well as the voluntary associations.

The Chairman: The programmes you are talking about, both of them, are programmes dealing with the extent of drug use, the treatment of drug use, the dimension of the problem and so on.

Have you done any programmes attempting to analyse why we have the problem? Have you tried to get behind the thing?

Mr. Hallman: Well, I think "Action Set"—I think probably from time to time has had the odd interview with young people about this and about why. It's not basically a sociological investigation. It's really a much more personal involvement, but of course there is a good deal of research being done in this. It's not very conclusive at the present time.

The Chairman: Well, I have a comment on that which perhaps I will make a little later on.

Could I return to the very first question I asked you about the CBC being unloved, and our answer, it seems to me, Mr. Davidson, was that because you were trying to do so many things and that obviously, when you have "Action Set" on, you are not going to appeal to the middle-aged senators, for example.

Therefore, let me turn very briefly to radio. I remember a speech I made on one occasion in which I used the example of 8.00 a.m. on radio when CFRB in Toronto, with Jack Dennett doing a newscast, has more audience at eight o'clock in the morning than all of the BC-owned and operated stations put together.

Now, I use this example for two reasons: number one, because I don't think that we can say that Dennett represents the lowest common denominator of private news broadcasters. I think you will agree he is a good newscaster, and then I think you would also agree with me, as I am a regular listener to "The World at Eight,—I think it is perhaps the best radio newscast on the air.

Why is it at a time when a network has what I—and I might concede I am only one person—consider to be an excellent newscast, even though you are not up against the lowest common denominator. Why is it that the private stations give you such a lacing? Is there something psychological?

Senator Beaubien: Well, Mr. Davidson, before you answer that, is there any real way in which people can tell how many people are listening to one programme?

The Chairman: Oh, yes.

Mr. Davidson: We all subscribe to the same mythology; let's put it that way.

The Chairman: Would you deny the accuracy of the ratings?

Mr. Davidson: Well, I don't really know in the radio field, especially, that the rating system is capable of measuring, for example, the amount of listening while en route to and from the office in automobiles.

I believe that the rating system, and I am subject to correction in this, but my understanding is that the rating system, insofar as radio is concerned, is measuring the listening audience essentially in the home and that there has been no satisfactory method devised yet of measuring the extent of listening that goes on en route to and from work.

Senator Beaubien: Dr. Davidson—

The Chairman: Well, now, just a moment, Senator Beaubien. I am going to rule you out of order. Your questions really are supplementary. I have put the question, and I think Dr. Davidson should answer it and then we can come to the question of radio ratings. I say that with the greatest of respect.

Mr. Davidson: I was going to suggest that I think this is partly the factor of what goes on the radio station before and after, let's say, "The World at Eight" or the Jack Dennett news broadcasts. There are habit patterns established and the tendency is when you turn on a station especially in radio, to turn it on and leave it on because it's your kind of a station; and if you are interested in local happenings and there are certain kinds of programmes that attract you, like light music, rock and roll music or any other kind of programming, you tend to turn on your favorite station and listen to it. In the process, you get some of the programmes that you might not have turned it on for.

Now, unless the CBC can programme to appeal to the local audience—it's up against the local radio station in many instances; it's a national broadcasting service competing with a local service—and unless we can programme in such a way as to get and hold that local audience in competition with programmes of pure local interest, people are not going to turn on the CBC just at eight o'clock to listen to the "world at Eight" and then turn back to their favourite local radio station.

The Chairman: Well, I might.

Mr. Davidson: This is connected?

The Chairman: I am sure it is. I am interested, and of course I accept your answer, but I think I would be more impressed with it and it would have greater validity if the race was close, but it's not. You are not in the same ball park, and if I may use the example of Toronto, on CBL prior to the news at eight, you have Bruce Smith.

Mr. Davidson: Who's third in the disk jockey standing.

The Chairman: But who is an excellent disk jockey; so I don't think that answers it. You have a better sportscast on CBL in Toronto than on any of the private stations in the morning. I don't know, I think you are begging the issue, with great respect. I think there is something more.

Mr. Davidson: I am not begging it, I assure you. I may be groping, and I keep saying to my people, "Look, we have got the best radio programming to be found anywhere in Canada, but there is only one trouble with our radio programming; nobody listens to it."

The Chairman: May I, for the record, apologise. I don't think you were begging the issue. It was an unfortunate term. It was unfortunate terminology. I agree with you, you are groping. You haven't come up with the answer.

Mr. Davidson: No, the nearest I could come to an answer is that we are a national broadcasting service. There is no other radio station in Canada doing anything else except essentially local broadcasting. How do you put a national broadcasting service into a dozen or fifty different communities across the country in a way that will compete in terms of audience attraction with the purely local programming that is being done in every one of those forty or fifty communities to attract people to it. Let me go on now. Here is an example. How many radio stations in Toronto have a helicopter going up and flying around the city and saying where the traffic jam is?

The Chairman: There is a whole air force up there.

Mr. Davidson: There is a whole air force up there. What are we going to do? Are we going to get fifty helicopters and send them up in every Canadian city across the country to provide local service?

The Chairman: I hope not.

Mr. Davidson: This is an extreme illustration.

I wouldn't do it even if you gave me the money, Senator Beaubien, and I know you won't give me the money, but this is an illustration of the real dilemma.

We have to provide a nation-wide service. When we provide a national news broadcast we can't have little local incidents. If we do have any, they always wind up being Toronto incidents, and everybody in Canada objects to reporting Toronto news into the alleged national news. But how do you bridge this gap unless you depart from your concept of national broadcasting service that is supposed to be reflecting the parts of Canada one to the other, in favour of another local news service with local weather, local news, reporting.

I am not detracting from the quality of the Jack Dennett broadcast. It's a good broadcast and it also goes beyond the limits of the Toronto scene. The people listen to Jack Dennett on the CFRB news because they identify with their local station as being the station that they listen to.

The Chairman: Well, please believe me, I don't want to spin this out endlessly, but just let me make one more point on it. I think it's terribly important in terms of CBC radio.

On CBL in Toronto in the morning, you get the local news at 7.30. You get so many local weather forecasts that you get sick of them. You get traffic reports not from helicopte-but from the motor league; he is constantly in touch by telephone. You have reviews of local theatre happenings. You have a bucket of local information, and just as much as you get on any of the private stations, and yet I wonder if that's the answer that you have given. I wonder if Mr. Hallman can comment on that.

Mr. Hallman: I think the president has put his finger on the fact that we are trying as a network to provide a total service, regional, local and national—a very comprehensive system. What you have left out of your quotient, it seems to me, is that later in the morning you have national school broadcasts or Ontario school broadcasts. You have special programming for women and you have "Radio Noon" dealing with the farm urban community, all of which really provides a kind of service which is not purely local in character.

The other thing is that apart from not having all those 50 helicopters, we don't have the massive promotional budget that CFRB does. So, if we were to do this in every one of our markets, I am sure there could be some change, some increase, in the kinds of audiences we have for our existing services. Nevertheless, I think the character of the service tends to determine the audience it accumulates, and what we are trying to provide is the national experience for Canadians from Victoria to St. John's, Newfoundland, within the national service as well as having some local and regional relationships; but you will find things in our national service that do not commend themselves to somebody interested in the immediate local situation in his community. He is then a citizen of Canada, and then we hope that's part of this thing.

The Chairman: One other question, and we will leave it. Are the promotional budgets something to talk about? I do think that you do have a good promotional budget though you may devote it mostly to television, but that's another problem. Everything that you say, Gene—I take all of the points that you and the President make, except—the gap is so wide.

Mr. Davidson: Well, if you find the answer, will you tell us?

Mr. Hallman: Well, let me say this. The gap is wide, not only between CFRB which of course for many years has been the dominant station in Toronto; for many, many years it was a CBS affiliate. It has built a very good service. It's done a very good job in that community, but it seems to me the gap is equally wide between ourselves and CFRB and all of the other private stations who are locally oriented. There is a very very major gap here.

The Chairman: If I may venture a private opinion, as a prelude to a question, and I am expressing not a Committee opinion but my own personal opinion, that CBC radio has been and is improving. Is that gap closing at all?

Mr. Hallman: Our audiences in Toronto and in the rest of the country—in Winnipeg, is moving ahead. Certainly Ottawa is moving ahead. I couldn't give you a comprehensive or a synoptic view of this thing, but gradually we are gaining. We have had new programmes in the last three or four years, and we have been, I think, innovative and inventive. Whatever promotional money we have had and opportunities we have had, we have tried to exploit fully. I think we are gaining audiences, but I think it's a relative situation. I don't think we are going to overtake CFRB.

Mr. Davidson: Can I try one other angle?

The Chairman: Oh, yes, go ahead.

Mr. Davidson: Radio, I think, in a great many situations is becoming background, subliminal. It's part of the environment in which a person is working, and this means that music rather than talk is what prompts you to turn on your radio, except for the news, perhaps.

There is a lot more music on the private stations and a lot more talk on the CBC stations. I think that, broadly speaking, is correct, and therefore the tendency will be to go to the music station which is a great embalm-er. It's a tranquilizer.

Mr. Fortier: There is no CBC sound in Canada.

Mr. Davidson: That is correct, only the sound of a lot of voices of a lot of people talking on our programmes.

The Chairman: Isn't there a trend to all-talk radio stations?

Mr. Hallman: Local.

Mr. Davidson: Not in Canada.

The Chairman: They are all local, are they?

Mr. Hallman: Pretty well, Philadelphia, the Group of Seven. The Westinghouse stations, I think, has three in the States now that are purely news operations. They are news information operations, but they tend to derive from everywhere.

Mr. Davidson: It is going to be very interesting to see what the effect will be of this 30 per cent Canadian music rule that the CRTC is putting out. Is that going to have the effect of increasing the total amount of Canadian music or is it going to have the effect of reducing the total amount of music and increasing the amount of talk on the private stations simply because otherwise it will be impossible to meet the 30 per cent?

Mr. Fortier: What effect will it have on the CBC radio programming?

Mr. Davidson: We think we are in a better position to meet the 30 per cent requirement on CBC radio than most of the private stations will for two reasons. First of all, because we have a reasonably large amount of Canadian recorded music that we ourselves have developed over a period of time, and secondly, the very point I am making, that the total of our music in volume is already less than the private station because we have more talk programmes.

The Chairman: Do you have a supplementary, Senator McElman?

Senator Beaubien: I want to ask one supplementary too.

The Chairman: All right, Senators. We will go to Senator McElman and then to Senator Beaubien and then back to you, Mr. Fortier.

Senator McElman?

Senator McElman: Isn't it true, though, that in radio in particular that the CBC is trying to provide a real alternative to that subliminal music background we are getting so much from the multiplicity of private radio? If I could comment on it, there are still people who like to think and not just be entertained.

The Chairman: Even in Toronto!

Mr. Davidson: That's why we have such small audiences!

Senator McElman: I wasn't even going to refer to Toronto! I was going to refer more to the thinking community, such as Fredericton where CBZ is moving up definitely every week as I talk with people in the community. There is never a weekend goes by but somebody says, "Were you in town? Did you listen to such and such a programme on CBZ?" It is meaningful. Is this not your purpose rather than to duplicate—It's not even entertainment. It's sort of a sedation.

Mr. Davidson: Well, I don't want to arrogate to ourselves, virtues which are not ours, but I think it is correct that we are trying to provide a radio fare which is distinctive and different from the radio fare provided by the commercial stations. Whether ours is a more thought-provoking fare than the private radio stations, I will leave it to others to say. We are not attempting, consciously, to duplicate the programming mix that you will find on your typical commercial radio station.

We are trying to do something different, and in doing something different, we are running up against this problem of how many people want to listen to something different, and do they want to listen to the something different we are providing in preference to listening to the private stations? The evidence, on the basis of the figures, is that the vast majority of people listen to the programme fare that is being put out by the private stations.

Senator McElman: I have another supplementary towards the solution of this purely Toronto programme that Senator Davey was talking about. Have you ever thought of hiring the fellow he talks about as a personality?

The Chairman: Do you know whom he means?

Mr. Davidson: Jack Dennett.

The Chairman: They wouldn't hire him. They rejected him in Edmonton at one time. This was long before your time, as I understand it. Is that an old wives' tale or is that true?

Mr. Hallman: I hope it's apocryphal. Almost everyone has wanted to or has worked for us.

Senator McElman: He is in the global village of Toronto. Now, would you consider hiring him there as a solution?

Mr. Hallman: We couldn't afford him.

The Chairman: Well, I appreciate that Senator McElman is being facetious. I therefore think it's important to put on the record that that is really not the problem.

Mr. Hallman: There's another important thing, I think. In news casting, we have tried to avoid the personalized presentation of news, and the style of many private stations, and certainly of CFRB with Gordon Sinclair, Jack Dennett and a whole lot of others, is that there is a very personal style. We have tried, and it is a matter of policy in the corporation to maintain as much as possible, a cool straight presentation of factual information in our news broadcasts, and therefore you don't have that kind of personal identification. Nevertheless, people like Earl Cameron over the years, or Davis at the present time—these people do become known nationally in a different way in the total Canadian community if not the specific individual.

Senator McElman: This is exactly the same kind of thing that Mr. Davidson and I were talking about.

Mr. Hallman: Yes.

Senator McElman: Could I go back one step further for a last supplementary?

The Chairman: Yes, you can. I would just like to put on the record and make sure you understand, I am not in any sense stating grievance with the CBC news programmes. On the contrary. I am wondering why more people don't listen. That's all I am saying.

Senator McElman: Reference was made a while ago to the permissive society and the permissive type of programming. I think we all agree that there are periods of the day when this permissive type of broadcasting is out, the children's hours, the family hours, where consciously CBC won't programme such material. This cuts us down to some pretty prime time viewing.

Now, do you believe that the ratio of, for want of a better name, "permissive programming" to the total availability in that prime time is similar to the ratio of permissiveness in society, or is it out of whack? Is there too much programming in ratio to the element of actual permissiveness in our society?

Mr. Davidson: Well, this is an opinion question, Senator McElman. On the basis of my own view and my own knowledge of what goes out over the CBC air in its prime time period, I do not think that the amount of permissive programming that we turn out in at period is out of line with the extent of permissiveness in society today. It may be out of line with the extent of permissiveness that shows above the surface of society today, but if you get what I mean, there is a great deal more permissiveness in our Canadian society today, in my opinion, than most of us as older-than-average citizens are perhaps aware of; and I believe that the extent of our permissive programming is, on television, if anything, less than the level that the permissive society has reached.

The Chairman: I think Mr. Hallman wants to comment on this.

Mr. Hallman: I think really, in relative terms, it's a very small amount, but I don't think it can be measured in terms of quantity. It's in terms of impact.

If you take a look at our daytime prime time, the whole schedule, when you add up the school broadcasts, the children's broadcasts, whether they be "Friendly Giant", "Chez Hélène"—whether you go into "Hymn Sing"—whether you go into "Singalong Jubilee"—whether you go into the "Tommy Hunter Show", these are domestic productions, and in no sense can they be equated, in any way, with advocating the permissive society. I think if you then take a good many of the American programmes, which are basically entertainment in character, it's also not there, but if you have a programme, I think it is a society which is concerned...

The Chairman: It's not in "Laugh-In"?

Mr. Hallman: Well, to a degree.

Mr. Davidson: It's not in "Bonanza" or "Ed Sullivan".

Mr. Hallman: Or "Red Skelton", but what I am getting at is: this is a rather minor part of the schedule, but its impact is very high.

Take, for instance, the programme "Man Alive", which is a religious series. Since Vatican II, since the ecumenical movement, many of the issues now being dealt with, whether it is celibacy in the priesthood or whatever, tend to raise questions on the part of our public; but these are issues at the centre of the religious evolution and change, and we would be irresponsible not dealing with them. I wouldn't equate them, however, with any kind of pejorative use of our treatment of the permissive society. It seems to me it's a wholly responsible thing.

In programmes like the "Thursday Night" series, which tonight is being pre-empted for Mr. Benson's budget, we have scheduled a major documentary on Germany, a major documentary on the west, and its concern.

I think it's a much smaller proportion of our total schedule than we tend to believe, but if we have, as we did this year, a thirteen-part series on male-female relationship, which was I think, very responsibly done, some people are concerned about these things.

I think that we have to make professional judgments as to the people we involve in terms of experts and the care with which it's presented, and I think there's far less of that.

In the dramas, very frequently this tends to be anxiety producing. If you do a Pinter play, well established in the field of the theatre, it will frequently evoke some anxiety, mainly because of the ambiguity or the kind of treatment we have of human relationships.

It's interesting to note, however, that they can do it far easier on the French network than they can on the English.

Senator McElman: What you're saying, Mr. Hallman—you mentioned the programme "Man Alive" which, from the feedback I get, was very well received, certainly in my community. Please don't judge it by the comment of another element in that community which categorized it outright as "CBC smut". That was not the community reaction.

The Chairman: What about radio? Can you answer the same question for radio?

Mr. Hallman: Well, I think radio has even a wider diversity, and I think because the medium has lower costs for a greater time and greater amounts of Canadian programming, we deal with a wider variety and more specialized subjects. We get protests in radio, of course, and we deal with many sensitive subjects in women's programmes. We deal with them in open-line programmes such as "Cross-Country Check-Up", whether they be political or social.

I think the feeling is that we are commending ourselves to more Canadians, not because of the subject matter, but the kind of vitality of the treatment of a lot of the subjects that now exist. With use of the theatre these days, with use of the cinema, we can hardly avoid dealing with some of the aspects of the so-called "permissive society".

The Chairman: I think perhaps we should return to Mr. Fortier. These were all supplementary questions. We apologize.

Mr. Fortier: Dr. Davidson, do you interpret your programming mandate insofar as radio is concerned any differently than you do your TV programming mandate?

Mr. Davidson: Not essentially, no—We do not, however, divide our radio programming and our TV programming into two watertight compartments. We think that the requirement to achieve balance in our programming applies to the corporate responsibility taken as a whole.

Mr. Fortier: The Act makes no distinction.

Mr. Davidson: The Act makes no distinction and, while, in fact, we will tend to look at our balance and variety in our French-language network programming, as a separate entity and try to achieve the responsibility placed upon us by the mandate in terms of French-language broadcasting taken by itself, and we will do the same in the English context, we do not feel that we are under an extra obligation to do that, and we do not make any essential distinction between radio and television in terms of...

Mr. Fortier: Television is a medium which lends itself more readily to competition from private broadcasters than radio?

Mr. Davidson: This is merely my opinion, but I would say no. I would say, in fact, that it may very well be the reverse that is the situation because radio involves much less in the way of a heavy investment of funds. Therefore it is easier to achieve the advantageous competitive position that the private commercial stations naturally seek to achieve with a relatively small expenditure of funds than it would be in the case of television.

In television, I think that the success of the private stations depends very heavily on the being able to purchase rather than produce programme material. This is certainly true of the individual stations, less so with the network.

Mr. Fortier: Do you foresee the day when the national broadcasting service will be concerned exclusively with television and not with radio?

Mr. Davidson: I would say no. I would say these are complementary, one to the other. They serve different purposes. They serve different tastes. They serve different groups of people at different times of the day, and I do not subscribe to the view that radio is obsolete service that is gradually dying out and is going to be replaced by television when television reaches its full stage of maturity.

Mr. Fortier: Should the CRTC be concerned with cross-media ownership of electronic media... that is, having in mind the fact that the CBC has both, you know, a radio and a television network?

Mr. Davidson: Are you saying that they should be concerned with the fact that a television station may also own a radio station?

Mr. Fortier: Yes.

Mr. Davidson: We have indicated in our brief our basic position on this, that in theory an individual community, should not be in the hands of a single purveyor of news and information, and therefore, insofar as a single community is concerned, we see some theoretical argument against a monopoly position being established. A monopoly position does not mean, however, a position of ownership of a radio station and a television station.

It would be quite possible that the balance of information forces in a given community were great... There is no reason why in an individual community, an individual owner should not own a television and a radio station, in my opinion.

Mr. Fortier: Would that be all the more so in those communities where you are operating both a radio and a television station?

Mr. Davidson: I would think that where we are operating a radio and a television station, it is important that there be other sources of information and programming, both in radio and television, available to the public. It would not make a great deal of difference in my opinion, whether the rival radio and television station were owned separately or whether they were owned by one individual; but you do develop a point where perhaps the critical mass of multiple ownership of numerous radio and numerous television stations, particularly in communities that do not have access to other forms of information... this creates a problem.

Mr. Fortier: Ideally, do you feel that television and radio stations should be owned by people who live in the community where the programmes were being broadcast?

Mr. Davidson: In the Canadian community?

Mr. Fortier: No, in the local community.

Mr. Davidson: I think that all things being equal, it is desirable to have local ownership of your local radio and commercial television stations but I do not think that argument should be pushed too far because this really means that the smaller Canadian communities will not have the same opportunity to have a television station under first class competent management, guaranteed, assured to them, on the same basis as would be possible if the ownership were left to find its place in the Canadian community as a whole.

I think one can be much too narrow and parochial if one were to insist, for example, that every New Brunswick radio and television station were owned and operated by New Brunswickers. This leads them to the situation as they are today.

Mr. Fortier: Some people have come before the Committee and said exactly that.

Senator Kinnear: Dr. Davidson, are there many cases like that across Canada, television and radio owned by the same person in a local community?

Mr. Davidson: I would have to...

The Chairman: I think in fairness we, the Committee has the information. It's really not a question for this witness. It might be a better question to put tomorrow when the private broadcasters appear.

Mr. Fortier:

Mr. Fortier: If the concentration of ownership, as you make out in your brief, Dr. Davidson, if the trend is inevitable, would you recommend that the CRTC draw a line where this concentration should end?

Mr. Davidson: Well, it is very difficult to be arbitrary about this. I do not believe that there are any absolutes in this picture.

Mr. Fortier: Except the CBC.

Mr. Davidson: Yes, yes, and I think the judgment has to be on a pragmatic basis which the CRTC, with their knowledge of the local situation and what the alternatives are, will decide that it is tolerable or it is intolerable to allow further accretions to the growing empire of a particular broadcasting group.

I don't think there is any means on establishing a formula and saying, "You can't have more than X radio stations", because you can have X radio stations with very little in the way of audience and very little in the way of impact; whereas, somebody with four or five—a smaller number of radio stations, could have much more impact.

Mr. Fortier: Has CBC television become better as a result of the advent of CTV and the CTV network?

Mr. Davidson: I would not be in a position to pronounce judgment on that.

Mr. Fortier: Maybe Mr. Hallman would care to comment?

Mr. Hallman: Do I have your permission?

Mr. Fortier: Bearing in mind the fact that it was there before you were, Dr. Davidson.

Mr. Hallman: I would say, not necessarily. I think the advent of competition tended to strengthen the competitive operation at the local level. I think, however, if you are as committed, as both the networks are in terms of the need to earn commercial revenue, there is a tendency to compete with programmes of the same kind.

Obviously, if one has to concern itself with the advertising delivery of audience, I think the indications could be that we have, instead of moving out of a period where we were basically a monopoly situation,—and then had to do all things for all Canadians in a variety of ways—that you narrow very critically the competitive areas of prime time in which you feel, because you have to earn revenue, you must compete against the opposition. This does not, in the broadcast media, tend to breed choice, it tends to narrow.

Mr. Fortier: Hasn't the opposition sort of set the rules of the game?

Mr. Hallman: Well, you know, one must always deal with competition.

Mr. Fortier: But it has, in fact, reached a point where now the main competitor, the CTV network, is writing the rules?

Mr. Hallman: No, not completely, no, this is not true, because our entire survival is not contingent upon commercial revenue. Obviously we will put on "Peter Grimes" as we did last night for two hours and a half. It happens that that's a very poor thing to compete with hockey on; nevertheless, it is a true choice.

Mr. Davidson: But basically I think the point is well taken, if I may interject, Mr. Fortier, that as a result of the coming into being of the CTV network and the direction that its programming has taken, we have had to adjust ourselves to that situation, and we are probably more American today in prime time than we would otherwise be because CTV exists.

I would like just to add one thing further. I wouldn't like to attribute all of the changes that have taken place in television programming in the last ten years to the advent of a competing private commercial network. There are a great many other factors that enter into the picture here too; for example, even if the CTV didn't exist, we would be facing the problem of cablevision and the influx of American programming that results from that, in the border stretches of Canada. There are many other factors as well as the competition provided by the construction of the private networks.

Mr. Fortier: And then the question, of course, which raises its ugly head is: What do Canadian viewers wish to see? I think—Have they not answered it in the gaining popularity of CTV Americanized programmes?

Mr. Davidson: Well, if you were to accept the evidence, simply based on the mass statistics, you would have to conclude that the Canadian public wants American entertainment programming in the ratio of the English-speaking sectors—that's an important exception, because the French-speaking population hasn't got the same dilemma, of course to face; but I think on the evidence you would have to say that the Canadian English speaking viewers certainly turn on the dial to American programming rather than they do to Canadian programming, certainly in your border areas where you have the access to the three American networks and where both CTV and CBC are having to make a choice in favour of the American programming.

Mr. Fortier: But in view of the mandate which...

The Chairman: I think Senator Petten has a supplementary question.

Senator Petten: I think you could call it supplementary, Mr. Chairman.

Dr. Davidson, in retrospect, do you think was a good decision to cancel out the "Dr. Messer Show"? It's on principle I am asking this. There was a great public outcry.

Mr. Davidson: Oh, yes, this is one way of testing whether people are watching our programmes or not. I don't know. I have said both things publicly.

Mr. Fortier: How come you have never been politicians?

Mr. Davidson: I don't know, I just feel, Senator Petten, that when you have a programme that has been on the air in one form or another 37 years, you are getting to the point, perhaps, where the law of diminishing returns is bound to set in.

Now, maybe we should have kept Don Messer on another ten years and made it 47 years instead of 37. I don't know, but you do reach a point where the law of diminishing returns sets in. When you stereotype your programme and you have to make your decision, at some point that you are going to make the switch. Just as the coach of the Montreal Canadiens hockey team—maybe he's kept his veterans on one year too long, Senator Beaubien. If you look at families today, you begin to ask yourself that question, and yet if he had scrapped some of his folk heroes who play for the Canadiens, there would be a holocaust in the hockey schedule.

Senator Petten: Have you ever had such a great public outcry about any programme that you have cancelled?

Mr. Davidson: Not in my two years. I expect that we will have. Give us time.

Mr. Fortier: Give us Seven Days!

Mr. Davidson: Give us a week or so.

Mr. Hallman: I think Senator Petten might be interested in an antecedent to that decision, Mr. President. We had for many years a programme called "Harmony Harbour" from Nova Scotia. I think some ten years ago I made the decision to cancel that, and there was a delegation from both Houses and all parties waiting on Mr. Dunton but I had prepared the ground because it was the first major network to go from Newfoundland called "Come All Ye Round", and I think really one should never—I think a lesson is to be learned—Never cancel a popular programme unless you have a better replacement.

The Chairman: Very good. Mr. Fortier?

Mr. Fortier: Dr. Davidson, you made the point earlier, or maybe you agreed with the point which I was trying to make, and you made it much more eloquently than I did, that the CBC has had to face up to CTV competition, and in order to do it effectively, it has had to produce during prime time more of the same or more of CTV's fare.

How has this been possible or rather how has this been done in view of the Broadcasting Act which imposed on CBC that it be a predominantly Canadian service in content and in character? In other words, what I am trying to get at is, if it hadn't been for the CRTC, would you have raised the level of your Canadian content or would you just have gone along with trying to emulate the CTV people?

Mr. Davidson: I am not sure that I get the purport of your question. Let me try to answer it in this way.

The Chairman: Well, let's make sure you understand it first. I think you should rephrase it.

Mr. Fortier: I will re-phrase it.

I think you have admitted that CBC, at least insofar as prime time viewing is concerned, was trying to keep up with CTV, and in so doing showed an excessive amount of American programming.

Now, the CRTC has come along and has said, "There shall be a greater amount of Canadian content"—or at least the proposal has been made. My question is. If it had not been for the CRTC, were you going there?

Mr. Davidson: We had already made an announcement, Mr. Fortier, that we tended to increase the Canadian content of our prime time content next year by one and a half hours in any event; so, when you say, "Were we going there", the answer in that sense is, "Yes, we were going there".

Mr. Fortier: This announcement came after the first CRTC regulation two years ago on Canadian content.

Mr. Davidson: CRTC regulation two years ago?

Mr. Fortier: The first regulation on Canadian content—No, I am sorry, those were the TV regulations enacted by the BBG. I am sorry.

Dr. Davidson: No, I think our position is, has always been, that the BBG set a standard that we were required to meet. We have always substantially overmet that standard, and the fact now that the CRTC has come along and said, "Not only must you achieve 60 per cent instead of 55 per cent throughout the broadcast day, but you must also achieve it in the prime time period, 6.30 p.m. to 11.30 p.m."

This is not going to have any serious effect on us, so far as we can see, in terms of the broadcast day taken as a whole. It is going to require us to stretch and make a further effort to achieve a 60 per cent objective in the 6.30 to 11.30 period.

Our best calculation shows us that the French network is already in excess of that figure, even in excess in the 6.30 to 11.30 period. It shows that the English network falls slightly below it by two or three percentage points. Part of that gap would in any event have been overcome by our addition of an hour and a half of prime time programming, which we announced our intention to develop before the CRTC regulation.

There may very well be an hour or an hour and a half—I don't know how much—more that we will have to contribute in order to reach this higher point. A great deal will depend, in my opinion, on what the ultimate definition of the CRTC is of "Canadian content programming" because they have undertaken to provide us with a new definition which will eliminate, from the definition of Canadian content, some of the items which are now admitted as Canadian content.

Mr. Picard reminds me that our intention, when we announced our additional programming, was to build that up by an additional hour and a half of Canadian content programming over a period of years so that the thing would accumulate rather than start at any one point in time.

The Chairman: A supplementary question.

I would like to read a quotation from Patrick Scott writing in the Toronto Star. I am wondering if this is true. It's directly on the subject. He said:

"Like the CRTC, the CBC has a mandate to preserve the Canadian cultural fabric, yet at this moment, it is purveying not only more American programming than it ever has before, but even more than its private competitors, most notably CTV."

Is that a true statement?

Mr. Davidson: When I saw this, I jumped about three feet off my chair and asked to have the facts brought before me. It is the kind of a statement that you can make and you cannot challenge its accuracy because it only tells half the story.

It is true that it is purveying more American programming than its private competitors for the simple reason that it is purveying more programming of all kinds than its competitors.

The CTV, for example, total programme output, as I understand it correctly, amounts to 22 hours a week. It is providing that much in the way of service to the members of its group. Of that, if my recollection is correct, some 19 hours are American and three hours are Canadian. It is true that the CBC with its much larger volume of production is providing more American programming but also providing far more Canadian programming.

I got the figures out on this, and I can give them to you if you permit me to file them afterwards.

The Chairman: We would be grateful if you would.

Mr. Davidson: My recollection is that the ratio of Canadian to American programming is far higher in the CBC's case than the CTV case.

The Chairman: So, as you say, this is a half truth, in your opinion.

Mr. Fortier: Does it cost you more or less than CTV to produce a programme, Mr. Davidson?

Mr. Davidson: I don't know the answer to that because I don't know what CTV production costs are.

Mr. Fortier: Well, it has been said, and I am sure brought to your attention, that the costs for CBC producing a television programme were far in excess of those for CTV. You have never attempted to find out whether or not it was so?

Mr. Davidson: Well, first of all, we should know what we are comparing.

Mr. Fortier: Well, principally, public affairs programming.

Mr. Davidson: Well, I would not be prepared to dispute the statement that probably CTV public affairs programmes, as they put them on the air, cost less than our public affairs programmes.

Mr. Fortier: And yet according to some figures which have been communicated to me bers of the Committee, some of their public affairs programmes are just as popular as CBC?

Mr. Davidson: That's probably correct, and I am sure that some of our low-cost programmes in CBC are just as popular as some of our high-cost programmes.

Mr. Fortier: Another statistic which has been bandied around is that if there is any event which is to be reported in Canada for television viewers, and which is covered by both CTV and CBC, CBC will usually despatch some ten or fifteen people; whereas CTV will only send five of their people.

Mr. Davidson: If you can give me an example of an important event where we sent only fifteen people, I would like to have it.

Mr. Fortier: Why are your production costs so high?

Mr. Davidson: Well, that's a question which begs the question. If you take, for example, the really big events where there is multiple coverage of a political convention, let's say—If you go into it, you will find that almost certainly the audio services of all of the broadcasters who are broadcasting that event, are provided by the CBC.

If you go back to the Liberal Convention here at the Coliseum in 1968, all of the audio services were provided by the CBC for everybody, free of charge, with no charges at all. Why? Because otherwise there would have been such utter chaos that you would have been working in a jungle of broadcast equipment and facilities.

Secondly, all of the lighting services for that Liberal Convention were provided at the expense of the CBC with a payment back to us by the CTV that represented a relatively small fraction of the cost of providing those lighting services.

Then you go beyond that, and you recognize that not only does the English network television have to cover that convention, the French network has to cover that convention. We had to cover it for radio as well as television in both French and English and I recited the catalogue of the services we provide. The International Service has to provide a service covering that convention and the result is we get sometimes a frightening number of CBC employees attending a convention that most people would regard in an over-simplified fashion as being capable of being covered by a relatively small number of people. It's the complexity and the multiplicity of services that we have to render which certainly contributes to this.

Now, in addition to this, I think it's fair to say that the CBC, being an older organization, has had for years its employees organized into collective bargaining units. The problems of jurisdiction arise. The CTV has a much shorter record of involvement with the labour unions, and I think to some extent—I don't want to maximize this and I don't want to over-emphasize this, but to some extent, the rigidities that have developed into our structure and into our system as a result of a generation, now, of relations with our labour force in the collective bargaining context, this also adds something to the problem insofar as the provision of staff to cover an event is concerned.

Mr. Fortier: How many different unions are there in the CBC? Do you know offhand?

Mr. Picard: In terms of number, there are over three large unions. This is over 1500 people. But beside that, there is one, two, three, four, five, maybe, small unions.

Mr. Fortier: Are there economies which could be...

Mr. Picard: There is also the problem that the talent union—We have contracts with the different talent unions, but I am talking about the staff right now.

Mr. Fortier: Are you saying, though...

Mr. Davidson: Mr. Fortier, can I play this numbers game a bit further?

Mr. Fortier: Yes, please.

Mr. Davidson: When you hear it said that the CBC had, let's say, 375 people covering the Liberal Convention and CTV 75; I would like to put alongside of that the record of the Canada Games in Halifax last summer. We had 112 people covering the Canada Games. I wouldn't put on the record the number that CTV had covering that.

The Chairman: Why? Why wouldn't you put it on the record?

Mr. Davidson: I suggest that they didn't have anybody covering the Canada Games.

The Chairman: I think that should be on the record.

Senator Beaubien: What did they use?

Mr. Davidson: They used the news feeds and the material that came out, but the Canada Games were brought home to Canadians as a living part of our life and society in Canada because of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. The Canada Games would not have been communicated to the people of Canada...

The Chairman: Were they available to CTV? You didn't have an exclusive contract?

Mr. Hallman: No, we had them because we were covering the whole country and they had no particular interest, except for news.

The Chairman: Could they have covered them if they had wanted? Could you both have covered them? Was it that kind of a...

Mr. Hallman: Well, if they had wanted to—there were no rights involved.

The Chairman: That's the point I was making.

Senator McElman: You said they had no interest, Mr. Hallman, because of the geography or location or what?

Mr. Hallman: In terms of advertiser interest in the Canada Games, it's rather slight, as it is for most amateur sports in this country, and we felt we had an obligation because it was the first big summer games. We had already dealt with the winter games two years previously when they were in Quebec, but these are not programmes which are revenue-generating and that we would in any way recover costs.

Senator Beaubien: Mr. Hallman, did you get anything out of it? Did you get any revenue at all?

Mr. Hallman: No, I don't think we earned very much. I think, maybe, we had a bit of selective business but not much really.

The Chairman: Senators and ladies and gentlemen, I am going to suggest that this might be an opportunity to take a break.

May I say for the benefit of Senators that I have been informed that there will be royal assent at 5.45, which means that the Committee will adjourn at 5.45.

Also, you may be interested to know—I hope nobody will rush home, but an election has been called in Quebec for the 29th of April.

We will adjourn now for ten minutes.

(Short recess)

The Chairman: May I perhaps make clear again that it is now twenty after four, and we must adjourn at 5.45 for royal assent; so, I think perhaps people who are framing questions should be aware of that particular limitation.

Mr. Fortier:

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Davidson, we have dealt with the problem of Canadian content, and you have explained that you did not anticipate that there would be much of a problem with the English network, and you also underlined that it has not ever been a problem with the French network. I wonder if we could hear from one of your colleagues on what their problems may be, if that is not one of them?

The Chairman: Of the French network?

Mr. Fortier: Of the French network, yes.

Mr. Davidson: Well, I don't know that Mr. David is aware of what the problems are in the French network but I am prepared to give him a chance to speculate.

The Chairman: Perhaps Mr. Hallman would care to answer that question.

[Translation]

Mr. David: In Canadian content, we are certainly in a privileged situation because of the language barrier. Right from the start, especially at that time, before the business of dubbing American programs was developed, also before French-speaking television developed, we had to pretty well produce our own schedule. In 1956 and 1957, 80 per cent of the programs were produced in Montreal. At the present time, in the compulsory network periods, in the peak hours, we have 80 per cent Canadian content. Consequently, there's no problem. There was also a kind of convergence of the mandate, on the one hand, asking us for Canadian programs and on the other, those programs being the most popular. Among the seven most popular programs in Montreal, at the present time, of the CBC, there's only one that is a dubbed American program, and that is "Ma Sorcière bien-aimée", "Bewitched". All the others are mainly television dramas, like "Rue des Pignons", or "Les Belles Histoires". There are others: "Le Paradis Terrestre", the "Variétés", "Zoom" and "Les Couche-tards" programs. Consequently, there is no problem there.

The biggest need of the French network is, of course, for expansion, to get to serve all the French-speaking communities in the country as funds become available; that's our main problem. Also, American imports are counterbalanced for us by imports from French-speaking countries. We do a lot of joint production with Belgium, Switzerland and France. We also buy so many French and Swiss programs, that we now receive as many programs from French-speaking countries as from English-speaking countries, i.e. Great Britain and the United States.

Mr. Fortier: If one of the proposals of the CRTC goes through, these programs of French or Belgian origin won't count, isn't that right?

Mr. David: As 50 per cent Canadian.

Mr. Fortier: Is that going to create any problems for you?

Mr. David: No, not at all.

Mr. Fortier: What percentage of your programs is of French origin, other than Canadian?

Mr. David: We put on close to 20 hours from French-speaking countries, and from 18 to 20 hours from English-speaking countries, i.e. Great Britain or the United States. The rest is Canadian production, out of a schedule of close to 117 hours.

Mr. Fortier: You say that the dubbed American programs have not caught on as well as the original American programs. Are such programs shown in English over the Canadian network?

Mr. David: No. As you can see, our most popular programs are the programs that attract the most listeners. That is why the commercial impact doesn't at all present the same disadvantages as could appear, say, for the English network, because, since they are the most popular programs, they are the ones that draw the most sponsors. So all interests coincide: our obligations under the Act, the preferences of the audience, and the interests of the sponsors who turn to the preferred programs.

Mr. Fortier: Would you please sketch out for us, in a few minutes, a picture of the differences between the French network, on the one hand, and the English network on the other, from the point of view of programming, of production and of income?

Mr. David: From the point of view of production, there is, of course, one striking thing, and that is that we have developed a great deal from the point of view of drama. I think that television drama has always been a prominent feature of French network programming, because, once again, we couldn't directly import "Bonanza", "I Love Lucy" "Music Hall" and all those shows of that kind. You know there was a wonderful flourishing of Canadian song in French Canada (you have only to think of Vigneault, Ferland, Dor, Léveillé and all the others) so that our "Variétés" program could be supplied fairly easily with our own people. So I think the CBC was a great Canadian force behind the making of authors, actors and singers. In fact, that's the first feature.

We have also put a strong emphasis on children's programs. This, again, was because the O.R.T.F. (Radio-Television Network in France) wasn't producing any adventure programs at that time and adventures for children had to be created, since the time of "Radisson" and "D'Iberville", and so did all the others, like "La Boîte à Surprise". So necessity, after all, was for us also the mother of invention, in that case.

One of the problems, perhaps, is that we haven't thought enough about the French-speaking people in the other provinces, i.e. there are times when the French network is not taking sufficiently into account French groups in the other provinces. There are times when the French-Canadians in the other provinces complain that the network image is too Quebecish, and much more on television than on radio. On radio, we can have big contributions from stations like the ones in Ottawa, Moncton or Vancouver, because they have the means of production. In television, Toronto too, yes, we have programs coming from there, and if you listen to the network, you will see that every hour, the news comes from a different city such as Moncton, or Toronto, but it doesn't come from Vancouver because of the time difference. Yet, even Vancouver contributes to the network with a variety program like "Radio Transistor". So we have been able to create a network, truly not just a distribution network, but a radio production network.

In television, the only place we can draw on, if we come here, outside Quebec province, that has facilities is Ottawa. Moncton will soon have them, in the fall as a matter of fact. We can be fed directly from Moncton, and we can reverse the network (which is a costly operation) but the fact remains that physically, at least, it will be feasible.

Now about income, you were talking about income, we were, of course, very hard hit by the coming of private enterprise in 1961. We lost a lot of our listeners at that time, but that situation is no longer true. The situation has been improving about a year and a half, and we have now been picking up listeners during the evening period. So that means that our commercial revenues have risen very appreciably since last year, and this year again there will be a very big jump in commercial revenue.

Mr. Fortier: That's just in competition with CFTM?

Mr. David: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: In purely Canadian programs?

Mr. David: Purely Canadian. They, too, have a very large proportion of Canadian programs, because they have the programs, once again, that the public enjoys very much. Consequently, we don't have that problem, of satisfying the taste of the listeners, since they are satisfied with Canadian programs, and that is, perhaps, contrary to the taste that English-Canadian listeners and television viewers may have.

Mr. Fortier: A little while back you mentioned that—and I recorded it right away—"necessity was the mother of invention". Now that it has become more necessary than it was, as far as the English network is concerned, do you think we are going to be witnesses to the same growth of English-Canadian talent?

Mr. David: On the English side?

Mr. Fortier: On the English side. I realize that I am asking you that question; however, I thought about it before doing so.

Mr. David: I don't know the extent of their talent, over there, to start with. It's hard for me to judge the situation in English Canada, and yet I think there is just as big a pool of talent there as there is in French Canada. However, I think there must be a much more pronounced cultural leadership in English Canada because the American attraction is so strong that leadership is clearly needed in the area of programming, i.e. very clear decisions to produce Canadian programming in order to succeed in countering the cultural invasion, which let's say, might be an American invasion of the country. Now, I'm a very poor judge—I tell you that right away—to be expressing well-founded or serious opinions about it.

Mr. Fortier: You probably remember, in October, it was said—and in a very high place, by the Right Honourable Pierre Elliott Trudeau—that the CBC was "full of separatists," and that if it were necessary, he was going to lock the door, and throw away the key. Could you comment on the Prime Minister's statement?

Mr. David: I think the President did so at the time. In the first place, whether it's full of separatists, I don't know. I do know there are some there, as there are some everywhere in French Canada. Of course, it's an ideology which, as you know, is found in the intellectual and university circles. However, what concerns us isn't really whether people have opted for sovereignty, but whether they are doing their job, whether they are doing their job objectively, honestly, competently. There, I think, our record is good. I'm not saying that there aren't any mistakes, or at times, some clumsiness, but that is what we are concerned with, really, rather than the personal convictions of our staff. So we don't question people about their political opinions, but ask them to faithfully reflect the present reality of French Canada.

Mr. Fortier: Are you satisfied that they are doing that?

Mr. David: On the whole, yes.

[Text]

Senator McElman: Mr. David, in your structuring of a production unit like Moncton which is coming up, would you as a strong part of your consideration, take into account that it should be stocked with people whose background was New Brunswick rather than Quebec, in production and so on?

[Translation]

Mr. David: Of course. At the present time the Moncton radio station is run by, and in fact, employs only Canadians from New Brunswick that is, the station director, the program director, the producers. In some areas, perhaps news, recruiting may be more difficult, for example they have already seen journalists from Montreal. But on the whole we haven't been asked for personnel from Montreal. The situation in Moncton is much easier than, say, in Vancouver, when we had to send in people from the East who had radio experience, and who had sufficient background to set up and run the station. But that's not the situation at all in Moncton, where we certainly expect there is going to be local recruiting of people from the area. As a matter of fact, we didn't have to send many people out there.

Even Toronto now, employs staff, who are people from the Niagara peninsula; in Edmonton, people from Edmonton; French-Canadians from Edmonton are in fact doing the organizing. We much prefer that, because they are far more sensitive to the realities of their own environment. They know the community better and consequently are better able to meet the expectations of their listeners and television viewers. However, it's not our intention at all to parachute Montrealers into Moncton unless, of course, there is a need for one position or another, but not at all intentionally as policy, for equipment and everything, for those stations.

[Text]

Mr. Davidson: Mr. Chairman, I might just add on the basis of the visit that we made to Edmonton last week, I was very favourably impressed with the fact that we have been able to staff our new television station in Edmonton very largely from persons of French-Canadian origin in the Northern Alberta area. I wouldn't want Senator McElman to think, however, that we are going to allow Moncton to become an exclusively New Brunswick preserve in terms of employment, because there are Canadians who live in other parts of the Maritimes. There are French-Canadians who have an equal claim to consideration and while, I think, our basic preference will be, as Raymond David has indicated—I wouldn't want it to be thought that we are going to draw this so rigidly that only Maritimers need apply. I say that as a Nova Scotian myself.

Senator McElman: One would appreciate, Dr. Davidson, that very understandable concern, that would not apply with technicians, et us say, where it would apply with editorial and news-collecting staff.

[Translation]

Mr. Picard: I'd like to answer Mr. Fortier's question. There are two differences: one that seems less important to me, right off, and the other one that is more important.

First, there's no French network like CTV. There are French stations, but no network.

It's good or it isn't good, considering the fact that there's one big market in French Canada, and that's Montreal, and there aren't any more. That's one point. Secondly, you were mentioning artists a little while ago, and there's another problem for English-language artists. It's that the American border is also much more wide open for work down there. There's competition not only for American programs for the Canadian public, but there's competition for artists to bring to English Canada. That isn't true for French-Canadian artists. So there's a second protection there, that doesn't exist in the English network. That perhaps puts the English network in a more precarious position.

[Text]

Mr. Fortier: Insofar as the selection of personnel is concerned, Dr. Davidson, Mr. David has given his reply. He has referred to your statement following the Prime Minister's address in Montreal when you were reported as having said, and I quote:

"It has never been and is not the practice of the CBC to investigate the political sympathies of people being hired".

You speak here of political sympathies of people being hired. What about the political philosophy, and when I ask the question, of course, I think, mainly of the mandate of the CBC which I find in the Broadcasting Act that the national broadcasting service should contribute to the development of national unity and provide for a continuing expression of Canadian identity. Can this truly and effectively be done by people whose philosophy is the breaking up of Canada, as you and I know it today?

Mr. Davidson: Well, if you had an overwhelming concentration of people whose philosophy and political objective was the breaking up of Canada as we know it today, of course, the answer is that it cannot be done; but this does not mean that in the case of an individual who may have an intellectual position in favour of separatism, for example, but who is a journalist of repute or an artist of repute, and is possessed of integrity in the performance of his professional function, this does not mean that he cannot be employed by the CBC, and I would say that his employment is not going to diminish the capacity of the CBC as a corporation to carry out its mandate.

Mr. Fortier: So, what you are looking for is the actual job that he does?

Mr. Davidson: We are looking for men and women of integrity who, regardless of their political colouration, recognize that they have a professional obligation to perform their professional functions for their employer in a manner that is consistent with the objectives of the employer as set out in the mandate.

Now, when the individual begins to let his political slant, political prejudices, his political inclinations, show and reflect themselves in his professional broadcasting function, it is at that point that the Corporation as the employer of that individual must become concerned. But the political convictions—I repeat, the individual political convictions of the individual employed at the Corporation, as long as there is no law of Canada making it a crime or an offence to profess his particular political beliefs, his political beliefs are and can be of no official concern to the Corporation. He can be Liberal, he can be a Conservative. He can be a Creditiste. He can be a Socialist. He can be a Separatist by political conviction.

It is only when he begins to reflect those political convictions and to exploit our airwaves to advance his political cause—It's at that point that we must draw the line.

Senator Beaubien: Have there been any cases of that, Dr. Davidson?

Mr. Davidson: We have had to relieve a number of individuals of their employment with us.

The Chairman: At earlier hearings, it has been stated by a number of people that the working press in Canada tends to have a small "I" liberal bias. Would you agree with that statement? Does it pertain to CBC? Would the working press at the CBC have a small "I" liberal bias?

Mr. Davidson: I don't know what I would feel that that was a generalization that you could apply across the board. I think that the working press has a healthy scepticism of all things related to the establishment, whatever that may be, but I can recall the CBC being under attack under all different administrations that we have had in this country, for being against the government, whatever government it might be from time to time, and on the basis of the...

The Chairman: It has also, incidentally, been argued it is the function of the working press to be against the government.

Mr. Davidson: Well, I think we come closer to fulfilling our mandate in that direction that we do in some other areas of our mandate that I could mention. It is the function of broadcasting organizations such as ours, I believe, to make people think, to provoke, within a degree, responsible controversy and argument about the public issues of the day, and you are certainly not going to do that typically if you become merely the pale shadow and echo of the government's policy on a wide variety of issues. We challenge in many cases the established position of government, both provincial and federal. This is a pretty hazardous thing to do, but it is part of our responsibility.

The Chairman: It says on page 8 of your brief, in the last paragraph:

"The Corporation would be failing in its duty if it were to favour certain options by giving them undue publicity or by eliminating contradictory opinions. As a news medium, the CBC cannot be a propaganda for any cause."

Not even for the cause of national unity?

Mr. Davidson: Oh, yes, by its mandate, it must operate in such a way as to strengthen national unity in this country.

The Chairman: Do you think it does?

Mr. Davidson: I think an argument could be made that we make a very significant contribution to the national unity in the non-political sense.

Too many people, if I may say so, with respect, tend to interpret the expression in the Broadcasting Act in the political sense. I think that we can produce evidence to show that in the cross-fertilization, that we provide through our programming, of the attitudes and the way of life and outlook of different people in different parts of the country, by our regional exchanges, by throwing light on the life and culture of Canadians living in all parts of this country, I think we are providing broadcast material and programming that does strengthen the fabric of our Canadian society.

The Chairman: Do you think that in your French service on television that you are—Perhaps I should put this to Mr. David.

Do you think that you are reflecting to the rest of Canada, let's say, the problems, for example, on the Prairies? Are you doing better job of reflecting those problems to viewers in French Canada than are the daily newspapers in French Canada?

Mr. Davidson: This, I couldn't say with certainty.

The Chairman: I think I was going to ask Mr. David. I am interested in your comment—please go ahead.

Dr. Davidson: Well, I defer to Raymond.

[Translation]

Mr. David: At the present time, we have, in our secretariat, a comparison between our news and public affairs content and that of various papers, not only French-Canadian papers like "Le Devoir" or "Le Soleil" or "La Presse", but also Montreal English-language papers, and we also follow "The Globe and Mail" and other papers. We observe that there really are deficiencies in our information. What I mean is that the French network has also contributed a good deal to the knowledge of our country, and we have taken initiatives that perhaps went unnoticed. I'm thinking of a series like "Vivre en ce Pays", which consisted of 26 documentaries on Canada, in which we showed the physical, social and cultural features of all the provinces of Canada, and even the Yukon.

We had two summer series that we made, "Ballades et Chansons", that were actually bilingual programs and were shown on the English network. These programs were made by a Montreal producer; on the same program you had folk singers and chansonniers, and we went through the whole country from British Columbia to Newfoundland.

In our "Public Affairs" programs we regularly have contributions from other places. Once again, it's only lately that we've had correspondents outside the province of Quebec. For three years now, we've had a correspondent in Vancouver, one in Winnipeg, one in Toronto and one in Moncton. Since we've had these correspondents, no Legislative opening goes unnoticed, and the correspondents immediately send us their stories about the new legislation and the different problems.

We did documentaries, for example, on the growth of Toronto last year. We've tried other things, of course, but they didn't really satisfy anyone. We tried bilingual variety programs. But they didn't really stir up any interest on the English or the French side. I think we've shown a lot of initiative that can't, perhaps, be noticed right away, to make the various regions of Canada known to French-Canadians. And besides, in a document that was recently appended to the brief, we see the various types of programs reflecting the rest of Canada on the French network.

[Text]

The Chairman: Mr. Davidson, do you have an attitude to programming on radio or television in third languages; that is, in the languages of the so-called "new Canadian community"?

Mr. Davidson: Yes, sir, we have first of all our official mandate to discharge, and that is to broadcast programmes in French and English, the two official languages of the country. That is the responsibility laid upon us by the Broadcasting Act itself. We must give absolute priority to that as an obligation.

We do broadcast, as you may be aware, in a good many other languages, not only in our International Service but in our Northern Service, for example. We broadcast in a good many of the native languages of the Indian and Eskimo population, and I see no reason in principle why the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation in its local programming, radio particularly, should not endeavour to meet some of the requirements and concerns of the ethnic groups in our large metropolitan areas.

Having said that, it becomes a matter of priority and a matter of the means to do this, and with the present obligations, we have first to meet our minimum statutory obligations in respect to the French and English languages. It can't be expected, I don't think, that in the near future we will do too much with respect to other languages.

The Chairman: Have you studied it at all?

Mr. Davidson: We have had programmes, actually.

Mr. Hallman: Well, we have. I think during the B and B Commission, we met with people in the research section working on this. Basically, although there is nothing which prevents us from this, most of the larger settlements of other languages are in the major urban areas, where frequently the private sector provides some opportunity and some access for services of that kind. I think the President indicated, in terms of the national services, these are basically French and English.

The Chairman: Thank you.

Mr. Fortier?

Mr. Fortier: Well, on that note, Dr. Davidson, you refer, of course, to the languages of the natives, the Eskimos and the Indians, and other languages in which you broadcast some of your programmes in the north.

Where in the Act do you find your mandate to broadcast in those languages as opposed, in other words, to broadcasting in Italian in Toronto?

Mr. Davidson: Oh, you must have misunderstood me. I do not find anything in the Act that requires us to broadcast in those languages, as such. The only reference to the languages in the Act is to the English and French languages, but I was merely saying that we do some broadcasting in these languages in addition to our broadcasting in French and English.

Mr. Fortier: And would it be in the same spirit that you would do some broadcasting, let us say, in Italian in Toronto or Greek in Montreal?

Mr. Davidson: I think in a slightly different context in two ways. It is more a part of the concept of regional programming than would be the attempt to broadcast Italian or German or a third language in a metropolitan area.

When you consider the fact that the majority of the population in the North West Territories are not white—they are Indian or Eskimos—they have their own languages—it becomes much more an indigenous part of the broadcast picture in those northern communities to have broadcasting by native personnel who speak the native languages, who write plays in the native languages. This is a much more authentic part of the life of that community than it would be to attempt Italian-language programmes, for example, in a city like Toronto or Montreal. So, I do make the distinction between that and I do consider that we have, perhaps, a particular obligation to the Indian and Eskimo population in the far north in the way of developing amongst them communication services and facilities, which does not apply, at least in my judgment, to quite the same degree to our ethnic groups in our large urban concentrations.

Senator McElman: When we had the Indian and Eskimo Association before us, Dr. Davidson, they suggested that quite aside from the north where you had the so-called "packages", that in other areas in Canada not in the far north, they have substantial congregations of Indian people and that CBC perhaps should be doing something similar there. Is the cost prohibitive? As a matter of fact, we urged them to talk with you about this. Is the cost prohibitive where there are large concentrations of people?

Mr. Davidson: Well, there aren't all that large concentrations in any of the smaller settled parts of Canada that would make it easy to provide special programming. I think there has been some talk about northwestern Ontario where, of course, the numbers are substantial, but the concentration is so scattered that you have to develop almost a network to reach these scattered local communities.

Senator McElman: The Metis... Are there sufficient concentrations of size that this would be practical?

Mr. Davidson: On this I could not speak with authority. There are concentrations of five, six thousand, there is no question about that.

The Chairman: Mr. Hallman, did you want to say something on that?

Mr. Hallman: I think, yes, you may have been referring to television, sir, but in radio we have a weekly programme series on the network called "Indian Magazine". Its initial input was from the Northern Service but in order to provide an opportunity for the whole Indian Metis community to communicate among itself and with the rest of the community, it's now on the national radio network every week.

Senator McElman: The proposition here was similar to a northern package and would be operated by the native people themselves, let's say, a grouping of 5,000 Metis in specific area, that CBC would put in the package, and it would be operated by the Metis and be exclusive to their community. Have they approached you, may I ask?

Mr. Davidson: They have not approached us, not so far as I am aware, unless they may have had some conversations with Mr. Cowe of our Northern Service. There have been discussions, the Indian and Eskimo Association and some of their representatives have had some discussions with us on it. This, of course, raises some very particular questions as to whether the CBC should be responsible for the broadcasting or whether it should merely be the means by which broadcast-facilities are put at the disposal of particular groups in the Canadian community for their use amongst themselves.

This introduces a quite different concept of the function of broadcasting. If you, for example, accept the proposition that a small radio network should be established to permit the Indian and Metis communities to communicate amongst themselves and to provide their own programming material and so on, you are in a sense isolating them to that degree from the mainstream of Canadian life as reflected in broadcasting function.

We are doing what Mr. Hallman says now, which does not meet the aspirations, I realize. We are providing as part of our total Canadian service some programming of special interest to this particular group of people, but if I understand it correctly, what they really want is something different from this. They really want to have their own miniature broadcasting network, with broadcasting facilities placed at their disposal for their use, and it would be very difficult to reconcile the obligations of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation under the Broadcasting Act where it's directly responsible, under the terms of its licence, for everything that goes out over the air. It's difficult to reconcile that with a system of which the responsibility and authority to determine the broadcast content could be delegated completely to other groups in the community no matter who they might be.

We had this same problem, I might say, in the field of educational television, and we are facing some interesting situations here where we operate a station. We own the licence to the station. We are responsible to the CRTC, and under the law for every word that is said on that station. Then some provincial authority comes along and says, "Here we have a programme that we have produced ourselves. We would like you to find a half an hour on your station for us to put our programme on." Well, who is responsible for that programme, if there is any exception taken to the grounds that it breaks the law or contends against some particular canon and so on?

We feel that we must retain the responsibility for the programme content and we cannot do that if this system that you have referred to were to be adapted.

Senator McElman: Well, the concept that you suggested here—and I will leave it at that point—was not network, but that there were localities where an individual package unit would serve a real purpose. We did refer them to you.

The Chairman: I wonder if I could turn to a somewhat different problem, and one which I wouldn't want the day to close without our referring to—particularly in view of a comment that you made earlier today.

I am wondering about the whole area of American influence as it relates to national unity, and more particularly to a comment you made earlier today when you said, referring to the Corporation, and I quote—I believe the quote is accurate and I hope I am not taking it out of context. We have moved—and I quote—"too far in that direction already". Could you comment on this, please?

Mr. Davidson: Well, I think that in a situation such as is facing Canada today, with the total volume of American content that Canadians expose themselves to, they do it themselves by choice. The total volume is impressive, and I think it poses certain threats, certain dangers to the survival of the Canadian culture.

When the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation was originally created, it was in a monopoly position. There was no other broadcasting to any great extent available. We had a mandate to provide a balanced fare of programming. Our interpretation, quite correctly, I think, of what was meant by "balanced", was not only balanced in terms of the different kinds of programmes, but also that there should be a fair balance of programmes from other countries. Therefore we included a reasonably large volume of American programming in that, but the American programming was a minority part of the total broadcast fare.

Then we move along, and we begin to get a multiplicity of private broadcasting outlets, and they bring in a substantial amount of American broadcasting, and I am not at all sure that the CBC at that point in time said, "Well, now, perhaps we had better review our concept of how much American programming we should be bringing in in order to achieve balance. Do we have a responsibility of achieving balance within our own programme schedules or do we have a responsibility for achieving overall balance, which might mean that we should be reducing our American content as American content becomes available from other sources?"

Then you move to stage three where with Cablevision, in some communities you have three full American networks coming into the community. What does this do to our concept of balance? If we continue with our original 1952 concept of balanced programming and say we must have a certain proportion of American programming to balance out our programme schedule, and if we add to that the three full-time American networks that come in by Cablevision, the result is to create an imbalance, and I believe that this is what has happened now.

I believe that Canadians are getting a disproportionately small amount of Canadian programming to balance off against the very rich variety of American programming that is available to them, and I think that this should require the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation to review the extent to which it is carrying American programming in its programme schedules, and this is what we are doing at the present time.

The Chairman: May I relate this question to the area of information and perhaps put a question to Mr. Nash who is here?

In the brief at page 34, you list the sources of information you subscribe to, "all the regular news agencies". Then you say:

"These include CP, Reuters, Associated Press, UPI, Agence France Presse, Visnews, and Telbec. An important source of news material for CBC English networks are the long-standing agreements with the two major U.S. networks, NBC and CBS, for access to material from their network news programmes."

Over the page you say quoting from page 35:

"The dangers inherent in over-dependence on American sources are obvious and must be offset".

Now, I have two questions for Mr. Nash. The first one is: To what extent when we watch CBC news and the CBC information programmes are we getting an Americanized version of what's happening, particularly in the world at large?

Mr. Knowlton Nash, Director, Information Programmes, Canadian Broadcasting Corporation: I would say, Mr. Chairman, that on an average national newscast, there might be one to two, sometimes a maximum of three, but more likely one to two of the international items, from American networks. The proportion has been less in the last year than it was in previous years because we have had a greater accent on Canadian events this year.

The Chairman: In your opinion, is there a Canadian point of view to international news stories?

Mr. Nash: I would rather look at a summit conference through a pair of Canadian eyes than through a pair of British eyes or American eyes.

The Chairman: So, how do you meet that obvious desirable objective then?

Mr. Nash: By having correspondents.

The Chairman: Wherever possible... Would you say that the news and information service you operate is in any sense preoccupied with American affairs?

Mr. Nash: We have two correspondents in Washington. We have two in London, one in Paris, Moscow, Hong Kong. No, I wouldn't think it is preoccupied. There is obviously a great deal of interest in what is happening in the United States, and it's reflected in our national newscast. As I say, I think in the last year, the proportion of American news has gone down in the last year.

The Chairman: Yes, I may be putting the questions to the wrong person, and perhaps the President can redirect me. I do think I have the average Canadian's interest in what's happening in the United States, but it occurs to me in many programmes—and this is why I may be putting the question to the wrong person—but I think on so many of your programmes like "Weekend", the radio programmes like "Radio Free Friday", like the programme that's on Monday night, like the open-line programme on radio on Sunday night, Mrs. Shapiro's programme, or any number of TV documentaries—it seems to me, you are as pre-occupied with what's happening down there as what's happening up here. And I agree it's of impelling importance for us as Canadians, but I sometimes wonder if you don't tend to dwell overly on American things.

You can re-direct the question if you wish.

Mr. Davidson: Well, when you stand in the shadow of a giant, you become preoccupied with the shadow of the giant, if not with the giant himself, and I have offered the same criticism to the Corporation.

I will pay note in this tribute as saying that I cannot bring illustrations to mind from the last year, but I do remember expressing to Mr. Halman, in the 1968/69 programme year, my concern that so much of our so-called public affairs programmes were concerned with issues arising in the California hippy community. We had a group therapy programme involving some nudism in some California psychiatric group, and in public affairs, one would normally expect that one would be dealing with issues that are live, real issues in some community in Canada; so, I have expressed that same concern several times.

Mr. Hallman: I think I would just like to say that I think we are all acutely aware of how accessibility to material which is of dramatic interest and which originates in the United States, which has a kind of super-nationalism—it's not internationalism always. It's frequently a stronger nationalism, and I think there is a tendency sometimes for events in Watts or events in Columbia or events in the March on Washington take precedence over domestic events. That constantly has to be weighed.

I think on the other hand, this past year, with the development of "Thursday Night", and "Weekend", with "Man Alive", we have had a tendency to give really, I think, a major new thrust to the coverage of domestic affairs.

The Chairman: You know, I concede to a nationalistic bias, Mr. Hallman, but why on earth do we have to see an eclipse from Halifax on the CBC via CBS?

Mr. Hallman: Well, you know, it's a question of the financing involved in mounting a major pick-up of that kind in that particular location.

The Chairman: But surely—surely—okay, you have answered my question. I was disappointed. I agree that's a ridiculous kind of nationalism but I would have thought that we didn't have to have CBS covering the eclipse in Halifax.

Senator McElman: Mr. Chairman, at the same time, is what you are saying that if we are preoccupied with navels, they should be Canadian navels?

The Chairman: I don't think that's what I said, Senator McElman.

Senator McElman: That's a good point though.

Mr. Hallman: This is a very important point. I was interested in the newscast yesterday morning in which, I think, said that the wife of Jerry Rubin was coming up and being interviewed on a number of different stations, whether ours or elsewhere. The immediate identification by someone of "the Trinidad ten" with "the Chicago seven" is this curious way which Canadians tend to take even the analogies from American experience and apply them to the trials which are being completed. Now, this kind of easy thinking, I think, is something we have got to be always on guard against.

The Chairman: Supplementary question?

Mr. Fortier: Supplementary, if I may...

Mr. Nash—no, I guess it was Mr. Davidson who touched upon the public affairs programmes. It seems to me that ever since "This Hour Has Seven Days" has left the scene, the CBC has not yet, with all due respect to Mr. Nash—found the replacement which the Canadian viewer is looking for. I think it's fair to say that "Weekend" on Sunday is less than the success that you would wish it to be. We know what happened to it on Saturday.

Are you still, in fact, looking for a good, properly balanced Canadian-oriented public affairs programme for Sunday night, and if so—

Mr. Davidson: Are you describing "This Hour Has Seven Days" when you set up those specifications?

Mr. Fortier: This is a subjective definition.

The Chairman: Are you putting that to Mr. Nash or Mr. Davidson?

Mr. Fortier: I was looking at Mr. Nash because...

The Chairman: He was looking at Mr. Davidson.

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Davidson was looking at...

Mr. Nash: We are looking constantly for that kind of thing and hoping that these ingredients will be found in the "Weekend (Sunday)" programming and in the last five or six weeks, it has been found.

Mr. Fortier: Do you think that it can be done on "Weekend" as we know it now?

Mr. Nash: Yes, you were talking of a magazine type programme. When "Seven Days" arrived on the scene, I suppose it was one of the first, if not the first magazine type of programme, and therefore it was new and fresh and different. Magazine programmes aren't now; they are being developed in other countries where they are relatively new. Within any magazine context—yes, you always are searching for better ideas to provide a programming impact.

Mr. Davidson: Well, I agree with what Knowlton says. I think it's quite proper to say that we have tried to establish a somewhat new pattern this year, not exactly the same pattern as "Seven Days" because "Seven Days" was still a public affairs programme; and the hard news was kept separate from the public affairs programming in those times.

This year, we tried to develop an approach which would enable us to bring together in the same programme the hard news elements and public affairs or general information programming.

That we have not achieved the perfect formula is, I think, obvious to all. We ourselves have not been fully satisfied with it. We have recognized this overtly in the decision to discontinue with the "Weekend" programming on Saturday night following the hockey game.

I believe, and I said this in Edmonton earlier this week, that we would be able to profit by our mistakes, to build on the experience we have gained in our first year with "Weekend", and that we can come closer to achieving the kind of objective you have set for the ideal information programme in next year's effort than we have been able to do this year.

The Chairman: I wonder if in this same area of information we could ask Mr. Nash to tell us who chooses the people we see every day on "Viewpoint" and listen to in the morning on "Preview Commentary"?

Mr. Nash: There is a producer in charge of that "Viewpoint".

The Chairman: In every region of the country? These are national, are they?

Mr. Nash: Yes.

The Chairman: I wish I had the quote, I am sorry, I haven't got it here. Senator O'Leary appeared before the Committee, and he had a comment on "Viewpoint", which I can recall, but couldn't articulate in the way that he did but, shall we say, that he was not favourably disposed towards those programmes. He felt they were very shallow and superficial, and that's giving the programmes all the best of it, believe me!

Did you read that comment, Mr. Nash?

Mr. Nash: Yes, I did. I think the programme is designed to give a point of view of broad range of Canadians, whether they be professors or whether they be newsmen or newswomen in the country. It's their point of view, and I think it's a very valid programme because it's not a CBC point of view.

The Chairman: Does this person decide not only who will be on but what will be discussed?

Mr. Nash: Only in the sense of asking somebody to discuss the White Paper on Taxation or whatever they want to discuss.

The Chairman: Is there a great master scoreboard somewhere that says we have had this many people pro the White Paper and this many people against it?

Mr. Nash: We try to keep it balanced, indeed.

The Chairman: Is there a big score sheet somewhere?

Mr. Nash: I haven't seen a score sheet.

Mr. Fortier: Have you found any who were in favour?

The Chairman: There is a comment in the brief which interests me, and I think it's relevant at this particular point. It's a comment on this whole area of dissent. The comment as I recall, is to the effect that perhaps the Corporation tends to accentuate change at the expense of the status quo. Do you think you give adequate expression to the status quo?

Mr. Nash: To the status quo, yes, I think so. We do, I think, to my mind, but I think it may be true to a degree in the sense that the print media is much more establishment-oriented than television.

The Chairman: Which is?

Mr. Nash: The print media maybe.

The Chairman: More establishment-oriented?

Mr. Nash: Yes.

The Chairman: I am glad you made that observation because I didn't want to let that afternoon go by without asking Mr. Picard.

and you, Mr. Davidson, to make a general comment.

I am sure you will think this is an unfair question, but we would be interested in your very frank and very on-the-record comments on the daily newspapers in Canada. I am sure you read them. Could you make a comment on them?

Senator McElman: Mr. Chairman, to give them time to think about that, could I go back and ask a supplementary on a previous question?

The Chairman: Okay. Carry on.

Senator McElman: Does this same producer, Mr. Nash, pick the panels for the discussion type of programmes when politicians of all breeds are questioned?

Mr. Nash: No, no, this is a one-man job, the "Viewpoint" programme. The panel discussion if it's in "Weekend", that's the producer of the "Weekend" programme. If it was in the "Thursday Night" programme, then that is the responsibility of the producer of "Thursday Night". It varies within whatever programme context the debate is being carried.

Senator McElman: When Charlie Lynch was here, we were starting to move into this area. The Chairman very properly pulled me up, and we were getting into the questioning as to why,—not so much of late, I will say—but why for a long period it seemed to be the same faces appearing every time—the ones that Senator O'Leary referred to as "instant experts"—this sort of thing.

Mr. Nash: You mean the same faces, the same...

Senator McElman: Press gallery types.

Mr. Nash: The same press gallery types. Well, it depends. Not everybody wants to go on programmes and not everybody is good at what goes on programmes. Charlie Lynch happens to be rather good on programmes. He is in our new "Encounter" programme on Saturdays.

There is no particular reason for it other than a producer's judgment that this particular person or this group of persons has talent and we would like to have them on the programme.

Senator McElman: But it is not restricted to any small...

Mr. Nash: No, no.

The Chairman: I think Mr. Hallman wants to say something at this point.

Mr. Hallman: I think both the "Commentary" programme after "The World at Eight" News and "Viewpoint"—When Knowlton talks of a man being responsible for the organization of this, he has clearly a mandate to have regional expression across the country as well as from Ottawa, Montreal, New York and London. We endeavour, in a very systematic way, to reflect regional points of view as well as points of views from federal politics, national affairs. You will see frequently, I think, some of the best commentary on French Canada to the English community on "Viewpoint". Frequently there is one done from London, if something is of importance there, or from Washington. I think we have always tried not to make the same face coming up all the time but really, you take the risk with a journalist, we will say, or an academic from a university in Western Canada, because he will express a significant regional view. He may not be the most polished or professional broadcaster, but I think that is why it's a viewpoint. It is a personal view, an informed view, from his point of view, about something of interest to Canadians as a whole.

I think these two kinds of programmes are probably rare birds in broadcasting in North America and I feel they are very important in a country like Canada with the diversity of regional opinions.

The Chairman: What about the religious programmes? I don't mean religious programming, but religious commentary. You run several of those every day.

Mr. Hallman: Religious commentary—You mean "Assignment"?

The Chairman: No, I am referring to a programme which I hear sometimes at about ten after seven in the morning.

Mr. Nash: This would be under Brian Freeland and within the religious area.

The Chairman: Well, it's a local devotion which is usually a political diatribe. Is that the one?

Mr. Hallman: Well, they moved off from the purely devotional morning devotions programmes some years ago.

The Chairman: It is not a morning devotion by my standards. Sometimes, I may say, I get mad. That's probably good.

Senator Beaubien: We get one in Montreal on Channel 7.

Mr. Hallman: Well, we also have "Shop Talk", of course, on the English network, which is on the trade union community, as well.

The Chairman: Well, the point is, on "Shop Talk" and on the morning devotion, these people can talk about what they want, can they?

Mr. Hallman: Well, in the field of morning devotions, it is usually something related to the religious life.

The Chairman: Not in Toronto, I can assure you.

Senator Beaubien: It is a little sermon in Montreal.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Thibault, we have heard Mr. Nash talk about his problems and ambitions. Can you tell us what you are doing in that respect at the CBC for public affairs, news, etc.?

Mr. Thibault: It can be compared fairly well with what the English network is doing. If we glance at the magazine type of programming, we have two big series, "Format 30" and "Format 60"; they can perhaps be compared to the Saturday and Sunday "Weekend" broadcasts on the English network. However, we don't have any programs of the "Viewpoint" type, but we have included them in our "Format 60" and "Format 30" programs.

Mr. Fortier: It certainly isn't material that you lack?

Mr. Thibault: No, I don't think that we are short on that score.

Mr. Fortier: I was reading an article here by Dominique Clift of Quebec, in the "Montreal Star":

Outside the Soviet Union, Quebec is the place where broadcasters on television are most hung up on politics. All day long there is an incredible number of people parading before microphones and cameras, giving their views on a variety of subjects, mostly Quebec and society...

Have you actually encountered that in Quebec?

Mr. Thibault: I think that if we take a look at all our programmes, of course—we should be thinking not just of news bulletins, we should be thinking of public affairs programmes, of all the information programs on the French network—we present some sixty hours of information in all areas each week, on the French network, on radio and television. I think that, when you count up all the politics in it, you realize that there isn't that kind of fairly large impact mentioned there. I'm saying this for our programs as a whole. Of course, if you concentrate on one program like "Format 30" or "Format 60", or information bulletins, certainly the so-called political news of the day looms pretty big.

Mr. Fortier: Is it your experience that French-Canadians do a lot more thinking about politics than English-Canadians?

Mr. Thibault: I couldn't say, but they do think a lot about politics.

[Text]

Mr. Davidson: What date is that, Mr. Fortier? May I refer to that?

Mr. Fortier: October 23rd, 1969, The Montreal Star.

Mr. Davidson: I hope we can live up to that.

Senator McElman: Dr. Davidson, some while ago you, on this same line, suggested that if, let's say, an interviewer's philosophy came through in his activities, you would be looking very carefully at him. Would you consider a reflection of his philosophy if in his interviewing he had a preponderance of people who were devoted to the separatist cause?

Mr. Davidson: This would depend, I think, senator McElman, on how critical an issue that issue was at that particular time.

If you have a very critical incident or an issue at any point in time, it is natural that you will have a tremendous number of people commenting on that or speaking around it or discussing it because it is a live subject of discussion; and I would expect that in a period when the issue of separatism in Quebec was a critical issue, at the very peak of the controversy over separatism, that you would have much more of a concentration of time and commentary on that issue than you would at some subsequent point in time.

I think it is probably fair to say that Mr. René Levesque appeared more frequently on the French television a few years ago at the time of his conversion to the separatist cause, at the time of the creation of the Parti Québécois, than has been the case in more recent months and years, when René Levesque and the Parti Québécois had been accepted as a part of the political scene in the Province of Quebec, at least as I look at television and see it reflected in the broadcasts. They have taken more of a normal and less of an unnatural place in the comment in the total broadcasting spectrum.

Incidentally, there was a great outcry, I recall, at the time of the founding convention of the Parti Québécois, to the effect that the CBC was overwhelming the air waves with publicity on the subject of the newly founded Parti Québécois.

We made an analysis of the leading newspapers in the country. English-speaking and French-speaking, as well as our own breakdown of the amount of time we had given the party, and we found that if there were any offenders in over-publicizing the Parti Québécois and René Levesque at the time, it was the English network, and not the French network, and it was the Toronto Globe and Mail and the English newspapers of Canada, all of which carried very much more prominently the account of the founding of the Parti Québécois than we had carried on our French-language television.

Senator McElman: To get back to the heart of the question, obviously, in such an organization as yours, you must have checks and balances, and amongst those checks, would this be one of the ways in which a philosophy of an interviewer or an employee in public affairs programming could be reflected?

Mr. Davidson: If we came to the conclusion that he was collecting, either consciously or unconsciously, over-frequently from a particular segment of the political spectrum, we would try to ensure that that was corrected, if we felt that this was being done out of proportion to what the circumstances demanded.

Senator McElman: Without dealing in names, have you ever had to do that, Mr. Davidson?

Mr. David: Yes, and many times.

Senator McElman: What do you do in such a case, Mr. David?

Mr. David: Well, I will answer in French.

[Translation]

At that time, there are different subjects. It's not necessarily because people are biased. There are some moderators who are more emotional than others. If there are subjects that are too red-hot, that's when, professionally, his performance isn't good. He is assigned to quite different subjects. They'll have him handle international problems instead of national problems, or else, they'll assign him to another type of program. But such things don't often happen, because we think the performance is generally professional. We have had to assign persons to another job instead of those subjects where we thought a balance wasn't being kept. I don't know whether Marc wants to comment on that, but that's generally the position we take.

[Text]

Senator McElman: Have there been any cases of actual separation of employment?

Mr. David: There have been, yes.

The Chairman: I wonder if I might return to the question I asked a few minutes ago, Mr. Davidson. Could you make some general comments on the newspapers in Canada?

Mr. Davidson: I don't know that it would be appropriate for me to make any comment on that subject, Mr. Chairman. I read the newspapers. I have my opinions as to the good ones and the ones that are not so good, and I think they are...

The Chairman: I am not pressing you to give us your opinion. I am tempted to, but I won't, if you prefer not to.

Mr. Davidson: I think perhaps not.

Mr. Fortier: They spoke of you.

The Chairman: I must say there was no reluctance on their part. Mr. Picard, do you want to say anything on this?

Mr. Picard: Well, I am in a bad position on this.

Mr. Fortier: Let's take a look at the Act and see if there is a provision for this.

The Chairman: Well, perhaps then I could ask Mr. Nash a question.

At page 37 in the brief—It is not the same question, No. At page 37 in the brief, it says:

Nevertheless, if we compare a television newscast of fifteen years ago with one of today, we can easily see that pictorial journalism, even if it has not been able to exploit the medium completely, has certainly broken free from the influence of written and oral journalism and established its own identity and dynamic.

I am tempted to ask you what television newscasts will be like fifteen years from now but I suppose that would be an unrealistic question. Could you tell us what a television newscast will look like five years from now?

Mr. Nash: I don't know, Mr. Chairman. There are some interesting developments that are happening in a number of countries. In France, in ORTF, in their newscasts, and Mr. Thibeault can perhaps correct me if I am wrong, but I think they have a system of a much more conversational kind of newscast than we have in North America for the most part; and the French network of the CBC began to move somewhat in this direction. On the BBC they are mixing a bit of commentary with Gerry Priestland doing a commentary in the newscast. There is a slight and increasing mixing.

Now, whether this is the way of the future or not, I don't know. It is something that I just want to watch. We haven't moved in this direction to any extent; modestly in relation to "Weekend"; in relation to the national news, not so much, though it is very, very slightly looser from the strict format of before.

I notice NBC is now having three people to do the same, what will soon be the former Huntley/Brinkley newscast. Part of their thinking is to have it slightly more conversational and perhaps, as I say, this may be one of the developments that is happening.

You may see possibly more live events on the newscasts. I don't think you will see an increase in the amount of film because it's largely film as it is now.

Mr. Davidson: Mr. Chairman, Mr. Picard and I honestly declined to give you our own views on the newspapers of Canada, but I can give you something if you would like me to—or whether you would like me to or not, if you would permit me to—about what Canadians generally, apart from Mr. Picard and I, think about the newspapers and the relative reliability of the news as purveyed by newspapers versus TV and radio.

I have in front of me the Gallup Poll of Canada as reported in the Toronto Daily Star of March 2nd, 1970, which reports that two out of three Canadians who read news coverage in this country think it is influenced by personal bias whether it be on newspapers, TV or radio. The question asked was "Which of the three news media have the fairest coverage?" "It depends on where you live", the answer is.

In Ontario, 42 per cent of the people say the press is more reliable. In Quebec, 56 per cent claim that TV news is less biased than newspaper reporting. In the west, opinion is divided. In the Maritimes, TV is considered more reliable than newspapers, and of those Canadians, 66 per cent feel that news is sometimes presented unfairly, 66 per cent think it happens more often in newspapers than on TV or radio.

I think on the basis of this survey made by the Gallup Poll, there is every indication that the TV news and radio news stands up well in comparison with newspaper reporting and as far as the viewpoint of Canadians generally on the question of reliability is concerned.

The Chairman: Do you think that a Canadian could be sufficiently well informed by simply watching television?

Mr. Davidson: Not in depth, I would think not.

The Chairman: Am I to assume—

Mr. Davidson: I have to agree with Walter Lippmann.

The Chairman: Could I assume that Mr. Hallman, Mr. Picard and yourself, that two of the three of you think that many news reports are biased? It says two out of three!!

I think that, unhappily, I have to close the session. I shall allow only one more question and you have one, I think, Mr. Fortier, do you? I am sorry, I apologize to everyone but this will have to be the final question.

Mr. Fortier: I still have quite a few, but it was on the item of future technology which is so important and which is covered, I find, very adequately indeed in your written brief, Dr. Davidson. What is not covered in the brief is: What is the CBC doing at the moment to hedge against the future technology?

Mr. Davidson: Well, I assume you mean the cablevision as an instrument of communication and the satellites as an instrument of communication. Certainly on the satellite we are with it albeit—

Mr. Fortier: Who said you had to participate?

Mr. Davidson: Nobody said we had to participate. We had a lot of people breathing down our necks, and we had a lot of people telling us that we had to play our part in the satellite development and in the making, the financing of the satellite, feasible.

Mr. Fortier: Can Canadians afford both microwave and satellite?

Mr. Davidson: They are going to get both whether they can afford it or not, but the satellite is not going to be a money-saving device for communication of the broadcast programmes to the people of Canada. I am trying to be as cautiously and conservatively careful as I can in saying that. I think we do recognize that the techniques of transmission of the programme material are changing, that cablevision can affect the technique of transmission very substantially insofar as the urban areas are concerned. The satellite when it comes will also affect in dramatic ways, the technique of transmission; but I think we can become preoccupied with the technique of transmission to the extent that we forget what this complicated machinery is all about. All that we are doing in shifting from the microwave to the cable or the transmission tower to the cable or the onward step to the satellite—all we are doing is changing from the horse and buggy to the automobile to the aeroplane.

Somebody will still have to put something into that system in the way of a programme that is worth communicating, and the concern that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation will continue to have as the technology changes is the concern with what is our basic function. That is not to set up and operate a whole raft of hardware from coast to coast, but to produce the kind of programming that we think is important for Canadians to have available to them, if we are going to discharge our obligations under the Act with respect to the maintenance of the Canadian identity and the preservation of all that we hold to be characteristic and valuable in Canadian life. Therefore, I think my answer to you is that while we recognize this and will adapt to it, and while in terms of a satellite, we certainly are very much in on the development, we are concerned much more with the maintenance of quality programming regardless of the vehicle that is available for its transmission.

Mr. Fortier: I think that's a very happy note on which to end the proceedings, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: Dr. Davidson, Honourable Senators, ladies and gentlemen, if I could just make an observation in conclusion—it would be that the CBC is sometimes bullied, often damned, usually unloved and occasionally even praised. And if I could express a very personal opinion, I think it's very much needed especially in this kind of a country because, after all, the CBC is a national institution in a country which has far too few national institutions.

Certainly a study of the kind we have undertaken here would be impossible without a reference and indeed an important and detailed reference to the work of the Corporation.

In that connection, I would like to thank you for the excellent material which you have put at the Committee's disposal, and I would like to say to you, Dr. Davidson, and to all of your colleagues that this has been for us very valuable testimony. Thank you so much.

May I say to the Senators that the Committee will be meeting the Canadian Association of Broadcasters in this room at 10.00 a.m. tomorrow morning, and may I remind you of the royal assent at 5.45. The meeting adjourned.

SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE ON MASS MEDIA

EVIDENCE

Ottawa, Friday, March 13, 1970

The Special Senate Committee on Mass Media met this day at 10.00 am.m.

Senator Keith Davey (Chairman) in the Chair.

The Chairman: Honourable Senators, I would like to call this session to order. This morning we are receiving a brief from the Canadian Association of Broadcasters and perhaps even before I introduce the guests, it will be necessary to underline that what we have here this morning is not a poor man's CRTC hearing, or a junior grade Royal Commission on broadcasting. Instead, it is a Special Senate Committee on the Mass Media and I think it is important that you realize the context in which we are looking at broadcasting—it is specifically the role of broadcasting in the overall Canadian media spectrum. I think that is perhaps important to put on the record before we even begin.

Now, the President of the Canadian Association of Broadcasters, sitting on my immediate right is Mr. Raymond Crépault, who is the president of the private broadcasters and who in real life is a prominent Quebec broadcaster. On my left is Mr. Bill McGregor who is the Vice-President, Television, of the C.A.B., whose own station is KCO Television; and at the possible risk of embarrassing Mr. McGregor I should mention that in the first job I had in broadcasting, he was the chief engineer when I was a lowly mesman. CKCO is in Kitchener as you perhaps realize.

Next to Mr. McGregor is Mr. Jack Fenety, who is the Vice-President, Radio, of the C.A.B. and whose station is CFNB in Fredericton. Perhaps a familiar figure to some of you at the right end of the table is Mr. Jim Allard who is the Executive Vice-President of the C.A.B.

Now, there are some other private broadcasters and I think I might ask the president to begin his submission by introducing these people. I would only say to you, Monsieur Crépault, that our procedure here I am sure you are familiar with. You have submitted a brief more than three weeks in advance in compliance with our written guidelines and we are grateful for your co-operation. It has been circulated and studied and read by the Senators and we would like you now to perhaps take ten, twelve, or fifteen minutes to make an opening oral statement in which you can expand upon your brief or say anything else which may be on your mind, and following that we would like to question you on the contents of your brief and perhaps on other matters which are of interest to us. As I have said to so many other witnesses, if you feel any of the questions could be more effectively dealt with by your colleagues, then by all means refer them.

Welcome; the floor is yours.

Mr. Raymond Crépault, President, The Canadian Association of Broadcasters: Thank you very much Mr. Chairman. Honourable Senators, I am delighted to be here this morning. Perhaps I may start with your suggestion, Mr. Chairman, of introducing the members of the Committee, the other directors of the Association who were able to attend the meeting this morning.

Mr. T. J. Allard, Executive Vice-President, Canadian Association of Broadcasters; there is Mr. Orval Kope from Medicine Hat, Mr. Henri Audet from Three Rivers, Mr. Moffat from Winnipeg, and Mr. Frank Murray, from Belleville. These are the members of the Board of Directors of the Canadian Association of Broadcasters. The Chairman was kind enough to introduce me—my name is Raymond Crépault and I here in my capacity as the President of the Canadian Association of Broadcasters.

The Canadian Association of Broadcasters, l'Association canadienne des radiodiffuseurs, includes in its membership some 260 radio stations, and some 55 television stations. In addition it includes also the CTV Network and a French radio network—Radiomutuel—the collective membership of which represents about 98 per cent of the private sector of broadcasting in Canada.

The Canadian Association of Broadcasters appreciates indeed, Mr. Chairman, your thoughtfulness in asking for our views and ideas and as I said we are delighted to be here.

We believe that discussions of this kind, especially in this atmosphere, can be of significant value and benefit to Canada. There is one area in particular we would like to emphasize, in the hope it may engage your particular consideration.

We are all dealing here with a fundamental and very precious thing—the right of full access to public information; the right to exchange opinions, and to examine ideas in public without fear of reprisal. What our society is, results from the ability to spread ideas far and wide and to discuss and examine these.

To this day I think no one has put it better than did John Milton when speaking from the passion of his whole life, he said "Give me the liberty to know, to utter and to argue freely according to conscience, above all liberties".

In 1947 the principle was restated by "The Commission on Freedom of the Press", headed by Mr. Robert M. Hutchins, then Chancellor of the University of Chicago. It found that: "Freedom of speech and press is close to the central meaning of all liberty. Where men cannot freely convey their thoughts to one another, no other liberty is secure. Where freedom of expression exists, the germ of a free society is already present, and a means is at hand for every extension of liberty. Free expression is therefore unique among liberties as a protector and promoter of the others; in evidence of this when a regime moves toward autocracy, speech and press are among the first objects of restraint or control."

This is so true, Mr. Chairman, that everytime these take place in some country, an uprising or a revolt, we find that the very first target of the rebels is inevitably the radio and television stations. In a similar context, the Inter-American Association of Broadcasters decided a few weeks ago that it should cancel its forthcoming Annual Convention to protest the absolute take-over by the Government of Peru of all the newspapers publishing in that country.

In every age, in every place, there have been those who sought to choke off the free flow of expression and the free interchange of ideas. Usually, however, there was an informed, articulate and courageous body of opinion which, in the event, rendered attempts as meaningless as those of the forest warden who tried to keep the crows out of his park by closing the gate.

In many areas of the world, the traditional menaces to freedom of expression still exist. In our own society we think that a new kind and a somewhat curious kind of danger has arisen.

This consists of the indifference, sometimes the hostility, of large segments of the public itself—the very people whose general body of freedom depends upon freedom of information.

No one seems to know what has caused this growing tendency to blame the messenger for the news. We hope that your Committee will examine this new tendency with care, and try to find some causes and some possible solutions.

Appendix "A" of our written submission to you quotes at least one informed searcher who has sought to grapple with this puzzling phenomenon. Professor John Tebbel says "Among the middle class especially, one senses a hatred that goes beyond simple disbelief, as though people were blaming the press for the ugliness of life today. Where middle-class citizens read about riots, the plight of the ghettos and the rise of black militants, they believe the newspapers incite the poor and the blacks to make trouble for everybody else because of 'all the publicity given to them. It is the incredibly naive idea of these people, numbering millions, that if the newspapers and television and radio would just stop talking about the militant leaders and the dissidents of every stripe, and stopped printing and broadcasting the news of crime and corruption which saturates the fabric of our life today, much of this activity which so disturbs the peaceful surface of affluence, would wither away from lack of attention."

We would like to express the hope that your Committee, particularly qualified to do so, will carefully examine this disturbing development. We hope, too, that your report will deal extensively with it and emphasize to Canadians that even when they dislike seeing or hearing or reading about disturbing facts in our society, that the process of bringing these to their attention is itself the key to all their other liberties.

Insofar as broadcasting is concerned, most of the other issues you are examining have already been examined by three Royal Commissions, one "Committee", an influential private Committee, 20 Parliamentary Committees and various regulatory bodies, some of which continue that examination. Broadcasting stations are closely governed by the Broadcasting Act, the Radio Act, and Regulations made under these. To operate at all, a broadcasting station must have a licence granted by the Canadian Radio-Television Commission, after careful examination of all station's affairs. The Commission is entitled to receive any and all information necessary for the discharge of its licensing, regulatory and supervisory functions.

Any ownership transfer of shares or assets in a Broadcasting station in Canada must be approved by the CRTC. Broadcasters are required to pay a "transmitter licence fee" which is over and above all other taxes required of our and other industries. We are forbidden to sell more than approximately 25 per cent of our products; there are certain products we are prohibited from advertising at all; and others may be advertised only under limitation.

Proposals now available for public discussion, would require television broadcasting stations in Canada to be a minimum of 60 per cent Canadian and radio broadcasting stations to use 30 per cent Canadian music.

In all this, we are in direct competition with U.S. radio and television signals which can and do flow across the border freely; we are also increasingly in competition with such signals imported by cable, a means of communications which is growing at this time in Canada at a rate of 45 per cent per year, and we must remember that in any event, some 90 per cent of our Canadian population has some access to one or more U.S. signals.

Since its inception, broadcasting in this country has been a chosen instrument of public policy. In words of the present Broadcasting Act, it is selected to "safeguard, enrich and strengthen the cultural, political, social and economic fabric of Canada".

For fifty years, broadcasters have lived with this situation in spite of severe, and at times unexplainable, limitations imposed on the industry.

It is now suggested, as you know, that still further limitations be imposed on the broadcasting industry. This is being done at a time when costs are rising steeply, the pace of technological development is making ordinary planning extremely difficult, and the impact of the United States competition being rapidly increased. Many of us, therefore, wonder if solutions utilized in the past, and the present, to try and keep private broadcasting economically healthy while at the same time, utilizing it as a chosen instrument of public policy, will any longer be workable.

In Appendix "F", we have enlarged upon this matter and suggested some possibilities which could set new patterns into the future.

One essential element of that process could be the creation of what I would call a Canadian Program Production Corporation, the financing of which would consist of (a) $50,000,000.00 annually, diverted from amounts now paid the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation; (b) The entire annual budget of the National Film Board which I believe Mr. Chairman is in the neighbourhood of $15,000,000.00 which would be merged with this new corporation; (c) Funds available to the Canadian Film Development Corporation which I understand Mr. Chairman is estimated to be $10,000,000.00 which would also be merged with this new corporation; (d) any additional funds that any private source wishes to put in. This would include grants from foundations; it would include monies put up for specific production or on a co-production basis, on a continuing or per-program arrangement; (e) Retention in Canada for payment to this new corporation of 15 per cent of amounts derived from the sale, rental, lease or exhibition in Canada of any program material imported from abroad, wherever used in Canada.

This would guarantee the Canadian Program Production Corporation a minimum income of $75,000,000.00 per year. With these funds and any additional monies it was able to obtain, it would be charged with the responsibility of producing Canadian-oriented programs.

Some part of these would be used by radio and television broadcasting stations as a condition of licence. These would be free to lease, rent or purchase additional material upon mutually agreed terms. The material would also be available for sale, lease or rental abroad; and it is to be hoped that additional funds would be derived from that source.

A second essential element of that process in the field of communications Mr. Chairman, would be to have the Industrial Development Bank and similar sources of financing permitted, indeed encouraged, to extend loans to the broadcasting industry, with rates and terms dictated by a consideration for public policy objectives.

The provisions of Section 12 (a) of the Income Tax Act should be extended to include advertising expenditures of the type covered by the section made on United States broadcasting stations.

It could also be legislated Mr. Chairman that the depreciation rate of 50 per cent granted to newspapers, for obvious reasons of public policy, should be extended to cover broadcasting stations as well.

Cable transmissions should be regarded as a projection, an extension of public policy objectives. Thus, cable systems would be licensed to broadcasting transmitting undertakings in order to provide service to geographical areas which might not otherwise receive such service.

This combination of arrangements in my view and in our view, Mr. Chairman, would recognize the practical, fundamental realities of the situation; they would recognize finally that to use a now familiar phrase "The only thing that really matters in broadcasting is programming".

I would like to conclude this opening statement by reiterating the conviction of our Association—and which is also my personal conviction—that we are dealing here with a fundamental and very precious thing, the right of full access to public information, the right to exchange opinions, and to examine ideas in public without fear. In this respect, we have been fortunate so far in Canada, but at the same time, it does not mean, it should not mean that our Press, electronic and other, in Canada, is inevitably or automatically immune against blind or sweeping criticism. We must be conscious of the fact that there are some danger signals in Canada in the field of private broadcasting, which could suggest that if we are not careful—if the citizens of this country are not made aware of the fundamental importance of a private broadcasting system, free from undue encroachments and from capricious interference, we could then eventually see our press experience in Canada the same disastrous fate which has been that of the Press in many other countries of the world, including some so-called western democracies.

I am sure that all of you here are familiar with the outstanding service provided and contributions made over the years by the private broadcasting industry in Canada.

For my part, Mr. Chairman, as you know, I am now serving my sixth year on the Board of Directors of The Canadian Association of Broadcasters, and I have been involved in private broadcasting since 1957. Throughout these years, I have become increasingly aware of the real contributions which private broadcasters have made and are making to the human values, the realism, the dynamism, strength and unity of Canada.

I have been part of many meetings of broadcasters. I have been part of informal discussion groups, of executive committee meetings, Board of Directors and annual meetings.

In all these, those Canadians whose mother tongue is French and those Canadians whose mother tongue is English, meet together on equal terms, with mutual understanding, regard and respect, with no narrow parochial feeling, dreaming no small dreams, but possessed of an admirable determination to contribute to the still further development of our national purpose and the objectives we share in common.

What people are, is reflected in what they do. All of these broadcasters return from meetings to their respective communities knowing more, I am certain, about Canada and Canadians, than most professional groups in this community; that knowledge and that spirit is reflected in their actions.

We have repeatedly talked in Canada about the essential role played by the railroads in the task of linking the various parts of our country, and of creating some feeling of a united country. I submit to you Honourable Senators, that in this second part of the 20th century, one of the essential factors working towards this proposition of Canadian unity, and helping all of us to realize our national purpose, is private broadcasting."

Thank you very much Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: Thank you. I think the questioning this morning will begin with Mr. Fortier.

Mr. Fortier: Monsieur Crépault, supposing the legislators went to the CAB and said "Gentlemen, we have decided to re-write the Broadcasting Act—we will give the private broadcasters the airwaves—we will let you make money." What would you do, Mr. Crépault, if they came up with a new text of the Act?

Mr. Crépault: Well I would first delete that last sentence about making money to begin with.

Mr. Fortier: Do you then believe that a private broadcaster should make money?

Mr. Crépault: I think it should, definitely, but I don't think we should make it sound as though it is the first objective. I think that you will find many broadcasters to begin with who are perhaps in agreement with the idea, and maybe the time has come now to undertake a pretty extensive review of the broadcasting structure in Canada and in some way this is perhaps the idea that we tried to convey in our written submission and in the oral statement I have just made. Whether we like it or not, I think we are moving and pretty rapidly moving towards a society in which the borders, the frontiers, are really disappearing. This expression of the shrinking world I think is a well founded expression and whether we like it or not within a few years—in fact now we have this regular intrusion into Canada of U.S. signals and within a few years we have to accept the assumption that within a few years through the satellite and other technological devices we will be getting signals, not only from the United States but from all over the world.

I am sure that some of you have already seen for instance U.S. television programs in which the actors speak Japanese or Indian—in other words the frontier particularly for that kind of material is really disappearing and therefore we must ask ourselves what are we means that Canadians must have in order to be able to survive in the context of a Canadian entity.

Mr. Fortier: Survive economically?

Mr. Crépault: Survive economically and culturally. Now, I think that there are really two basic approaches to providing a solution to this problem. One—and I am perhaps in a better position to talk about it being a French-Canadian, and you are also familiar with this approach, Mr. Fortier—one of course is to suggest that the best way to survive and to maintain and preserve the sacred aspect or the purity of a culture is to build around a given area some kind of a wall which would in fact invite the people living in that area to live in a cultural ghetto. That way we would create for these people an immunity to whatever outside influences would exist, and to my surprise as a French-speaking Canadian, I now find that some people are advocating the same kind of approach when we come to talk about Canadian culture. As a French-Canadian I find this absolutely incredible because I know that in my province I am trying to resist the very same kind of approach.

Mr. Fortier: But has it not worked in the Province of Quebec? I am referring here specifically to the development of radio and television stations of French-Canadian talent?

Mr. Crépault: I don't know—it may be...

The Chairman: It may be that Monsieur Crépault and Monsieur Fortier would like to speak in French. We have our translation service available.

Mr. Fortier: Well, Mr. Chairman, we have already discussed this.

The Chairman: Oh, fine.

Mr. Crépault: I don't think that the French radio stations have remained French because they were forced or compelled to operate in a cultural ghetto. The same way I don't think I am less a French-Canadian because I am bilingual or because my views in terms of undertakings and so on go well beyond the Quebec borders. I think that the same approach, the same reasoning, the same mentality must necessarily apply with regard to Canada as a national entity.

Mr. Fortier: Well, I was going a step further and speaking of the fostering of French-Canadian talent on French radio and television stations where in fact this, so to speak, ghetto has been set up and has contributed to the development of the talent within the community.

Mr. Crépault: Well, I don't think it has developed because there was a ghetto. I simply think that there was a special surge of French-Canadian talent simply because we had to remain competitive.

The Chairman: May I ask a complementary question. You said as a French-Canadian. Do you think you as a French-Canadian can fully appreciate the absolute flood of American ideas, American culture if you will, into English Canada? You don't have this in the Province of Quebec because of the language barrier which I would suggest is a great advantage in this situation.

Mr. Crépault: Well, your question has two aspects. Firstly, I would like to believe that I am in a position through my travels and through my interest in Canadian broadcasting to be aware of the inflow and the impact of U.S. signals into Canada, and the second part of your question is that you are suggesting that perhaps in French Canada we have been more or less immune against this, but I don't think this is exactly correct because even French speaking television stations in Montreal or in Quebec are really in some way in competition with U.S. signals. This is true especially in the Montreal area where you have cables. Let us face the fact that French-Canadians do have cable; French-Canadians do watch U.S. signals. They watch U.S. signals if they find that the programs offered on the French channels are not of sufficient quality to attract and retain their attention. What I realize is that there is an additional concentration with regard to French-speaking Canada. I don't think that the basic problem is that difference between French-speaking Canada and the rest of Canada, and if I may just pursue the basic answer to your question, as I said there are really two solutions, two approaches to the solution of the basic problem that you have raised. I have touched upon one already about the way—what I call the narrow approach by saying well, all right, let's surround ourselves with the protective wall and in that way our culture will not be diluted. As I say, I think this is completely unrealistic—I think this is a completely unrealistic approach in our society today when I think that the frontiers on the borders are really disappearing and when we are really moving rapidly towards a one world concept, specially in terms of communications.

The other approach—and I think it is a fair statement that some European countries even smaller than ours realized this—that having the real answer within the context of our culture and the context of our heritage, and I think in order to be competitive it calls for money, it calls for convictions and it calls for the tools to do the job properly.

The Chairman: I believe Mr. McGregor wanted to make a comment at this point.

Mr. W. D. McGregor, Vice-President, Television, Canadian Association of Broadcasters: If I may Mr. Chairman, just add to the point that our President has made. I would suggest to you that when you are discussing the effect of American culture in the Province of Quebec or in the French language parts of Canada, you can't ignore the fact that we are not only talking about linguistics or the linguistic situation here—there isn't just a linguistic division—we are talking about a cultural division and the cultural division is broken frequently by a program such as "Ironside" in French or even as a matter of fact "The Flintstones" which you see in French. Now, the whole of the culture that is in those programs goes right through. The fact that the language is changed makes no difference at all.

Mr. Fortier: But we were told yesterday, Mr. McGregor by the CBC, by Mr. Raymond David of Radio Canada, that those American programs that are dubbed in French were not as popular as the made-in-Quebec Canadian programs shown on the French network. The comparison with the English network was just not valid; there was no comparison, so I am afraid I would take issue with your point because even at that level a dubbed in American program has not been the success that the undubbed, non-dubbed American program on the English network is.

Mr. Chairman: Well, maybe Mr. McGregor would like to comment on that.

Mr. McGregor: I would like to suggest that perhaps two points need to be made here. One is that whether it is English Canada or French Canada the fact is the number one program of course is Canadian—that is N.H.L. Hockey. The second point I would make is...

The Chairman: The Stanley Cup may not be this year!

Mr. Fortier: Don't count out your Maple Leafs yet!

Mr. McGregor: The second point I would make in that area is that I think—I would agree of course that in many areas the native product is by far the ratings leader but I have to disagree that programs such as Cinema Kraft which are motion pictures—things of that nature indeed have extremely good audiences in French Canada and I think that it really isn't fair to make a blanket assertion such as you did. I am not trying to make it difficult for you....

Mr. Fortier: I am repeating what was said to this Committee yesterday.

Mr. McGregor: Right.

Mr. Fortier: And I take your point, Mr. McGregor. Mr. Crépault, first and foremost you appear to make the point that in order to remain competitive you must do away with the barriers?

Mr. Crépault: That is one element anyway but it is not the sole element. As I have said, in order to be competitive you have to have quality programs and in order to have quality programs it takes first of all extensive financing, it takes talent and it takes a real organization; in fact it takes the kind of organization I presume legislators had in mind when they established the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

Mr. Fortier: Has it succeeded?

Mr. Crépault: In my view, personally, I don't think so.

Mr. Fortier: Why?

Mr. Crépault: Simply because I think that they have gradually shifted the emphasis they were supposed to place on the main objective of the CBC...

Mr. Fortier: Which was what originally?

Mr. Crépault: I think to really create and encourage Canadian talent and Canadian productions.

Mr. Fortier: Do you think they have tried to do exactly what you suggest or are they trying to keep competitive with the private broadcasters?

Mr. Crépault: I think that is exactly it. They have tried to become public broadcasters with private money. They have tried to do this to the tune of two hundred million dollars a year.

The Chairman: I think we should perhaps ask Mr. Crépault to discuss the CBC in the context of the Broadcasting Act, because what may or may not have been anybody's intention originally really isn't germane to the discussion. The CBC has a particular mandate now—the point I am making is whether your criticism is of the Corporation or is it of Parliament and the Broadcasting Act?

Mr. Crépault: No, I think it is probably a criticism of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

The Chairman: You don't think they are meeting the mandate as described in the Act?

Mr. Crépault: I don't think so. On the basis of my interpretation of the Act I don't think they are.

The Chairman: All right.

Mr. Fortier: Do you think they have begun to commercialize?

Mr. Crépault: I think so. Well, if you really want to analyse it let us take their budget.

Mr. Fortier: I wish you would, please.

Mr. Crépault: An annual budget of $200,000,000. Well, in effect, out of this budget you might be very surprised to know that not more than 10 per cent of it is in fact really spent on actual Canadian talent.

Mr. Fortier: Well, I would admit it is not much but a little bit more than that.

Mr. Crépault: Well, not much more, so naturally we would ask ourselves what is the rest of it being spent on. This is where I think that my personal reaction as a Canadian citizen takes place; what is the rest being spent on?

The Chairman: That is roughly 20 million dollars?

Mr. Crépault: That's right.

The Chairman: What would be the comparable private broadcasting figures, just in passing?

Mr. Crépault: Well, I would say proportionately that all told it would be 40 per cent of it easily.

The Chairman: Well, their figure is 20 million—what would you figure be? Would it be 40 per cent of 20 million?

Mr. Crépault: 40 per cent of the overall budget. You have to take the annual budget of all the radio and television stations.

The Chairman: Well, what would it be? We are saying the CBC spends $20 million, what would your figure be—in round figures?

Mr. Crépault: Well, I would say...

Mr. McGregor: It is very likely, Mr. Chairman, a matter of interpretation unfortunately as is the case with so many figures. I would suggest that the figure is not less than 40—may be 60 million.

The Chairman: So you would say—I am sorry, Mr. Fortier, I realize it is your supplementary question, but you say that you are spending more on Canadian talent than the CBC is?

Mr. McGregor: Well, both in actual terms and in proper proportion.

Mr. Fortier: Maybe we should define our terms.

Mr. Crépault: I agree. I know there are different definitions and so on but I think necessarily this morning we should talk a general context. I think it is fair to say that proportionately and in absolute terms I think the whole collective private broadcasting industry in Canada is spending more on this than the CBC is.

Mr. Fortier: That is your first point.

Mr. Crépault: That is the first point. And also the other point which really flows from the first is what is the 180 million dollars being spent on? This is the point where I personally rebel as a Canadian citizen. They spend part of it in the purchase of American programs.

Mr. Fortier: What part of it, do you know?

Mr. Crépault: Well, quite frankly, I don't know what part but for instance we all know programs like Bonanza and Laugh-In for instance. In the case of Laugh-In which is a 100 per cent American program, in effect the CBC because of the vast funds available to them were able to outbid the private Canadian network in purchasing that program. Well, to my mind regardless of the interpretation one could give to the Act the CBC were certainly not meant to do that kind of thing.

Mr. Fortier: You don't believe the CBC, once Laugh-In had become the No. 1 entertainment program in America, you don't think it was justified in going out on the open market—which it did—and bid against the CTV network for it?

Mr. Crépault: It depends upon the role you want the CBC to play. If you want the CBC to operate like a private undertaking, that's fine then. In that case I think we should probably tell the CBC, "You fly on your own," but nevertheless at the end of the year if they have a huge deficit they will say to Parliament, "We have a deficit, please fill the till again."

Mr. Fortier: You don't think that it is the function of the CBC, given the mandate given to it by Parliament, in a case such as the Laugh-In program to go out, bid for it in order to show it to more Canadians than the CTV network could do?

Mr. Crépault: I don't think necessarily it is shown to more Canadians. I think that the private stations could have latched on to it, at a price by the way which was 50 per cent of the price offered by CBC. We have to be consistent with ourselves. I know we are not trying to favour the CBC giving as wide a spread as possible to American programs—or else what do you want the CBC to do—otherwise I am going to lose you in this reasoning now.

Mr. Fortier: Well, except that the Act says that the service should be predominantly Canadian in content and character and I believe—correct me if I am wrong Mr. Crépault, but the point that the CAB is making is that the CBC should be entirely Canadian in content and character. Is that the point?

Mr. Crépault: That's right, most of it should be. That is the word predominantly.

Mr. Fortier: Predominantly Canadian in content and character.

Mr. Crépault: Yes, and I don't think this is the case at the moment, at least on the basis of my evaluation of things.

Mr. Fortier: But do you think that to perform effectively as a national broadcasting service, the CBC should not be in direct competition with the private broadcasters?

Mr. Crépault: I would think this would be the essence and the purpose of the whole structure in Canada. This is why we are one of the very few countries, perhaps the only one maybe, that has this kind of double structure, precisely in order to ensure that our cultural heritage would be safeguarded, maintained and encouraged and developed through public funds.

The Chairman: Are you suggesting that our cultural heritage would not be safeguarded if it were not for the CBC?

Mr. Crépault: Well, we are talking about Canadian programs at the moment.

The Chairman: It was your phraseology and I take it from your comments that you see some virtue in the CBC as a safeguard for our cultural heritage?

Mr. Crépault: Yes.

The Chairman: Would the private broadcasters not guard our cultural heritage?

Mr. Crépault: Yes.

The Chairman: What if there were no CBC?

Mr. Crépault: I think the private broadcasting industry has made a very impressive contribution in maintaining this Canadian identity.

The Chairman: You feel then that you could safeguard the Canadian heritage if there were no public broadcasting in Canada?

Mr. Crépault: In other words you are asking me if I am in favour and support of this dual system of broadcasting?

The Chairman: Yes.

Mr. Crépault: This is exactly my proposition.

The Chairman: You do?

Mr. Crépault: Yes. What I am saying at the same time is that to really implement the spirit of that dual system I think that both sides have to operate on the basis of the policy which had been originated originally, and my second premise is the fact that one of the partners in my view has slightly drifted away from the main path.

Mr. Fortier: Drifting towards you?

Mr. Crépault: Well, all right, or drifted towards a wilderness, whichever way you want to look at it.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortier: In fact, Mr. Crépault, are you not suggesting that there be a watertight division between the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation on the one hand and the independent broadcasters on the other?

Mr. Crépault: I have never been in favour of a watertight division or an unapproachable dividing line. When I spoke of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, I spoke in relation to the problems with which we are now faced. We are brought to a competitive basis. In other words, if we want to be in a position to resist the influx of American culture, we must provide the Canadian public with Canadian programs which are at least of equal interest in order to gain their attention when we are competing with American productions.

I believe that that theory applies not only to broadcasting but also to all other fields. We have always wanted a film industry, an automobile industry and a record industry in Canada. We are not the only country to have such desires. Sweden, the Scandinavian countries and the European countries had similar ambitions. I believe that we arrived at the conclusion that, in order to create such an identity with products manufactured here in Canada, we must be competitive. Indeed, it was found that in the film industry, for example, an effort will have to be made to produce quality films. You cannot force Canadians to go to see a film simply by saying: "Listen, it is a Canadian film."

Moreover, a decision in that respect is made on the basis of personal taste. I do not believe that there is any Canadian who wants to find himself in a big brother situation. The same applies to television. I am certain, Mr. Chairman, that there is no Canadian who watches a television program simply because it is Canadian. He watches a program in the quiet of his home because that program is of interest to him. He does not ask himself whether the program is Swedish, American or Canadian.

Mr. Fortier: Should he ask himself that question? Is that not what the Canadian Parliament told the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation?

Mr. Crépault: Do you really think that in the type of society in which we live, culture can be put into nationalistic boxes? Take music for example. Must we listen to music because it was composed by a Canadian? We all know that music knows no boundaries. I believe that the general evolution in all fields of culture—and I use the word, culture, in its general meaning—is not becoming national. I do not believe that there is any Canadian who will agree to live in some ghetto and be told: "You will listen to that music because it is Canadian. You will see that film because it is Canadian. You will watch that television program because it is Canadian."

[English]

The Chairman: Would you agree that we don't want to be put into an American ghetto either?

Mr. Crépault: But we live in the world and I don't think there is much room where you can escape to.

Mr. Fortier: It is a big elephant!

Mr. Crépault: Don't think you can nowadays put a label—a national label on things which are culture?

The Chairman: Well, I was just going to say that some witnesses have come here and said that the private broadcasters have contributed more to the Americanization of Canada than any other single influence. Would you care to comment on that?

Mr. Crépault: Well, I know Mr. McGregor will wish to comment on this. My natural reaction I think would be to say that it is a very unfair statement. But, I think it is just the opposite. I know it was the same as the railways, the way they participated where really they were the only physical link in Canada some 50 years ago keeping this country together—that role is now being played by private broadcasting keeping the various parts of Canada together.

Mr. McGregor: I think it is essential that we use a bit of historical perspective in dealing with a question such as the Chairman has put. Perhaps it isn't a question—it is more of a statement.

The Chairman: It is a statement which has been put to us by several witnesses, that's all.

Mr. McGregor: If we look back to the beginnings of radio broadcasting we find that it was the private broadcasters who provided the backbone of a coast-to-coast service. When the CBC went into the business of radio network broadcasting the backbone of their service was made up in a very vast country of private broadcasters. As a matter of fact it is today. If you use the percentage of radio stations transmitting CBC programs the CBC's percentage is extremely low. If you use the percentage of television stations today presenting CBC programs and you look at the percentage of CBC versus—of course, we are not talking now about the 5 watt low power repeaters—we are talking about the broadcasting stations—the Edmonton, the Calgary, and so on. If you look at this, again you find that the private broadcasters are the backbone of that service; not in the number of people each transmitter reaches because of the private broadcasters from the beginning of television—and I don't want to bounce back and forth to create confusion—but merely because the parallels are quite similar. The private broadcaster from the very beginning of television in 1954 took on the burden of providing television to communities as far as the Government of Canada was concerned—not the CBC because the CBC were eager to get more funds—the Government of Canada were not prepared to put up the kind of funds—put forward the kind of funds in television which were necessary if television was going to spread rapidly across this country. What happened was that private enterprise took on the burden of providing television service to virtually all of the communities in Canada so that in a fairly short time—1960-61—well over 90 per cent of this country received broadcast service. It has been a very difficult struggle to get from 90 to the 96 or 97 per cent that we have today because you are now dealing with very small pockets of population and as I am sure the CBC said yesterday, very costly to reach. To reach a few hundred people means the expenditure of several hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. Fortier: And they are the ones that are going to be asked to do it by the CRTC?

Mr. McGregor: Well, this has been a general revision of principle on the part of the Government. After we achieved the 90 per cent level which was achieved as I said largely through private enterprise, then we found ourselves in a position where economically the question of whether—perhaps now we can use an analogy—whether Dawson Creek should have two mail deliveries a day or not—became an issue. In other words could the economy of the country provide television to every last home in the country, and that really has been the issue since we achieved 90 per cent.

With that then, we come to the point which I was going to try and make which is that these private originating stations which were supplemented in 1960 by the so-called second stations have made a major contribution in the provision of a distinctly Canadian national service. Now, you say to me "Ah yes, you are carrying Ironside and things of that sort coast to coast", and I say to you "Indeed they are". With that they are carrying a certain culture as a part of it but in every one of those programs in—let us use Red Deer—the program contains Canadian information. In fact, it is one of the mysteries to me why we reduce the amount of commercial content when in fact it is all Canadian information. I see you are puzzled by the analogy...

Mr. Fortier: Yes, I am.

Mr. McGregor: By the analogy, but if you realize why this is I think perhaps a basic question—why do people buy a magazine or why do they buy a newspaper? If the assumption is that they are buying it only for the news this is a false assumption. Mr. Spea was with the Financial Post and you buy the Financial Post as much almost for the information which is provided in the advertising that goes in the Financial Post as you do for the information that is provided in the news columns.

Mr. Fortier: Does that also apply to the electronic media?

Mr. McGregor: Well, I believe it does.

Mr. Fortier: To the same extent?

Mr. McGregor: I believe it does, indeed.

Mr. Fortier: Well, that is what you are here for, to give us your views.

Mr. McGregor: That's right.

The Chairman: Well, I am still...

Mr. McGregor: You are still puzzled?

The Chairman: Well, it is a very interesting comment and it is the kind of comment that we have not heard from anybody as yet before the hearings began. I would be curious to know if the CBC could join the CAB?

Mr. Crépault: Well, the CBC is not a member of CAB.

The Chairman: I know that but could it apply?

Mr. Crépault: Not at the moment. CAB has a membership of private broadcasters.

The Chairman: Well, I don't see that—well, okay, you have answered the question.

Mr. Fortier: The affiliate stations do?

Mr. Crépault: Yes, but they are not CBC stations. They are private stations.

Mr. Fortier: But they are?

Mr. Crépault: Yes.

The Chairman: But the Corporation as such is precluded?

Mr. Crépault: That's right.

The Chairman: Mr. Fenety?

Mr. J. Fenety, Vice-President, Radio, Canadian Association of Broadcasters: In reply, Mr. Chairman, to the charge that Canadian broadcasting has contributed to the Americanization of Canada, speaking for radio, I should point out to the Honourable Senators that better than 90 per cent of all radio listening in Canada is done through Canadian radio stations in spite of the fact that 85 per cent of all Canadians are within radio reach of a U.S. station. In Canadian programming the content of the Canadian private station—better than 85 per cent of all the material used, and I am excluding music here, is of Canadian origin or composition.

Mr. Fortier: But you are excluding music?

Mr. Fenety: If you wanted to get Canadian music, my submission here, Mr. Fortier, would be that music is universal and I am prepared to argue this until death do us part.

Mr. Fortier: We have another two hours!

Mr. Fenety: If the Singing Nun comes up with a hit song in Belgium then I see no reason why it shouldn't be a hit song in other countries of the world because it is a product that sells, and when we play "Dominique" in Canada on a Canadian radio station we do not say that this is a Belgian recording or anything like that. We say it is music; it is the Number 1 hit song and we could go on ad infinitum in that field. Basically Canadians listen to Canadian radio stations because they are largely receiving Canadian material whether it is in the form of information or entertainment and we are very proud of this fact in spite of the fact that there are so many American signals available to Canadians.

Mr. Fortier: Do you also think like Mr. McGregor that people listen to radio because there are commercials that they will hear?

Mr. Fenety: I would say in reply to that, Mr. Fortier, that the most successful broadcasting stations in the world are those that have the most commercials.

The Chairman: Which comes first, the chicken or the egg?

Mr. Fenety: Well, one can't be supported without the other.

Mr. Crépault: Good programming comes in a package.

Mr. Fortier: Is that the reason why CBC radio does not have high audience rating?

Mr. Fenety: I would think that is certainly a large part of it. If CBC had the programs that people wanted to listen to they would also attract the large audiences.

The Chairman: But if the CBC radio became terribly commercial people would listen to it, by your argument.

Mr. Fenety: If the CBC—I might say this Mr. Chairman—CBC radio, particularly the O and O stations, the owned and operated stations of the CBC are as similar today to private broadcasting stations as it is possible to be and yet at the same time they are not able to attract the audience.

Mr. Fortier: Why is that?

Mr. Fenety: Now that is a good question and I think probably the CBC would like to have that answer.

The Chairman: Well, Mr. Fenety, we are interested in your answer.

Mr. Fortier: We asked them yesterday.

Mr. Fenety: Why they don't attract audiences?

The Chairman: Yes.

Mr. Fenety: I think one, they don't attract audiences because they are not—and I am talking now of the O and O stations in any individual community—for one thing they are not really part of the community. Secondly, they are not a viable entity in the commercial market in spite of their great efforts to sell because there may be if you like and it may be an unfortunate choice of words—there may be some mistrust on the part of commercial firms wanting to invest money in a corporation which is already extracting two hundred million dollars a year.

The Chairman: Why wouldn't this mistrust apply to television as well? Obviously it doesn't.

Mr. Fenety: Well, then, you are into a horse of a different colour here because the basic audience of the CBC television network is comprised of private television stations. They are indeed providing the audience for the CBC network.

The Chairman: Well, I live in Toronto and on CBLT there is a great deal of commercial advertising.

Mr. Fenety: Well, I think the obvious answer there is that if we had possibly another private television station in Toronto then you would find...

The Chairman: But the point I am making, Mr. Fenety, is presumably the advertisers don't mistrust the Corporation to the extent of not purchasing prime time in Toronto on the CBC.

Mr. Fenety: Oh, I would say that this would be a good buy for them in the marketplace one, possibly because they could buy it for less and two, because they are the second station in the market.

The Chairman: I would just like to be sure of the one thing you said. I don't put this question critically but do you believe that advertisers stay away from CBC radio because they mistrust?

Mr. Fenety: Well, one, they don't have any significant ratings in relation to their competitors and two, I say the point of mistrust.

Mr. Fortier: Do Canadian radio broadcasting stations—do you consider that the CBC, either the O and O or the others, are competitors with which you, the private broadcasters must reckon?

Mr. Fenety: I would say this, Mr. Fortier, that if I were to have competition I would much prefer to have the CBC.

Mr. Fortier: Do you view it as competition?

Mr. Fenety: Do I view it as serious competition?

Mr. Fortier: Yes.

Mr. Fenety: Well, not serious, no, because obviously the ratings have shown since the beginning of time that they are not serious competitors for the audiences.

Mr. Fortier: What about television, Mr. McGregor? Do you view the CBC as an important competitor with which the private TV broadcaster must reckon?

Mr. McGregor: I would answer that by qualifying first very carefully the fact that I speak now as a vice-president of an Association rather than in my position in Kitchener.

Mr. Fortier: Yes.

Mr. McGregor: The reason that I do that is so that I can apply the difficulties that some private broadcasters are having in this country where they are competing with CBC stations and having problems with the rates that the CBC are putting forward for advertising in the community which they must compete with. This is presenting a problem. However, I have heard many private broadcasters say to me that they would far sooner compete, and

Mr. Fenety : says—television broadcasters would far sooner compete with the CBC than with another private station.

One other point I would like to make at this time in regard to Mr. Fenety's point is that the CBC in Toronto, CBLT, runs number 1 and number 2 in nearly all time periods and it does this because it carries again—I make my point, or at least I try to make my point—I present a supporting argument, let's say, and the supporting argument is that CBLT in Toronto carries a great many commercials and with those commercials the chicken and the egg. Now, you tell me. I can't really tell you—the only thing I can give to you in addition to that argument is that when the station quite deliberately removes all commercials from a program, the audience goes down.

Mr. Fortier: Do you have figures to support that?

The Chairman: Is that television or radio?

Mr. McGregor: That is television.

Mr. Fortier: Do you have figures to support that?

Mr. McGregor: It's been done. What we have done, and a number of stations have done this and among them my own, is quite deliberately to put additional commercials into a program—that is a program that wasn't carrying or didn't have the popularity to attract advertisers, we have put commercials into those programs in an effort to see what would happen and the audience went up.

The Chairman: Does this concern you?

Mr. McGregor: Frankly no. I must say—I am a private broadcaster and my business is supported by commercial advertising. I am no more concerned about the fact that the public likes to know, likes to have the information that is provided in commercials. I feel no compunction about that at all any more than newspaper man does about the fact that he as or he can devote four, five, six,—as a matter of fact on the week-ends he can devote two sections of his newspaper to wants, which are nothing but commercials. Two all sections and those sections are well read.

Senator Smith: And well paid for.

Mr. McGregor: Indeed they are. That is why they are read.

Senator Smith: But you don't get anywhere on this.

Mr. McGregor: Right, it is a chicken and egg situation.

Mr. Fortier: If you wish to be consistent then and if Parliament wishes for Canadians to have a national broadcasting system which will be looked at, viewed by Canadians, then the CBC must go out and sell advertising?

Mr. McGregor: Quite right.

Mr. Fortier: Isn't that the logical conclusion?

Mr. McGregor: Yes indeed.

Mr. Fortier: But your point is you don't want them to have an audience?

Mr. McGregor: No, I am sorry—I don't think that is quite fair. I think that our point is that under the restraints and restrictions the Corporation finds itself in confusion as to what you mean and what the Act means when it says "national"—so you see, the importance I think to Canadians is that "national" should mean coast to coast, east to west. I think that is what "national" means but there has never been a proper definition in any of the Broadcasting Acts whether "national" means public or whether "national" means coast to coast. It is the belief I think of our Association, and we have made this a point in a number of policy statements, that "national" means coast to coast.

Mr. Fortier: But the national broadcasting service should be extended to all parts of Canada?

Mr. McGregor: That national broadcasting service is at the moment either CTV or CBC.

Mr. Fortier: Well, I am sorry. The national broadcasting service is the CBC, not the CTV.

Mr. McGregor: That is your definition?

Mr. Fortier: That is the Act's definition.

Mr. McGregor: Well, the Act doesn't say the CBC.

Mr. Fortier: No, it does not but do you not agree that Section 2(f) is the section which in fact creates the CBC? "There should be established through a corporation established by Parliament for the purpose of a national broadcasting service that is predominantly Canadian in content and character." It goes on to say the national broadcasting service should—surely that is the CBC?

Mr. McGregor: That corporation could just as easily be the National Film Board or another program corporation which has nothing to do with broadcasting—that is with the actual transmission.

Mr. Fortier: Well, the National Film Board is surely not a national broadcasting service?

Mr. Crépault: I think that 2(f) would suggest that a national service is to be provided by a corporation. It doesn't exclude—and I understand Mr. McGregor's point—it doesn't exclude the fact that a national service can also be provided by a private broadcasting undertaking.

Mr. Fortier: Yes, I agree.

Mr. Crépault: I agree with you in this case that a national service is to be provided by the Corporation.

Mr. Fortier: I take your point and I agree with it that there is nothing which prevents a network...

Mr. Crépault: Well, I think that Mr. McGregor was probably concerned with the fact that you were suggesting that the only corporation in a position to offer a national service was the CBC.

Mr. Fortier: No, I was not.

Mr. Crépault: It was a self-protective reaction.

Mr. Fortier: On that point I will cease being overly legalistic. Do private broadcasters in Canada for which you speak feel bound by the directive of 2(g) and 1, 2, 3, 4?

The Chairman: You might tell us what that is, Mr. Fortier?

Mr. Fortier: Those are the...

Mr. Crépault: Those are the—to the extent that (g) refers to (f) then obviously it refers to the CBC.

Mr. Fortier: Yes, but do you feel that you yourselves should also do what the CBC is asked to do?

The Chairman: I think it might be useful to the rest of us Mr. Fortier if either you or Mr. Crépault would tell us what 2(g) is?

Mr. Fortier: Well, 2(g) says:

"The national broadcasting service should:

1. Be a balanced source of information, enlightenment and entertainment for people of different ages, interests and tastes covering the whole range of programming in fair proportion."

Let us just take that one as an example. Do you think that a private television network—and I use private network purposely—do you think that a private television network should also be bound by this provision?

Mr. Crépault: You are asking me a double question there. If you are talking about 2(g), 2(g) refers to the national broadcasting service mentioned in 2(f). To that extent we are talking about a corporation. If you are asking what is the duty and the obligation of the private national network then I would like to refer you to 2(b) which says:

"The Canadian Broadcasting System should be effectively owned and controlled by Canadians so as to safeguard, enrich, and strengthen the cultural, political, social and economic fabric of Canada."

Mr. Fortier: That is your legal definition?

Mr. Crépault: That's right. Now, within that general context you could argue this includes a balanced service and so on. It doesn't really specifically refer to 2(b) which I think refers specifically to the Corporation.

Mr. Fortier: We had occasion to discuss with the CRTC last week that there is only the CBC which is shouldered with the responsibility of contributing to the development of national unity and providing for a continuing expression of points of view...

Mr. Crépault: I don't agree with that, Mr. Fortier. I don't agree with that statement because then in that case you are practically emasculating the meaning of 2(b).

Mr. Fortier: Well, in the words in which the legislature spoke...

Mr. Crépault: Well, if you use the words in my language whether it is in French or English—if you use the words "to safeguard, enrich and strengthen the cultural, political, social and economic fabric of Canada", if you are not talking about unity I don't know what you are talking about.

The Chairman: Well, in fairness to the witness and so that we don't allow two legal minds from Montreal to allow our hearing to degenerate into a highly legal discussion, I would point out to Mr. Fortier that the point that Monsieur Crépault has just made is the point Monsieur Juneau made...

Mr. Fortier: Yes, it is. I am glad to have it made by Mr. Crépault.

Mr. Crépault: Well, Mr. Juneau and I agree on this point.

Mr. Fortier: Well, you have made it and it is clear in my mind. Coming back to briefly, Monsieur Crépault, I would like to see if I understood your earlier answers which were further gone into by Messrs. Fenety and McGregor. Should Canadians have a choice of looking at a certain percentage—minimum percentage of Canadian content, should they be forced to look at a minimum Canadian content?

Mr. Crépault: Not only should they not be forced but I don't think you could force them if you wanted to.

Mr. Fortier: I am sorry, I don't think I understood you.

Mr. Crépault: Not only should they not be forced but even if you wanted to force them I don't think you could.

Mr. Fortier: So that this 55 or 60 per cent minimum content will not work?

Mr. Crépault: Not on the basis of that particular type of approach.

Mr. Fortier: What should the approach be, Mr. Crépault, then?

Mr. Crépault: Well, I think then I would refer to the basic proposal on which we have been working in recent months. It comes back to you know to the competitive aspect. As I said, whether we are talking about broadcasting or any other field, if you want to recapture for instance Canadian undertakings, Canadian enterprise, if you want to have a Canadian film industry and a Canadian recording industry, let's face it, we have to be competitive. We talk about broadcasting, we talk about Canadian programs, in order to be competitive with U.S. but not only with the United States but in a few years we will have to be competitive with other programs. Sweden, the Scandinavian countries, France, they are in the process of producing programs for television. It is as easy for Lorne Green to speak Japanese as much as Hindu or that matter. It takes money and these governments are prepared to put that, to use popular expression, to put their money where their mouth is. I think that we have reached that kind of crossroads and on the basis of the present structure I think we will never be able to make it.

The Chairman: Does the American government put their money where their mouth is?

Mr. Crépault: Well...

The Chairman: In this context. Does the American broadcasting industry get help by the government?

Mr. Crépault: They have been helped tremendously in my view.

The Chairman: How?

Mr. Crépault: Because the U.S. Government has allowed groups like CBS and NBC to become very powerful, very wealthy and thus very efficient and very productive. I think that alone is a capsule answer, to my point of view.

The Chairman: But they haven't subsidized them, have they?

Mr. Crépault: Not subsidized in terms of grants.

The Chairman: But in France and Sweden they are actually subsidized, aren't they?

Mr. Crépault: Yes. I think that in Sweden for instance both the film industry and even for instance in the manufacturing of the automobile the government has helped. I sincerely believe that this is the answer. I am very concerned as a Canadian that if we keep on going along the present road, we can forget about being competitive and we can forget about Canadian culture. This is why I think that early action is required on this. I am also convinced with the kind of money—we are not even talking about additional money—just with the money which is now being credited to this kind of undertaking we have a fantastically good weapon in our hands provided it is properly used.

The Chairman: Let's talk radio for a moment. How does private radio contribute to Canadian culture?

Mr. Crépault: Well, if you will allow me for a moment to come back to maybe a more particular case. I look at my own experience and as you know I came into broadcasting through—if I may use this word—"the back door" I guess by accident.

Mr. Allard: Lawyers have a way of doing that.

Mr. Fortier: By the back door or by accident!

Mr. Crépault: Well, Mr. Fenety mentioned a figure of about 85 per cent of all Canadian radio programming of private stations as Canadian. I would think...

Senator Smith: Outside of music.

Mr. Crépault: Yes, but music averages about 20 or 25 per cent over the whole day's programming.

The Chairman: May I just pursue that for a moment. I find that a startling statement. I would be delighted to be corrected but is it only 20 to 25 per cent?

Mr. Crépault: On the average.

The Chairman: What do you mean by average?

Mr. Crépault: Well, because there are stations which have a lot of talk shows.

The Chairman: Oh, I misunderstood you. Let us talk about Mr. Fenety's station which is in Fredericton. Would music only be 20 to 25 per cent of your station?

Mr. Fenety: Well...

The Chairman: Well, it is perhaps unfair to single out individual stations because we are not dealing with individual stations...

Mr. Fenety: I don't mind.

The Chairman: No, but perhaps it is an unfair question but if Mr. Fenety doesn't object—is yours 25 per cent only in music?

Mr. Fenety: I would say that sometimes Mr. Chairman it would run as high as 40 per cent but this depends upon the day and the developments of the day—whether it is political or whatever. News certainly is a predominant feature in private broadcasting. We have news on the hour and half hour and so on, and stations as Mr. Crépault says who employ the open-line technique certainly log up hours a day so I think that we can only take an average when we talk about private broadcasting. I would think that 25 to 30 per cent would certainly be the average.

Mr. Crépault: Twenty or thirty per cent, you know, across 24 hours—a full day, 24 hours of operation, so it means that you get at least 70 per cent which consists of other programming besides music; that includes a very extensive news service. I think that private radio broadcasters in Canada have done a tremendous job in that field. For instance, many people ignore the fact that the private broadcasters have at the moment at least five voice services, which are privately financed and supported by them with correspondents on the Hill here and correspondents in the various provincial capitals. We have very extensive public affairs programs. I am sure it is known by all of you that practically every member of Parliament reaches his community through facilities offered to them by the private radio stations. There is also of course entertainment, because entertainment and information are obviously the two main purposes of private broadcasting, so in effect I think there has been a very extensive contribution to the Canadian entity or the Canadian identity concept. It must have been very successful because in fact private radio in Canada has resisted extremely well the impact or the intrusion of U.S. radio.

The Chairman: Why?

Mr. Crépault: Simply by the fact...

The Chairman: Why do the people in Toronto who have access to all kinds of American radio signals not listen to them?

Mr. Crépault: Mr. Chairman, it is because they like it. It is as simple as that. This again is where personal discretion is exercised.

Mr. Fortier: Could it not be because you give them the same sort of music as the American stations give them anyway?

Mr. Crépault: This isn't true. If it was the same why wouldn't they listen to U.S. stations then?

Mr. Fortier: Because they would rather get their Canadian information on the half hour.

Mr. Crépault: Well, when you deal with this kind of intangible merchandise as I call it you cannot just put it in water-tight compartments. The effectiveness of a radio program or a television program is really the package—I have used that word before—the sound, the music, the news, the public service and so on.

The Chairman: Senator McElman? Do you have a supplementary question?

Senator McElman: Yes, Mr. Chairman. This is apropos something which Mr. Crépault said a moment ago. You said that many or most of the M.P.'s reach their constituencies...

Mr. Crépault: I said many members of Parliament.

Senator McElman: Reach their constituents through radio. The question I ask is, do they really reach? Are they in time periods where they do reach?

Mr. Crépault: Yes, my understanding is that they do, Mr. Senator. At least just from our experience here—I know that these reports from Parliament, because this is the title of the series, are extremely popular, at least from the reports we get from members of Parliament, they must be very effective otherwise I don't think that this series of programs would have gone on for years and years as has been the case.

Senator McElman: Are they programmed at hours when you really do have reach? This is what I am asking you.

Mr. Crépault: Well, from my personal experience I would think that these programs are usually broadcast at the very best hours because usually they are part of a program on public affairs and of course these programs as you know are usually during a period like the drive-home time, you know, which is probably the best hour, or the driving time in the morning, so they get I think, probably the maximum exposure.

Senator McElman: From the standpoint of radio, Mr. Fenety, would you comment on that?

Mr. Fenety: I would say it would vary, Senator McElman, from one end of the country to the other but basically the prime time of broadcasting on radio would be from 6.00 o'clock in the morning till perhaps 1.00 or 2.00 o'clock in the afternoon.

The Chairman: 6.00 o'clock in the morning?

Mr. Fenety: 6.00 o'clock in the morning, and surveys show this, Mr. Chairman, at least in my end of the world.

Senator McElman: We get up earlier, Mr. Fenety!

Mr. Fenety: There may be some ground for justifiable complaint but we have analysed this within the CAB and Mr. Allard would be most familiar with this. In our particular case we have moved the report from Parliament Hill, I think, not more than three or four times over a period of some 20 odd years. They are now in what I consider to be a favourable position on a Saturday immediately following the major news cast.

The Chairman: What time is that?

Mr. Fenety: It would be 6:45 in the evening. Certainly that is the highest rated evening period with the exception of the program which follows, so I would consider that politicians in New Brunswick who make use of my station have an advantageous time.

Now, there may be some—and I think this could be argued from one end of the country to the other—that say that we should put politics in at the highest rated time period of the day. However, I don't think the private broadcasters would look very favourably on this.

The Chairman: I am going to suggest—you made a reference to Mr. Allard. I am going to make a request of Mr. Allard, then I am going to adjourn for a few minutes. It is my intention, Senators and gentlemen, if you are available, to carry on until 1:00 o'clock and we will adjourn at 1:00 o'clock and I think that being so, in fairness we should perhaps take a ten minute break now. Before we do Mr. Allard, I would be grateful if you would supply us if you could—I hate to add to your heavy workload because I know you have one but I would like a little more detail on these statistics—20 per cent of the CBC, was it, going into Canadian talent—20 million dollars, I am sorry, going into Canadian talent, and the private broadcasters doubling that to about 40 million dollars. Not at the moment but at your convenience after the hearing.

Mr. Allard: We can arrange that.

The Chairman: Yes, I believe it would be terribly interesting to the Committee.

Mr. Fortier: Could I wrap it up with one question?

The Chairman: Well, it is not a wrap-up. I am going to adjourn, that's all.

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Crépault and his colleagues have been very eloquent and very forthright in their views but I still don't understand if you are advocating the abolition of the CBC as we know it today?

Mr. Crépault: We are advocating a reorganization of the CBC.

Mr. Fortier: But your Canadian program production suggestion would do away with the CBC, would it not?

Mr. Crépault: Well, you could use the CBC and re-adapt it, transform it into a production centre.

Mr. Fortier: But the CBC should not be in competition with private broadcasters?

Mr. Crépault: That is a fair statement.

The Chairman: I would like to adjourn now—it is twenty-five after eleven and if the Senators will take note I would like to re-convene right at twenty-five to twelve, in ten minutes. Thank you.

—Short adjournment.

The Chairman: Honourable Senators, I'd like to call this session back in order please. Mr. President, I'd like to ask you why private broadcasting in the various categories do not belong to the CAB?

Mr. Crépault: I think the present membership at the moment represents about 98 per cent of all private broadcasting undertakings in Canada.

The Chairman: It does?

Mr. Crépault: Approximately, yes.

The Chairman: Now, I note you have a membership of 243 AM stations and on page 4.1 you say there are 252 AM. stations. I imagine there are 19 AM. stations who don't belong, there are 8 FM stations who don't belong, and there are 5 television stations who don't belong. You say that roughly works out to 98 per cent?

Mr. Crépault: Yes.

The Chairman: Well, it doesn't much matter. The question I wanted to put is why don't they belong?

Mr. Crépault: I think that chiefly it is a matter of finances. First of all in terms of radio stations which do not belong, in most cases they are stations which are in pretty isolated areas which are also financially speaking marginal operations and the people operating their stations find it very inconvenient or difficult and too expensive to come to meetings and so on, so really they feel that even if the membership fee, is not exactly a substantial amount, in some cases it is just too much to make it possible.

Mr. Allard: Mr. Chairman, our figures seem to show that there are only two television stations that are not members of the CAB.

The Chairman: There are only two?

Mr. Allard: That is what our figures indicate.

The Chairman: Well, it is not what your brief seems to indicate, Mr. Allard. At page 1 you say that there are 52 television stations who belong—that is in 1.1 and at 4.1 in your brief you say there are 57 television stations in Canada.

Mr. Crépault: I think in my statement this morning, Mr. Chairman, I think I said there were 55 television stations which are members.

The Chairman: So this is wrong here?

Mr. Crépault: Yes.

The Chairman: Your organization is growing so quickly you can't keep up with it!

Mr. Crépault: Yes, it is growing from day to day.

Mr. Allard: As a matter of fact the Chairman is quite correct, Mr. President. The figures were accurate at the time when this brief was printed—it is 55 now.

The Chairman: So that there are two that don't belong?

Mr. Allard: That's right.

The Chairman: Just who are they, out of curiosity?

Mr. Allard: Dawson Creek, British Columbia and New Carlisle, I think.

Mr. Crépault: Which confirms I think what I was saying about the remote areas and more or less marginal operations.

The Chairman: Is it true, Mr. Allard, that your annual convention has been cancelled this year—postponed or delayed?

Mr. Allard: I am not sure, Mr. Chairman, that postponement is correct. They have certainly changed the date and the location. I think it is a little earlier than that originally planned.

The Chairman: Why?

Mr. Allard: Our membership felt, Mr. Chairman, that under the circumstances it might be more expedient to meet in Ottawa this year at a date immediately preceding the CRTC, public hearings.

Mr. Crépault: If I might perhaps enlarge on this...

The Chairman: Yes.

Mr. Crépault: ...in order to get the picture very clear. As you know, the CRTC came out with proposed regulations indicating their hearings on these regulations were to take place on April 14. Our annual convention was scheduled to take place in Halifax on April 19. In my view and in the view of the directors of the Association these proposed regulations were very far reaching proposals which could in fact affect broadcasting in Canada for many, many years to come and we felt therefore these were the kind of issues on which we should definitely seek the views of the membership. We suggested to the CRTC that perhaps they could find a way to postpone their hearings on this so that we would have the chance at the annual meeting in Halifax to consult the membership. However, the CRTC indicated that they were operating under such a tight timetable that they had to proceed with the hearings as planned on April 14.

The Chairman: So that hearing is on the 14th of April and your meeting is here on the...

Mr. Crépault: On the 10th, 11th and 12th.

The Chairman: Is that a special meeting or is it your annual meeting?

Mr. Crépault: No, it is just our annual meeting but as you may well assume I think that the major topic at this annual convention will be the regulations.

The Chairman: Yes, it is likely to be raised!

Mr. Crépault: Yes, I believe so.

The Chairman: I would like to read you a quotation from Bob Blackburn's column in the Telegram on February 27 and ask you to comment. He begins by talking about this postponement, then he concludes his column in this way:

"Let's take this into account. The CBC is the public network, and might reasonably be assumed to know what's going on. Ch.9—CFTO-TV—and for Pete's sake, will you forget for a moment that it has roughly the same ownership as this newspaper which fact is irrelevant to this discussion) is in most ways THE private station in Canada.

Both the CBC and Ch. 9 are right now funnelling their considerable resources in the direction of complying with the proposed regulations. I'm not a gambling man, but I would say it pays to look at what the smart money's doing. The CAB, which probably is functioning as a trade association feels it must, and all others are tilting at windmills."

Would you comment on that?

Mr. Crépault: Well, the first comment, Mr. Chairman, is that we are a regulated industry and this is a fact of life. Really, whatever regulations might be promulgated by the CRTC we just haven't got any choice: you just have to comply. The alternative is to lose your licence and obviously as a matter of survival, whatever regulations are eventually promulgated by the CRTC must be complied with by any broadcaster in Canada. Now, at the same time the CRTC has called for public hearings to give a chance to anyone in Canada, and I would like to believe especially broadcasters, to comment on the regulations, which means obviously that they are anxious to get some reactions and some comments and of course we are planning to indicate to them in a general context that from our point of view we feel that the strict implementation of the proposed regulations as they have been submitted could create a very serious situation for private broadcasting in Canada.

The Chairman: Are you doing that, Monsieur Crépault, tilting at windmills?

Mr. Crépault: Well, you know, this is Mr. Blackburn's wording. Frankly I have more faith in the CRTC than Mr. Blackburn seems to have. I think the CRTC is composed of reasonable and intelligent people and I think they have asked for comments and I presume it is because they are prepared to listen to representations and if they come to the conclusion that some amendments must be made, obviously they will make them.

The Chairman: Mr. Fortier?

Mr. Fortier: If those proposals become regulations, you forecast some very hard times indeed for some members of your Association. Is that correct?

Mr. Crépault: Yes. I think I should make it clear that nobody quarrels with the basic principle. I think that my earlier comments this morning have made it clear that nobody questions or quarrels with the objectives of trying to maintain the Canadian identity and one of the elements of this was the Canadian culture, Canadian heritage and so on. On this score I think the CRTC and the CAB and practically every other Canadian is in agreement.

Mr. Fortier: Could they just talk about it and not enforce it by regulations?

Mr. Crépault: Well, I would hope that what I have said so far would indicate that we are prepared to act on it. What I am inclined to question is really the approach; if you want me to go into detail of our reactions so far I would be quite happy to do it. With regard to radio for instance...

Mr. Fortier: We would like it if you could.

The Chairman: In fairness now we don't want to put you in a prejudicial position as far as the meeting on the 14th of April is concerned, so don't feel that you must comment on this.

Mr. Crépault: No, but in the case of radio you know it has already been public knowledge, in fact, our basic reaction. We are talking about 30 per cent Canadian music in every four-hour bloc. Well, in effect these regulations are not made for broadcasting. What they are trying to do with these regulations on radio is to create a Canadian recording industry. Let's face it, this is the purpose. I am afraid that once again we are facing a tradition of several decades—once again we are calling upon the private broadcaster and telling him, "You are going to create a recording industry and you are going to subsidize it." As I said the approach is completely wrong. I don't think this is the way you create a recording industry. What you are really telling the broadcaster is that you are going to keep on trying to be competitive and meanwhile we are going to tie both hands behind your back. This is my personal reaction and I speak very spontaneously and very frankly on this. When we wanted to create a Canadian film industry we didn't go to the cinema operators and tell them that "30 per cent of all the films that you are going to show are going to be Canadian films", because we all know what would have happened. They would have closed down shop. They would have closed down shop chiefly because they are not licensed operators, you, know they are not a regulated industry, and this is really, as a Canadian broadcaster, what has bothered me in the past, to discover as I learn more and more about this business the contradiction which has always existed really between the basic principle that we have repeated in every direction about the fact that this is part of a national policy and that private broadcasting is an essential link, yet the actual deed doesn't seem to indicate that they really believe in that statement. Private broadcasting has been the target of very discriminatory action in Canada in the past 50 years.

Mr. Fortier: Could you give us instances of those discriminations?

Mr. Crépault: Well, you know, some of them have been heard before—as you know, we have been talking about a transmitter licence fee. When you are talking about a fee, usually it will be $50 or $100 as it was in broadcasting before, but now it is really a second income tax because it is based on the gross revenue of your station, so in effect—and it is the only industry to my knowledge which is taxed on that basis. We pay a double income tax.

Another indication I think of the kind of mentality which seems to have presided at the handling of private broadcasting, and I think I was personally involved in this. We were discussing the drafting of the Broadcasting Act—the one which is presently in force. There was a paragraph regarding the kind of fine which could be imposed in the case of default or error of omission on the part of a broadcasting station, and in the first draft that was brought to my attention I was astonished—in fact flabbergasted to find out that the maximum fine was $100,000. Well, in the whole Criminal Code even for a case of fraud, the maximum fine is $10,000. How do you explain this?

Mr. Fortier: What is this indicative of, Mr. Crépault?

Mr. Crépault: Well, I think it is indicative of a very disturbing state of mind somewhere which I find very difficult to reconcile. It took a very strong representation to obtain this concession that the maximum fine should be $50,000.

Mr. Fortier: You say it is a sign of discrimination because the legislator said that the use of the public air waves by private broadcasters was so important that any infringement of regulations concerning them would make the broadcaster liable to a fine of $100,000?

Mr. Crépault: Well, it certainly shows a pretty hostile state of mind because in effect we all know that the CRTC can lift your licence any time that they want to. Why kill a fly with a hammer?

Senator McElman: The maximum here was for repeat infractions wasn't it?

Mr. Crépault: No, it could be for a one time thing. In some cases this would put the station out of business anyway, so why not just lift the licence? As I said it is not so much the mechanics as it is the reasoning. Then of course there is—I have mentioned it earlier this morning in my comments—you know the rate of depreciation and so on. We have had trouble, you know, to receive the same kind of treatment as the newspapers and yet if anybody needs depreciation in order to survive it is the broadcasting industry because there is nothing more expensive than electronic equipment. I can go on...

The Chairman: Well, I think you have answered, Mr. Crépault.

Mr. Crépault: You know, this is the kind of thing, and as I have already mentioned there have been many inquiries and so on, two of which were presided over by a person who in fact represented our main competitor, in pulp and paper you know. I have never heard of a Commission, and perhaps this is the first one, which is chaired and presided over by someone who at one time or another was connected with broadcasting. On two occasions this kind of Commission was presided over by someone who represented our competitors.

The Chairman: For ten long years!

Senator McElman: Mr. Chairman, I would like to clear up something that was left in doubt earlier this morning. I believe, Mr. Crépault, that in referring to Laugh-In you used the figure of 50 per cent—I think it was that the CTV had had this for 50 per cent less than what the CBC did purchase it for?

Mr. Crépault: You mean the Laugh-In program?

Senator McElman: Yes.

Mr. Crépault: Well, I gather that the year before—Mr. McGregor is more familiar with this—I think the year before the CTV had the program—for which they paid—I don't know but let's say for example $40,000, and the following year in order to be sure that they would have it the CBC came along and said "We will pay you $80,000.", which of course disposed of the deal.

Senator McElman: Well, to get this whole thing in its proper perspective, what did CTV bid for it on the second round?

Mr. McGregor: If I might speak, Senator McElman—first, to understand the way film purchases or program purchases of any kind are made. Any popular program, even if it is produced by a local production company, usually has what they would call first options. These are given to the person who has been supporting it and this is a courtesy to these people. CTV had the first opportunity to make a bid for the upcoming year of the Laugh-In show and they bid 20 per cent higher than they had for the previous year because they were told by the people who were arranging the program rental that the CBC were very interested in it. The CBC then instead of just bidding higher than that, just virtually doubled the offer and there was no context because CTV being a privately operated network does not have unlimited funds at its beck and call.

Senator Sparrow: I am sorry, did they know your bid? Did they know the CTV bid?

Mr. McGregor: Yes.

Senator Sparrow: It wasn't a closed tender?

Mr. McGregor: No.

The Chairman: Do you think the CBC has unlimited funds?

Mr. McGregor: When it comes to something they want the CBC after all are in a position vis-a-vis CTV of operating in something of excess of ten times the budget, the annual budget.

Senator McElman: Well, what you have said then is that the CTV on the second round offered approximately $48,000. Is this right?

Mr. McGregor: I am sorry, the figures are incorrect. Mr. Crépault merely put the figures as an example, because in fact if I might steal a moment to make a point ..

The Chairman: By all means.

Mr. McGregor: Canadian production of a comparable hour of course would be vastly greater than the cost of importing a program whether it be from the United States, Britain, France or wherever. I make that point only because I am sure you are liable to get into that kind of a discussion and I would like to correct it. I guess Mr. Crépault has the precise figures.

Senator McElman: Well, I understand that CTV originally got Laugh-In—it was a new program?

Mr. McGregor: That is correct.

Senator McElman: And from this trial period it shot up to No. 1 and they had it at approximately $40,000?

Mr. McGregor: Well, that isn't quite the case.

Mr. Crépault: I used that as an example. Actually I gather that the CBC did pay $3,500 more per week than the CTV had paid the previous year for a total of $140,000 per year.

The Chairman: How much more per week were CTV prepared to pay?

Mr. McGregor: It was about 20 per cent higher than they had been paying. It was a substantial increase.

The Chairman: Senator Sparrow, do you have a supplementary question at this point?

Senator Sparrow: I am just wondering, when you say or accuse the CBC of paying that much more, could they have merely got it for a dollar more or a hundred dollars more or one thousand dollars more than the CTV had bid?

Mr. McGregor: Well, there of course you are in the—in the film business—the film business is a very interesting business. The approach that any film salesman uses, whether he is selling Canadian programming or whatever, is always that he has a can of film and he wants to rent it and he simply wants to get the best possible price for that can of film. It is not like a pair of shoes where you know exactly what your manufacturing costs are and you know exactly what your profits should be and your sales expenses and so on. The purpose is you have so many films in your library that you wish to sell, so many programs, so many video tapes or whatever, and your job is to get the best possible return on the inventory that you have on hand and you may have to make more on the very popular shows so that you can afford to sell the less popular shows at a considerably lower figure.

Senator Sparrow: Would the CBC sell that program at a loss then? The reason I ask this question is because they have been accused of buying programs and then selling them at a loss. I would assume though that probably CTV must have to do this in some cases—you can answer that as well—but by having paid such a high price in relation would they have sold that?

The Chairman: I am quite prepared to let Mr. McGregor answer the question if he wants to but I would point out to Senator Sparrow that many of these people are familiar with the CTV. Objectively speaking there is a subsequent CTV hearing and maybe that question should better be put to CTV rather than to CAB. You may answer that if you want to but if you would prefer to have us put it to the CTV people...

Senator Sparrow: Well, I am talking principle. You know, we are not getting accurate figures.

Mr. Crépault: Well, it is known of course that the CBC is sometimes in a better position to afford to get sponsors even at prices less than the cost, and there have been complaints on the part of private stations on this, that they are being underpriced by the CBC. This is another point on which this remaining 180 million is being spent.

The Chairman: I would like to ask you a question on Professor Tebbel's comment. You quote him on page 2. He starts off by saying "Among the middle class especially..." I would like to know what Professor Tebbel meant what you have in mind Mr. Crépault, when you use the phrase "the middle class". Just what exactly is the middle class? Giving you a starting point, would you say that the average employee working in private broadcasting—I am not talking now about the owner or proprietors—but is the average employee part of that middle class?

Mr. Crépault: I would think so, generally speaking, yes. These people are usually in position to enjoy a relatively comfortable standard of living.

The Chairman: Because the average wage from the figures you have given us, as I recall, is $8,000. The average employee working private broadcasting makes $8,000 a year and presumably that includes everybody from operators to stenographers to receptionists and highly paid newscasters.

Mr. Crépault: Well, as an average, that is a pretty good figure.

The Chairman: So when Professor Tebbel refers to "among the middle class" and you quote him at page 2, you were referring to people whose income is in the $8,000 bracket?

Mr. Crépault: I wouldn't like to pinpoint it to a specific target. There are people who are really in a position to enjoy a really stable and comfortable standard of living and who are therefore perhaps nervous about any kind of event which might disturb that stability.

The Chairman: In the quote you gave us he said in one sentence: "There is a hatred that goes beyond simple disbelief, as though people were blaming the Press for the ugliness of life today. When middle-class citizens read about riots, the plight of the ghettos and the rise of black militants..." Doesn't this seem to you just a little bit American in context?

Mr. Crépault: I think you are right, Mr. Chairman, that this phenomenon has probably been more noticeable in the United States than in Canada so far.

The Chairman: Well, I was going to ask you that.

Mr. Crépault: Yes.

The Chairman: You anticipated my question. Why? Why is it more noticeable in the United States?

Mr. Crépault: I think it is because the social problems in the United States have been definitely more acute especially in their manifestations than they have been in Canada so far.

The Chairman: Yet don't we have greater incidence of poverty in Canada than they have in the United States on a percentage or per capita basis?

Mr. Crépault: I didn't think this was the case.

The Chairman: I have only one other question on this, then we can get on to other matters. In your opening statement I think you were quoting Professor Tebbel somewhere in his speech where he talked about the people wanting to shoot the messenger or the person who brings the bad news. You said you hoped that our Committee might make some recommendations in this area to do something about this. May I put the ball back in your court? What do you think is the solution to this problem?

Mr. Crépault: I think it is really a matter of education, of making people aware of the fact that the messenger is not the newsmaker and it is the duty of the messenger to simply bring the news, and I think that the people have to be educated in such a way as to be aware that in fact if there is a violence around them it is in part an essence of their community or the society in which we are called upon to live.

The Chairman: Shouldn't the private broadcasters explain that to the people?

Mr. Crépault: Well, we are doing it.

The Chairman: Are you?

Mr. Crépault: Yes.

The Chairman: You do in-depth material?

Mr. Crépault: Yes, and this is why we are now bringing it up in a forum like yours.

The Chairman: Do you do as much in-depth public affairs programming as for example the CBC?

Mr. Crépault: Well, I am inclined of course to think in terms of radio and I am inclined to think of my own radio station. We do every day a number of programs on that very trend.

The Chairman: Well, I am familiar with your radio station and I was asking more generally?

Mr. Crépault: In general I think Mr. Chairman we can say that there is certainly an increasing effort on the part of private broadcasters to do that kind of in-depth study for programming. In terms of social trends, social problems, we do this very much indeed.

The Chairman: Mr. Fortier?

[Translation]

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Crépault, your Association, the Canadian Association of Broadcasters, groups stations, does it not?

Mr. Crépault: Right.

Mr. Fortier: There is one vote per station. Is there also an executive committee with special powers?

Mr. Crépault: There is a 19-member Board of Directors. There is also an appointed Executive Committee whose members are chosen by the President. That Committee is appointed each year and usually consists of the two Vice presidents for television and radio. In addition there are also two other members, one of whom is usually the Past President.

Mr. Fortier: Do all decisions of that committee have to be ratified by the Board of Directors?

Mr. Crépault: Not necessarily. In fact the practice is that when there is a problem submitted to the Board of Directors, very often after setting the guidelines and general policy, they will refer the question to the Executive Committee with orders to follow its guidelines.

Mr. Fortier: As an association, do you meet often or is there only the annual meeting?

Mr. Crépault: No, meetings are frequent because of two favourable factors. First of all, you have the CAB. Naturally that is a national association and there are also regional associations. There is the AAB, the Atlantic Association of Broadcasters; the ACRTF which groups the French stations, the CCBA which represents Central Canada, the WAB which is the Western Association of Broadcasters and the BCAB which represents British Columbia.

Mr. Fortier: What is the affiliation between those groups and your Association?

Mr. Crépault: They are all affiliated with the national association and each regional association is asked to send a certain number of candidates as directors of the national association. It can be taken for granted that each broadcaster went through a regional association before attaining a position with the national association.

Mr. Fortier: I have read the goals of the national association of which you are President. As in most cases, I did not learn anything I wanted to know. What exactly do you do, other than hold meetings and present briefs to various committees, etc.?

Mr. Crépault: What we have done for the past few years is mainly tried to defend ourselves and survive. Indeed that is true. There has been a demand for the Association's services which has been growing, especially since the end of the last world war, because of committees and so forth. Let us say that that is the survival aspect.

There is also very probing work being done by the Association in co-operation with government agencies. For that reason, the Association is practically represented on each of the government committees dealing with a question related to broadcasting either directly or indirectly. At the present time you know the Department of Communications has a great many studies underway in the field of communications and it asked us to have a representative on each of those committees. Naturally we agreed to that request. Immediately you have work in co-operation with government authorities. At the moment there are studies taking place on the question of copyright. There also, we provide representatives who draw the attention of the government officers who are studying the question on the applications of such and such a piece of legislation from the point of view of private broadcastings.

Mr. Fortier: Do you undertake research work?

Mr. Crépault: We make studies. Furthermore that is necessary because of what I have just said and because our representatives on those committees and commissions would hardly be in a position to participate effectively if they did not have some material and research behind them. Indeed, I believe that the Association's budget is in the order of half a million dollars.

Mr. Fortier: What membership fees do you charge each station to join the Association?

Mr. Crépault: It goes according to categories which is based on a station's gross revenue. The most a radio station can be charged is $300 per month. So, the other fees are less. In some cases, it has happened that stations in a rather unstable financial position have requested a special rate for a period of one or two years. Naturally, that has been granted.

Mr. Fortier: Is it not a fact that the licence fee which you have to pay, which each station has to pay, occasionally is less than the cost of Association membership?

Mr. Crépault: No. I do not think so. You are talking in terms of the transmitter licence fee. That transmitter licence represents a minimum revenue of $3 million per year.

Mr. Fortier: The scale...?

Mr. Crépault: The scale does not correspond at all.

[English]

The Chairman: Describing the function of your organization—I may have missed it but did you mention the Radio Sales Bureau?

Mr. Crépault: No.

The Chairman: You might describe those very briefly for the Senators.

Mr. Crépault: Well, there is a number of what I would call agencies which are directly or indirectly connected and sometimes even financed by the Association which play a specialized role. As the Chairman has mentioned there is the RSB which is the Radio Sales Bureau, and really if you would ask me to describe briefly the purpose of the Radio Sales Bureau it is to make advertisers, any kind of Canadian advertisers, conscious of the advantages of advertising on radio, and the people more conscious generally of the advantages of radio advertising. Of course it is the equivalent of TSB which is the Television Sales Bureau. There are also other—I am using the word agencies but I am using the word agencies in a very wide term. For instance, an organization called The Program Exchange which is really a clearing house located in Toronto and which really does the work of a clearing house. If one of my stations for instance produces an interesting program we send it up to the Program Exchange in Toronto and they make copies of it available free of charge to any other station which wants it, and it is the same for television.

Mr. Allard: This one is an internal division of the Canadian Association of Broadcasters.

Mr. Crépault: The status, the legal status might vary.

Mr. Fortier: Well, would it be fair to say, and this is not intended as a critical question, that the CAB is a lobbyist organization?

Mr. Crépault: I am prepared to answer yes if I was a little bit more certain of what you mean by a lobbyist?

Mr. Fortier: Well, what I mean by that...

Mr. Crépault: Obviously it is to—I accept the fact that the word lobbyist can be a very healthy name...

Mr. Fortier: It does not necessarily have a pejorative meaning.

Mr. Crepault: As President of the CAB I certainly have no qualms in admitting that one of my roles is to make sure that the Canadian governmental authorities are aware of the needs of the industry and to that extent I am a lobbyist and the Association is a lobbyist.

Mr. Fortier: Who acts as the lobbyist for the CBC then?

Mr. Crepault: I think their whole head office in Ottawa!

Mr. Fortier: Yes, I thought I would give you a chance to answer that. You have spoken both in your verbal presentation as well as in your written brief, Mr. Crépault, of the wide range of investigations and regulations applicable to broadcasting in Canada. You have not quite said it, so I ask you the question. Do you feel that the regulations are excessive?

Mr. Crepault: Well, there again may I split your question in two. You are referring to investigating committees and you want to know whether I feel...

Mr. Fortier: My question should only deal with the regulations.

Mr. Crepault: I think we could have done with less investigating bodies to begin with. I think so. At the same time, I realize that broadcasting and communications is a very important and essential field in Canada and I understand the periodical desire of the Government to look into the matter, although I would have preferred certain of these investigations to have taken place in a different context and a different atmosphere.

With regard to the regulations, I think that I probably reflect the view of the majority of broadcasters in Canada, private broadcasters, when I say that in effect regulations have been somewhat excessive.

Mr. Fortier: Would you give us some examples?

Mr. Crepault: Well, if you are talking about the actual proposed regulations at the moment, I have indicated to you—I think there is a tendency in this particular context to confuse quality and quantity and it brings me back to the distinction I made about approaches. There seems to be an underlying feeling that you can really exercise some sort of control on the personal discretion of the Canadian individual as to what he wants to hear and what he wants to see. I think that because of this apparent assumption that you can really force Canadians to take one route rather than another in this particular intangible area that there has been an excess of regulations.

Mr. Fortier: Is this the area with which you are mainly concerned when you say that it has been excessive?

Mr. Crepault: Yes. I think it is because of the underlying approach which seems to be reflected by these regulations.

Mr. Fortier: Should there be regulations at all on broadcasters in Canada?

Mr. Crepault: Well, let me talk about radio. Frankly, I doubt whether there should be any regulations, at least with regard to this Canadian content approach, because I think it really has been one truly Canadian industry in Canada. I think it has been Canadian radio. Unless there is a definite evil or a definite disease to be cured I think you might as well leave the patient in all tranquility and peace. This would be my normal approach to it.

Mr. Fortier: You don't think it is necessary to have a quasi-judicial body such as the CRTC?

Mr. Crepault: No, I didn't say that.

Mr. Fortier: To oversee the broadcasters?

Mr. Crepault: Well, I accept the fact that it has to be a regulated industry, nobody is questioning this.

Mr. Fortier: You do?

Mr. Crepault: Yes. I also recognize the fact for instance that in some cases you need some guidelines obviously. I am not saying that all guidelines are wise and sound but at the same time I know for instance, as I have mentioned, that there are some kinds of products which we can't advertise but in some cases it is fully justified and in other cases I think it comes back from perhaps our old puritan background.

The Chairman: Can you give us an example of what kind of products you think you shouldn't be able to advertise?

Mr. Cr pault: At the moment for instance we cannot advertise securities.

The Chairman: Do you think that is desirable?

Mr. Crepault: Well, we are talking about buying back Canada you see, and if we want Canadians to be aware—I am thinking at the moment especially of the part of the country where I come from—there is a whole education to be made, as Mr. Fortier said, about making the people conscious of what it is to invest in our country—in Canada. And at least from our point of view I don't think there is a more effective medium than the electronic medium.

The Chairman: I was thinking of a product that you could not advertise?

Mr. Crepault: Well, we cannot advertise the securities.

The Chairman: Well, you said that there were some that you could not advertise and you agreed that that would be a good thing. What are some of those?

Mr. Crepault: That we cannot?

The Chairman: Yes.

Mr. Crepault: Well, there are some personal hygiene products but this is a matter of good taste.

The Chairman: Mr. Fortier?

Mr. Cr pault: Hard liquor for example.

The Chairman: Do you think you should be able to advertise hard liquor?

Mr. Crepault: Well, we have left that particular issue in abeyance for the time being, but we have had trouble, for instance—it has taken years and years to be able to advertise wine, and this is an example I think where our legislators have been influenced by the old puritan background in Canada.

Mr. Fortier: Are there any divisions within the Association between the CBC affiliated stations for example, and the other operators and if so how are these reflected?

Mr. Crepault: Well, there are no differences with regard to basic policy decisions of the Association. I don't recall any specific situation where there has been, let's say, a real divergence of views. There could be different considerations—for instance the attitude of one station which may be a CBC affiliate station to one which is not. But I don't recall any particular instance where in fact that kind of approach has led to a basic divergence of attitudes or policies on the part of the Association, which was very fortunate and I think which indicates maybe the flexibility of minds of private broadcasters.

Mr. Fortier: The one-station, one-vote policy, does this not tend to favour the networks?

Mr. Crépault: No, because I think there are far more stations which don't belong to a network than those which belong to a network, and the number of stations which belong to the CTV network is a relatively small number. I believe there are just twelve.

Mr. Fortier: You have never encountered any problem at that level?

Mr. Crépault: No.

Mr. Fortier: May I just turn to the concentration of ownership aspect of your submission, Monsieur Crépault. On page 8 of your brief you say more or less in conclusion:

"It is our submission that no field of endeavour is less subject to monopoly or the likelihood of it than communications."

My question is this. Do you feel that the diversity of media to which you referred is sufficient to provide for adequate access to meet public expression in all local areas in Canada, or are there areas where your Association as an Association would suggest some safeguards?

Mr. Crépault: Well, if you are talking about group ownership of electronic media or broadcasting undertakings, I can't think of any particular area where special safeguards would be required as an Association. There may be areas where there could be cross ownership between broadcasting undertakings and newspapers, but I don't think to my knowledge that the Association really feels that there is any particular case where special safeguards would be required.

Mr. Fortier: Your Association does not feel that this is essentially bad or it just has not pronounced itself?

Mr. Crépault: Well, the Association has pronounced itself on the basic principle of group ownership in the following sense. We feel that group ownership—and the experience is there by the way to support it—of course it is a matter of degree, but the basic principle of group ownership has been and especially in Canada will even become more important for a number of reasons. I think that in general experience has shown that it can hire better people, it can hire more people, it can bring to the community which they are called upon to serve better facilities, and in this case I think we have made available to your Committee copies of this special study made by Professor Litwin and Wroth, the essence of which was precisely these conclusions. To that extent we feel that group ownership could have some very definite advantages.

Mr. Fortier: The CRTC has spoken, as you probably well know, of excessive ownership. What would be your definition of excessive?

Mr. Crépault: I don't think I can reply to this because I think every case has to be judged on its merits.

Mr. Fortier: You say they are all ad hoc cases?

Mr. Crépault: They are all ad hoc cases because you can have for instance a particular area where there is a group of stations but in each area where they have a station there is a competing station, so right away you have a built-in safeguard because there is an alternative. I think to that extent by the way that the CRTC and its predecessor the BBG has probably shown a better insight than its opposite number in Washington, the FCC which as you know has set some very specific limits. In other words you cannot own more than seven radio stations and five television stations, which I think implies a certain rigidity although it probably makes it easier for them to reach decisions, but at the same time I don't think it is as intellectually arrived at as it is in Canada.

The Chairman: Senator Kinnear?

Senator Kinnear: On page 2, paragraph 1 part 4, you say:

"In any event under the present legislation, no broadcasting transmitting or broadcasting receiving undertaking can operate without a licence from the CRTC. That tribunal can withhold or withdraw a licence at any point."

You have made this point many times this morning. It is a question whether multiple ownership or cross ownership has reached excessive portions. I wonder how many cases there are—how many stations there are like that across Canada under cross ownership and can you give us some examples?

Mr. Crépault: Well, there are as you know some corporate groups which own more than one station.

Senator Kinnear: Yes, but are there many?

Mr. Crépault: I think it is a fair statement to say that there is a tendency towards a grouping of broadcasting undertakings and the names that come to my mind at the moment would be groups like Standard Broadcasting, Selkirk Holdings, Western Broadcasting, CHUM and...

Senator Kinnear: Is the trend to that more and more?

Mr. Crépault: I think it is, chiefly for the reasons I have mentioned. First of all the costs of operation are really going up steadily. I remember when I first went into broadcasting for instance; in effect you could really think of starting a radio station with perhaps as little as $25,000, perhaps really build it up from there. I haven't seen really any new radio stations in the last year or so and I think one of the reasons is probably because you just can't start a radio station with less than several hundreds of thousands of dollars. The electronic equipment is becoming more refined and as a consequence it is becoming more of an expense.

There is also another aspect which I think is worth mentioning and this is in the field of news. The isolated independent station cannot afford obviously to have correspondents in Ottawa and in the provincial capitals or in the States or abroad. A group of stations can do it however.

The Chairman: Couldn't that be done co-operatively?

Mr. Crépault: Yes, but you see...

The Chairman: Couldn't your organization do that on a co-operative basis?

Mr. Crépault: But then you set aside the competitive elements that might exist between a certain group of stations—in other words you don't want to create uniformity.

The Chairman: I am not sure that you answered Mr. Fortier's question. Perhaps you did to his satisfaction but not to mine. How much concentration is too much—I mean what is excessive concentration? You used the example of the United States...

Mr. Crépault: Where it is automatic.

The Chairman: Where it is automatic, but I am sure you will agree there are how many times more broadcast facilities there—five, six, seven times—I don't know. Would you be happy to see all the private broadcasting outlets in Canada owned by one person?

Mr. Crépault: Of course not.

The Chairman: Then, where do you draw the line?

Mr. Crépault: I don't think I can draw the line unless you give me a specific case.

The Chairman: Well, I have given you a specific case—if one owned them all.

Mr. Crépault: I would say no.

The Chairman: Well, all right, if two people owned them all?

Mr. Crépault: I would say no again.

The Chairman: Where do you say yes?

Mr. Crépault: Well, if you want me to give you examples where the CRTC has taken a stand on this, then I will. We know for instance that in a number of cases the CRTC has refused applications because they felt that in their minds it had reached the degree of excessiveness.

The Chairman: Have you agreed with all those CRTC judgments?

Mr. Crépault: As President of the CAB I find it very difficult to say yes or no, because I represent an Association.

The Chairman: Well, I don't want to put you in an unfair position, but you would agree presumably then that concentration in broadcasting can become excessive?

Mr. Crépault: Oh, by all means.

The Chairman: Okay.

Mr. Crépault: I mean, if I were to own all the radio stations in French Canada that would be excessive obviously.

The Chairman: Perhaps I missed this answer and I apologize because I perhaps was writing a note, but how did you answer the question on a local monopoly? I am referring specifically to 5-14 in your brief at page where you say: "One sometimes hears expressions of concern about possible monopoly in communications." Then I do recall Mr. Fortier quoting the next sentence. Don't some broad casting stations have a local monopoly? Is that a healthy situation?

Mr. Crépault: It is my understanding, Mr. Chairman, that there are some small localities where in fact there is a tie-up between the newspaper and the radio station.

The Chairman: Is that a healthy thing?

Mr. Crépault: It depends on the policies of the owner.

The Chairman: Well, that is a good answer.

Mr. Crépault: Well, I think it is really, and there is also the practical situation. You may have a choice between that kind of situation or having two competing media which could not be economically viable, so there are some practical considerations coming into play.

The Chairman: You submit the brief by Professor Litwin and the Committee is familiar with it. We were aware of it prior to our study—I won't say that all of us have read it but I studied it, but you say in discussing this there are certain factors not that much different in Canada. Aren't there really some different factors in Canada than in the United States in terms of this being a valuable study, a useful study but as we read it shouldn't we be mindful of the fact that it is an American study and that this is Canada? I don't say that in any nationalistic sense but rather in the sense the problems are here. I think it is an American study and the problems here are different.

Mr. Crépault: It is an American study and I think that some of the factors which they have studied and examined might not be completely applicable in Canada but at the same time, as I have read this document a number of times, I became increasingly aware that the basic issues were pretty much the same. I feel also that the gap, the difference between U.S. and the Canadian situation is decreasing.

The Chairman: One of the conclusions which you quote here is that single owners are more concerned with short term profit while common owners are more concerned with establishing a reputation for service. I would remind you that by your brief almost half of your members are single owners; 47.2 per cent are single owners. Do you think that the group owners are better broadcasters than those single owners?

Mr. Crépault: No, I don't think it should be taken in that sense. My interpretation of that sentence means that in a group ownership you are in a position to hire more professional people and to that extent you are really able to plan for maybe a longer haul than the individual broadcasting operator who has immediate problems of survival and so on and whose means of course are far more limited.

The Chairman: Again he says: "Diversity and validity of news information are related to market size. In larger markets much greater diversity and validity are perceived." Is it not a fact that we have relatively fewer larger markets in Canada?

Mr. Crépault: Yes.

The Chairman: So that diversity and validity in news is desirable—I am sure we are agreed on that...

Mr. Crépault: Yes.

The Chairman: And it seems to me that this is a problem here where a...

Mr. McGregor: Well, I might make a point here that was made earlier by our president in regard to the five national voice services, most of them with headquarters here in Ottawa or certainly their major base of operation is here in Ottawa.

The Chairman: You are talking about radio now?

Mr. McGregor: Yes I am. They are providing a complete diversity and many of their reporters in fact are here in this room and they are providing a considerable diversity of the information flowing out from the Capital. It is really the biggest news source in Canada.

The Chairman: I would like to read you a quotation from the Washington Post, December 3, which is a commentary by Nicholas Von Hoffman on the subject. He says:

"The radio news departments are the sorriest parts of professional journalism, and FM is the sorriest part of radio news."

I would like to ask you if you agree with those comments?

Mr. Crépault: Well, I think I can answer...

The Chairman: Incidentally may I say—I hear some of your colleagues laughing and saying "Oh no", but I might say this is an opinion which has been expressed before this Committee on more than one occasion by witnesses who have appeared here. I think in fairness I should say that to you.

Mr. Crépault: I think I can answer this Mr. Chairman, on the basis of my own personal experience, if I may?

The Chairman: Yes, of course.

Mr. Crépault: We are talking about group ownership and we are talking about news reporting and there is always an inclination to compare news radio with the reporting by newspapers. In French-speaking Canada, as you know Mr. Chairman, we have succeeded in forming in fact the first and only private French network in the world and that of course is only in Canada. Perhaps the main reason which has prompted us to try to do it really was because of our desire to bring to the French Canadian population a news service, second to none in terms of quality—not only in terms of quality but in terms of international features. First of all, the first point I want to make is that I don't think this would have been possible on the basis of one independent isolated station to begin with. It was only possible to do it on the basis of group ownership, simply because of money to begin with but also in terms of being able to attract professional newspapermen. This is a factor. There is a factor of prestige or of reputation. It is easier to attract a professional to a large, big, well-established organization than it is to one independent broadcasting undertaking. That is the first point. The second one I think—I think it is a fair statement—and I just don't want to relate that statement to my own organization but also to many other broadcasting organizations in Canada—I think in terms of news—and we have seen it also by the extent to which Canadian audiences listen to radio. I think the reporting has shown an increasing professionalism.

The Chairman: May I ask you just two questions on this question of radio and news. First of all to be fair, I would agree that many private stations do an excellent job. I say that in fairness. Would you agree with me however that some private stations do a terrible job on radio news? Terrible is perhaps not the word—the best word—perhaps ineffective would be a better word?

Mr. Crépault: Well, there are bad lawyers and good lawyers...

The Chairman: Exactly.

Mr. Crépault: The same as there are good notaries and bad notaries.

The Chairman: Exactly. Now, what I would like to know is what does your Association do about the bad broadcasters?

Mr. Crépault: Well, we really try to bring to them a facility, advice and even sometimes material.

The Chairman: Do you come to them and say "Look, you are not doing a good enough job"?

Mr. Crépault: Well, we may not be doing it in exactly that fashion.

The Chairman: But shouldn't you?

Mr. Crépault: Well, we do it—we are not a controlling organization because we can only advise. At the last annual convention held in Edmonton the whole topic was information and for three days our membership was subjected to a constant briefing on how to bring better information to the public, so this is the kind of thing we do.

The Chairman: Would it be possible...

Mr. Crépault: I am sorry for interrupting you but this Professor Tebbel was there as one of the guests.

The Chairman: Would it just be possible that the broadcasters who need this information least, who are already doing a good job, are the ones who are primarily in attendance? The people who need this information most don't come to these meetings?

Mr. Crépault: I don't think so because the attendance at our conventions is extremely high, but at the same time if somebody doesn't want to follow the black line we just can't insist upon him doing that because we are still in a free country and they are in a voluntary association and there is a point beyond which—you know, I can't do it with my station. We can decide on a policy for the station and it can be implemented if you do have a voluntary organization.

Mr. Allard: I think it should be noted Mr. Chairman, that the last broadcasting station that was legitimately accused of doing a poor news job had its licence lifted by the CRTC.

The Chairman: Do you think it deserved to have its licence lifted?

Mr. Allard: Well, that was the CRTC's decision.

The Chairman: Do you agree with that judgment?

Mr. Allard: I wasn't familiar with the circumstances as the CRTC was.

The Chairman: Mr. Fenety, would you like to comment on this?

Mr. Fenety: Yes, but on that particular question Mr. Chairman, I would say that in broadcasting today we are getting some of the best possible news services and I don't think we have to take a back seat to the private broadcasters in the United States of America. I contend that Canadian broadcasters by and large are doing a far better job in the news field, better than, well, let me put it this way. The largest single program expenditure in the private radio station today lies in the news field. There is a constant desire and indeed demand to upgrade the services in all private broadcasting stations. The Radio-Television News Directors Association is a further upgrading if you like of the grass roots level and most stations are very proud of the news service they provide.

Now, I think what you were referring to and what possibly the Washington Post columnist was referring to is the rip-and-read technique which I regret to say is still in effect in Canada and in the United States, but at the same time most of the smaller operations who are confronted with this are also confronted with a very small financial return for their effort and it is just not possible for them to provide a service other than the rip-and-read, but if indeed they do subscribe to a news service such as Broadcast News, which is the right arm of Canadian Press in the broadcasting field, then in that field alone they are making a significant contribution to their community. By and large Canadian broadcasting, private stations in the news field, cannot be tarred with the same Washington rush.

Mr. McGregor: If I might just add a further comment I think that the record might be enhanced with Patrick Scott's column from last night's Toronto Star. I don't know whether you read it...

The Chairman: Yes, I do see that column, or the benefit of the Senators...

Mr. McGregor: He wasn't complimentary.

The Chairman: Well, he wasn't particularly complimentary to the news media in Ottawa. He was fairly critical of all news media in Ottawa. He also, as I recall, refer to this Committee and he said this Committee would be well advised instead of worrying about hockey scores in the morning paper—which of course is something that interested me as long time ago—it should be interested in the coverage of the federal Parliament by the Ottawa newspapers. Well, of course, had Mr. Scott read the transcript he would know that we have delt with this problem at some considerable length. However, it was quite an indictment of the Ottawa news media generally; but I think in fairness we should realize that it was by Mr. Scott.

I would just like to ask one more question on this question of concentration of ownership. At page 6 you say:

"Corporate arrangements and so-called 'multiple ownerships' have arisen in every industry because of the combination of rising costs (prominently including taxes); the increasing demand of paperwork requirements; the difficulties that sometimes beset smaller operations in obtaining additional financing; and succession duties and estate taxes."

Would you not agree in fairness Mr. Crépault, that we should add to that list—general economies of scale and increased profitability?

Mr. Crépault: Well, I would be inclined to say no.

The Chairman: Why?

Mr. Crépault: Well, I have lived through the experience and I find that group ownership doesn't really increase your profit margin and gain, on the basis of facts and figures I think it decreases it because...

The Chairman: That is true in broadcasting, is it?

Mr. Crépault: It is certainly true in broadcasting, not only from my own experience but from the impression I get from my colleagues who are involved in group ownership.

The Chairman: Well, your statement here says every industry. Can you not think of industries in which there are economies of scale and increased profitability because of group ownership? Even part of the communication industry?

Mr. Crépault: I can't think of any at the moment unless Mr. McGregor has some facts.

Mr. McGregor: I was simply going to comment that the increased profitability might well result from increased revenue more than from increased profits proportionately speaking. In other words the profits may well increase as a result of an increased efficiency in the operation in making the whole station or the whole group of stations...

The Chairman: I am sorry for interrupting you but there is an urgent phone call for Mr. Donald Newman.

Mr. McGregor: The difficulty that some of these single ownership stations have is their inability to assimilate a rapid change—a drop in ratings a sudden new regulation which represents a substantial increase in costs—they are not able to stay alive while the regulation is either changed or while the effects of the regulations can be changed or modified within the station. These things become a major crisis to a small operation whereas in a larger operation they are an important problem but they don't represent life or death.

Mr. Fortier: On that point, what about the argument which we have heard when the Committee was dealing with newspapers, that the newspapers should be community owned—it should be owned by a member of the community where it is published, ideally. Does that not also apply to radio and television stations and if not why?

Mr. Crépault: I think I would make a distinction between ownership and operation. To begin with as to group ownership, I am personally inclined to believe not only the principle, I think, must be accepted but I also feel to a great extent that it is almost essential now for the survival of broadcasting, and in some way the argument that we had earlier that if we want quality and if we want to be in a competitive position we have to have a certain element of bigness. With regard to the local participation—I would prefer to use the word participation rather than ownership. As soon as you talk about group ownership, actually first of all you get away from local ownership unless it is a public company with a wide distribution of shareholders with roots in various communities, so really the ownership in my view is not the determining factor.

Mr. Fortier: It is the operation?

Mr. Crépault: It is the operational aspect of the media which counts.

Mr. Fortier: But you have done so effectively, so well in Quebec monsieur Crépault with your company—do you think you are going to see that in English Canada also?

Mr. Crépault: You are beginning to see it now, it is already started. I visualize that even just as a matter of survival in the next five years—as I say it doesn't mean that all my colleagues here will necessarily agree with my conviction—but I visualize that in about five years or perhaps at the most ten years you will have the whole private broadcasting field in the hands between 10 and 15 groups.

Mr. Fortier: Made up of networks?

Mr. Crépault: Regional networks, joint administrations, and I think that it is not going to harm the information field in Canada. I think it is going to enhance its qualities, I think it is going to lend strength to the Canadian industry in order to become more competitive and I think it will also bring to the Canadian population far better services, more professional services.

Mr. Fortier: Could I ask Mr. Fenety to comment on that?

Mr. Fenety: I would agree wholeheartedly with Mr. Crépault's summation. I would think for example in the Atlantic Provinces where we are hard-nosed individuals, we like our own autonomy and we like to be as parochial as it is possible to be, that even there we are now facing a situation where we are going to be viable in the marketplace. There must indeed by a grouping together of broadcasting units if they are to survive. For example, we were talking about news a moment ago. In my particular market my news department chose to present Apollo 11 in a voice report series, which to me seemed a little strange and the cost was about $500. Their point of view was simply that there are people who are shut in in hospitals and people who are mobile or people who are travelling who wanted to follow this important event and therefore despite the fact that most of the people in my immediate city area would watch ABC, CBS, NBC, CBC and CTV, they went ahead with it. How much longer—this is the way I am putting it to you now—how much longer are we in a position to do this? I think perhaps the people in the smaller cer-tres in New Brunswick should have had the opportunity and so on and if such opportunities are to be provided there must be cost sharing. This can only be done within the larger units. Therefore, the service that is provided in all these areas will be greatly increased and the quality of them even more so.

Senator McElman: Mr. Chairman, for the record I think I must say that Mr. Fenety's description of a Maritimer doesn't necessarily apply to all Maritimers!

Mr. Fenety: Well, we have a nationalistic outlook, our own Maritime outlook.

Senator McElman: We have had many comparisons between the Canadian and American situation, this morning and so on, but I think we should look back to what Parliament had in mind going back beyond the Broadcasting Act to the White Paper and the report of the House committee on broadcasting. I will just read two short paragraphs and then I will pose my question.

"Fundamental to any consideration of broadcasting policy is the fact that the airwaves are public property and the privilege of exclusive use of any channel or frequency must be subject to the clear responsibility of serving the public interest as expressed through national policies. The Committee"—and this is the House Committee and this report was adopted—"feels strongly that it is not a proper function of Parliament or Government to be involved in the programming or the day-to-day operation or supervision of broadcasting systems. It is however the responsibility of Parliament to define the public interest to be served by our broadcasting system and to enunciate the national policy. It is also Parliament's duty to create a viable structure within which the service we seek can be assured to the Canadian people."

Now, we have talked much about the regulations and we have talked a little about licensing. Do you not think therefore that in the sort of unique broadcasting situation—I think it is unique perhaps in the world with its mix—do you not think that in licensing you have a tremendous advantage because in licensing I think one of the requirements—if it isn't you can correct me—is that before another licence be granted consideration be given to the economic viability of licencees in that area. This is unique, is it not?

Mr. Crépault: Well, it is true, Senator, and in fact this is a consideration of course which is taken into account when you apply for a licence. They want to make sure if the licence is granted that you are going to be viable. As to whether this is unique in Canada...

Senator McElman: Excuse me sir. Not just the fact that the new licencee will be viable but the existing station will be viable?

Mr. Crépault: That's right. In other words—yes, you are right on this. In other words if in their judgment they feel that by granting a new licence they would jeopardize the existing station they would be reluctant to do so. As to whether this is unique within our country I would be inclined to say that perhaps you might compare maybe the telephone operation which is perhaps identical to this. In other words, I don't think you could obtain from the Transportation Board—you know, I don't think I could, for instance, set up shop in competition with the Bell Telephone without a licence, and I have the feeling that I would find it pretty difficult to get a licence to operate my own telephone company in Quebec. I am not sure that this situation is unique. You have the same situation with regard to airlines.

Senator McElman: Well, let us just stick to broadcasting. The comparison today has been largely with the American system which is better than ours in this fashion, they can make more money and have their great networks which by making money can produce a better programming and so on. I am sure you wouldn't want to transfer into an American system but let's for a moment take radio broadcasting. Their licensing provisions enable them to almost hand out radio broadcast licences like wheatcakes...

Mr. Crépault: Yes.

Senator McElman: Yes.

Mr. Crépault: And they are beginning, Senator, to regret that policy.

Senator McElman: Indeed.

Mr. Crépault: Yes, because I can tell you for instance that within the last month there are three television stations in the United States that have gone bankrupt and perhaps even a greater number of radio stations, and also there is duplication of the services, there has been a lowering of the quality of the service and I agree with you, I think they are beginning to deeply regret that policy.

Senator McElman: Well, this was what I was getting to. In line with the intent of Parliament, which I have read to you, we have had great stress this morning on the interference, the regulations and so on—there is another side of the coin in Canada, is there not—somewhat different—our licensing does have woven into it protective measures for existing licencees—Roy Thomson said a licence to print money...

Mr. Crépault: The most questionable statement that was ever made about broadcasting.

Senator McElman: Well, all right. The point I simply wanted to make was that in Canada there is the second side of the coin—heavy protection of licencees guarding against further licences which will wreck their viability. Is that not correct?

Mr. Crépault: Senator, I am fully in agreement with you. The securing of a broadcasting licence, and I think I can say that I speak for the great majority of broadcasters when I say that it is a great privilege and an honour because in some way it is a judgment in their ability to serve the public and to that extent I agree with you. The licence includes within itself also a built-in protection and I think that makes the obligation that much more serious and I fully agree with you. I have always accepted the fact that it has to be regulated.

The Chairman: Honourable Senators, ladies and gentlemen, I know that Mr. McGregor would like to speak and Mr. Fortier would like to speak. I said we would adjourn at 1:00 o'clock but perhaps before we actually do adjourn I would just say to you, Monsieur Crépault, and to your colleagues that as originally conceived the idea for the Committee was really to deal with print only. However we soon realized that a study of this type would only be meaningful if we did include broadcasting and so we decided to ask the broadcasters, notwithstanding as I observed in my original speech in the Senate that you are quite right—it has been analysed, self-analyzed, cross-examined, possibly the most examined medium in history. Yet I don't think we have to apologize for having you here this morning notwithstanding the many remarks about government inquiries in your brief. This has been a valuable morning for us, it has been useful testimony and we are grateful.

Perhaps the only other thing I should do is outline the schedule for next week. There are only two public sessions. Tuesday, March 17 in this room at 2:30 we will be hearing from Mr. Nicholas Johnson from the FCC in Washington. Then on Wednesday, March 18 in this room at 10:00 o'clock, Reader's Digest Magazine.

The meeting is adjourned. Thank you very much.

...Whereupon the meeting was adjourned.

SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE ON MASS MEDIA

EVIDENCE

Ottawa, March 17, 1970

The Special Senate Committee on Mass Media met this day at 2.30 p.m.

Senator Keith Davey (Chairman) in the Chair.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, if I may call this session to order.

Our witness this afternoon is surely one of the busiest people in North America and certainly one of those who is most interested in the mass media. Commissioner Johnson is leaving from Ottawa to go to Rome, then of course ultimately back to Washington. Perhaps I could be allowed to sketch his career very briefly for you. He was born in Iowa—he is a graduate in law of the University of Texas and spent two years as a law clerk. The first with the Chief Justice United States Court of Appeal Fifth Circuit and then a year as a law clerk with Supreme Court Justice Black. He then joined the law faculty at the University of California at Berkeley, where he served three years. He then became associated with a law firm in Washington for one year until his appointment in 1964 by the then President Lyndon Johnson as the Maritime Administrator. He served in this position from 1964 to 1966 and then in 1966 was appointed by President Johnson to a seven year term as one of seven FCC Commissioners.

Commissioner Johnson, to give him his full and proper title, is 35 years of age, he is married with three children and he interestingly enough just now—just within the last few weeks—published a fascinating book which I hope I will have a chance to talk about this afternoon—it's title is "How To Talk Back To Your Television Set." Perhaps Mr. Johnson if I might be allowed to quote from the jacket of the book, it says something about you which I think would interest the senators. There are three quotations from the back of the book—the first is from John Kenneth Galbraith, and I am quoting:

"Nick Johnson is currently the citizen's least frightened friend in Washington and this book tells why."

The second quote by Fred W. Friendly, an Edward R. Murrow Professor of Broadcast Journalism, at the Graduate School of Journalism, Columbia. Mr. Friendly says:

"There is such a thing as public enterprise and Commissioner Johnson emerges as this devil's disciple. What this good book says is that 40 years of experimenting with private enterprise in the public sector has produced a national humiliation."

The quote I like most is from Tom Smothers and he says:

"It is a shame this book wasn't around in the 60's so my brother Dick could have read it to me. Things might have been different. For the millions of Americans who want television to live up to its responsibilities, this book tells you how to do something about it. If you don't read it, stop griping."

Inside the cover, or inside the jacket, just quoting one more paragraph, "Nicholas Johnson is a member of the Federal Communications Commission—the youngest man ever to serve on the FCC and the most controversial. (Five broadcasters' associations, for example, have asked President Nixon to fire him.) In this book he inquires into television's performance and he finds it dangerously inadequate. Unlike most critics of the medium, he also offers some tough-minded proposals for reform. Commissioner Johnson, we are delighted you have found the time to be here. I know you have a written brief which has just now been circulated to the senators. I propose that you read that brief, or perhaps highlight the brief, and then following that we would like to ask you some questions on it. I would certainly, and perhaps some of the others would like to ask you some questions on your book, and I am sure there will be other questions the Senators would like to ask you. Welcome, thank you, and why don't you proceed.

Mr. Nicholas Johnson, Commissioner, Federal Communications Commission, Washington, D.C.: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman and honourable Senators, for that very gracious beginning. I must say a number of Americans who have found our society oppressive for one reason or another came to Canada, as you know, and apparently I am to be numbered among them, at least for today.

When I was last called before our Senate at Washington for my writings, it was on the basis of a complaint on the part of the committee with responsibility for the Federal Communications Commission. The complaint was that I had the audacity as a public official to bring such secret documents to public attention as the acts of Congress and the decisions of the United States Supreme Court, thereby letting the public know of its rights in this area, which of course is a dangerous thing to have done. I promised to try to do better in the future, but I really haven't as I have gone on in that way.

It is with some considerable hesitation that I agreed to come here at all. I have tremendous respect for the Chairman and for this committee and for what you are doing here in Canada. It is being watched and followed very closely in the United States as you may know, but I really think it is a Canadian matter and I am in trouble enough as it is in the United States without taking on Canada as well. I think these are very important issues in every nation of the world today. They are being confronted one way or another in every country, but in no country with the courage and thoroughness that is being applied here.

I think it would be inappropriate for me to come to Ottawa from Washington and suggest to you what you ought to do to solve your problems when we seem to have some great difficulty even addressing ours let alone resolving them. I don't know really how much I can say that would be of relevance to you, because you are much more familiar with the situation here than I am. I will limit my comments largely to our experience in the United States, what I think some of our problems are there and what we have tried to do about them. If you find anything of relevance in that, then you can draw such conclusions and proposals as you wish.

Let me begin by saying a word about media concentration and the various forms in which it can exist. I might note at the outset that I don't intend to read this statement to you from beginning to end, but rather point out some of the issues discussed in it. I have been very impressed with the fact that the committee staff and your chairman actually read this book which is an extraordinary compliment and rather extraordinary behaviour on the part of public officials. And so I trust, if you are capable of reading an entire book, certainly you are capable of reading the statement without my reading it to you.

I have appended to it a bibliography, incidentally, of some of the opinions and other statements that I have issued in this area, and I have brought a single copy of each of those which I will submit to the Committee for its public files or for whatever use you may wish to make of this material.

There are a number of areas in which the problem of media concentration arises in the United States. One of these can be characterized as local monopoly or local domination; this is where a local newspaper, radio or television station might be owned by the same person.

A second is what we call regional concentration—this would very seldom be a monopoly, but a situation where a small group of men control most of the more significant mass media in that particular area: newspapers, radio, television, cable television magazines, and so forth.

Then there is what we call the multiple owner who may have a national impact within a given medium. He may own a chain of newspapers or he may own a chain of broadcasting stations.

This can be further complicated in the case in which a single individual or corporation owns outlets in different kinds of media. They may own newspapers as well as television stations, as well as magazines, and so forth.

Finally, there is the problem we call the conglomerate corporation. This I define as a corporation which is predominantly engaged in industrial enterprise of one kind or another and has, as one of its subsidiary corporations, a mass media enterprise of some kind.

Now, what I have just characterized are really classic case studies. In point of fact they never exist in quite that pure a form. You will have, for example, a Howard Hughes in Las Vegas acquiring a television station. This raises a number of problems. Hughes' industrial interests, generally throughout the United States, clearly qualify him as a conglomerate corporation. The ownership of a single television station in Las Vegas does not make him a national media power. But in addition to being a national conglomerate, he is also a local conglomerate.

in that he owns most of Las Vegas. So that within that given community here is a man who has business interests throughout the city who also owns one of the major outlets of information in that city.

Another example would be RCA, which is an industrial conglomerate—it derives 20 per cent of its revenues from defence contracts. It is also a multiple media owner, in that it has interests in book publishing, in records, as well as the ownership of stations, the programming of stations by means of a network, the ownership of copyrights and of talent, and so forth. It is difficult to find cases that fall within precisely any one of these definitions, but I think they are useful in looking at the problem.

The facts of concentration in the United States are, in my judgment, quite disturbing and the condition is accelerating. There is a local concentration of control of the mass media in most of the American cities, a local concentration of one kind or another. There are 72 communities where the only broadcast station is owned by the only local newspaper. I believe now, in 96 per cent of the cities with a daily newspaper, there is no newspaper competition. There are 12 communities where the only newspaper owns or has an interest in the only television station. In 1967 there were 250 cities where the local daily newspaper had control over a local broadcasting station, and in approximately 213 of these, there was no other daily newspaper. Most of the major television stations in the United States are owned either by local newspapers or by multiple station owners. There are almost no examples of local ownership of the major VHF network affiliated television stations in the largest, say, 25 markets (other than joint newspaper ownership). This is, needless to say, contrary to what Congress had in mind in 1927 and in 1934 in passing the Radio Act and the Communications Act of those years. Many of these statistics are spelled out here in the Statement regarding radio and I won't read all that to you.

The conglomerate problem is more complicated and we have less information about it. The FCC is now undertaking an investigation into conglomerate ownership. It launched it with great fanfare on February 8, 1969 and has yet to take any meaningful action in that regard, with the exception of the decisions it rendered on that date when it approved the further acquisition of broadcast properties by three of the largest and most powerful conglomerates in the United States. The Commission apparently felt that as long as it announced an inquiry the same day, there was nothing wrong with its decisions.

We also have the phenomenon of network domination that goes into the economic sphere as well as the ideological, in the United States. The networks and their owned and operated stations—as distinguished from the stations affiliated with the networks—took in 52 per cent of all the revenues earned by the television industry. The remaining 48 per cent was shared by the other 628 stations. That gives you some sense of the total domination of the networks in case there is any question about that in your minds.

Recently the Vice President added his voice to the rising chorus of those who expressed some concern about media concentration—although his interests seem to be limited to those media owners whose policies tend not to coincide with those of the administration. At least one would have to conclude that on the basis of the examples he chooses to emphasize.

Now, why is this something that independent observers of the media in the United States are concerned about? There are a number of reasons.

First is our concept of what we call, and I quote, “a marketplace of ideas”—to borrow a phrase from a leading Supreme Court decision. We are committed to the idea that no one has a monopoly on truth, and that the only way that a democracy can function is if all people have an opportunity to express their views, put them out, get them heard and debated and challenged. The truth is, in effect, a process. It is the process by which all these ideas can be thrown out into the marketplace of ideas and tested, and the idea that wins in a democracy is the idea that prevails. We are concerned that the great diversity that is represented in our country is not really represented in the media.

The second reason for our concern is the political power that is held by those who control the media. This is a frightening thing and I can explore it in greater detail if you are interested, but for now just let me say that there is no single industry in the United States that comes close to having the political and economic power, that the media in general and broadcasting in particular now have.

Let me just say for now that one of the reasons for this is the role of television in the elective process. All that any other major industry can do is to contribute money, millions of dollars, to political campaigns. What is then done with that money is to purchase television time—time which can also be made available free, on news programs as well as being made available in commercial time for purchase.

A third reason for our concern is our interest in local ownership of the media. The reason why we have 7,500 radio and television stations in the United States is because we think that local communities deserve a local outlet. To the extent the stations are only putting out nationally distributed commercials, wire service news, records, motion pictures, television entertainment there is no need for the local station.

A fourth reason relates to the more conventional anti-trust concerns for the functioning of this industry in the marketplace, like any other industry.

A fifth reason, a fifth concern, is that we have some evidence that multiple ownership and conglomerate ownership of the mass media have tended to have an influence in distorting the content of the mass media to serve the economic interests of the owners. A large conglomerate corporation is very likely to treat a mass media subsidiary as something in the nature of a public relations operation or advertising operation. It is very difficult for a large conglomerate to accept the idea that its mass media subsidiary is going to report the truth even when it does not serve the economic interests of the holding company. All the subsidiaries are expected to contribute to the economic well-being of the holding company, and the mass media subsidiary tends to be no exception.

Finally, I might note that with increased concentration of control goes a popular demand, and a legitimate need, for greater governmental regulation. So that to the extent you happen to favour the operation of a media, independent of government regulation, which I do, then one would want to encourage in the mass media greater diversity, greater competition, lowering of barriers to entry, et cetera, so that it would tend to regulate itself in the marketplace rather than requiring a need for greater and greater governmental regulation.

The Federal Communications Commission has very little at the present time in the way of rules to regulate this. The only firmly fixed standards we have involve two principles. The first is the so-called duopoly standard. It provides that no one can have broadcast interests in the same service the signals of which overlap; that is to say, he cannot own an AM radio station in one community if its signal will overlap an AM radio station which he owns in another community. However, until now there has been no prohibition whatsoever against owning an FM radio station, an AM radio station and a VHF television station all in the same community. We are now addressing that issue in a proceeding that goes by the name of the "one-to-a-market rule". The "one-to-a-market rule" provides that no one could own more than one full time property in a given market. The Justice Department has intervened in that proceeding and has urged upon us that we require divestiture and that we consider newspapers along with broadcast properties.

The other rule relates to the total number of stations which any single owner can own in the United States. This is now limited to seven FM radio stations, seven AM radio stations, five VHF television stations, and two UHF television stations. What this fails to take account of, of course, is the difference in markets, so that there are multiple station owners who own stations in New York and Los Angeles and Chicago and other large cities. That tends to give them an inordinate amount of influence in the largest states which in turn gives them inordinate national and political and economic power.

The FCC once proposed a so-called "top 50 rule" which would have limited the number of stations that any individual owner could own in the largest 50 markets to something less than the "7-7-7" that applies generally throughout the country. That rule had no more than been announced than the FCC began waiving it in each individual instance that came before it. It soon became obvious that it didn't intend to enforce the rule at all and finally, at least, shed the hypocrisy and repealed the rule.

There has been some interest also in the matter of network domination of the programming product. We have two proposals before us regarding this: one is called the "50-50 proposal" and the other is called the "Westinghouse proposal". The "50-50 proposal" provides that no network should be permitted to own more than 50 per cent of the programming which it makes available to its affiliates. At the present time networks own virtually all of the programming. The "Westinghouse proposal," by contrast, would limit the number of hours in the evening that a network can program for affiliates, thereby opening up time that the local station will either have to program with its own material or by purchasing from independent suppliers and programming material.

Now, one of the problems both in terms of the marketplace of ideas and an economic marketplace in the industry is that there are basically three buyers of television product in the United States. It is an incredibly stifling economic and creative environment in which to work. I went out to Los Angeles this past year and talked with a broad cross representation of the top producers and writers and talent in Hollywood, and I have never before addressed a more despondent and cynical lot of men in my life. So one of the things that the "Westinghouse proposal" is designed to strike at, is that problem of opening up more competition in the business.

It is rather tragic that Vice President Agnew and the administration have been talking about the problem of concentration of control, and applying its concern to those papers and stations which refuse to simply carry the White House releases without comment. While there has been this ostensible interest in media ownership patterns, the Administration has, in fact, behind the scenes been supporting the industry across the board in every instance in which its economic interests were at stake.

We see, for example, that when the trade press reported that the FCC was going to oppose the Pastore Bill by a six to one vote, President Nixon appointed two new commissioners to the Commission, one of whom was publicly on record in support of the Pastore Bill.

The Chairman: You might explain what the Pastore Bill is.

Commissioner Johnson: Thank you. I think that is a good suggestion which occurred to me in mid-sentence.

The Pastore Bill, S-2004, was in general, a curtailment of the right of the public to participate in the licence renewal process. More specifically, it did this by engaging the legislative presumption that all licensees are serving the public interest and that no citizens' group should be permitted to file a competing licence application at licence renewal time for any commercial station. It provided that the FCC would have to first find that the station had not been serving the public interest before any outside group could file. In point of fact, the FCC has done this in probably less than one-one hundredth of one per cent of the cases coming before it since its inception on the grounds of programming, the likelihood of it happening in the future was rather remote as the industry well knew. This was particularly so in view of the fact that the FCC would have before it, in judging the public interest performance, nothing but the station's own self-service filing with the Commission.

The upshot of that odyssey, should you be curious, was that the FCC then went back and announced its own so-called policy statement which in effect adopted into FCC regulation most of what the proponents of the bill wanted from the Senate, thereby removing from Senator Pastore the embarrassment of further pursuing that rather incredible piece of legislation.

The point is that the administration's position on it was quite clear. Senator Hart, who has made a valiant effort to conduct the kind of inquiry that you are engaged in here, with the hearings that he held on the newspaper industry monopoly authorization bill (known to the newspapers as the Failing Newspaper Act), discovered that there was a considerable influence on the part of media with the Senate which was in no way aided, in this instance, by the role of the Administration.

The Assistant Attorney-General for anti-trust matters in the Justice Department, as one would expect, came out in opposition to the Failing Newspaper Act: Whereupon for the first time in our nation's history, to my knowledge, the Justice Department was overruled by the White House and the Department of Commerce was set up to testify on this anti-trust matter and, under White House instructions, came out in favour of the newspaper industry's bill.

The Chairman: You might explain the bill.

Commissioner Johnson: Well, this is a bill that permits newspapers to merge, presumably out of a concern that to continue to have competition among newspapers in as large a proportion of our cities as 4 per cent, was somehow dangerous and ought to be diverted as much as possible. This would permit mergers in those few remaining communities around the United States where there still is newspaper competition.

The final interesting bit of evidence of the Administrations' role concerns the bill introduced by Senator McIntyre, which would have provided for splitting up media concentrations in local communities. The President's Director of Communications, (a title, incidentally, which does not exist outside of communist countries to my knowledge) Herb Klein, publicly stated that he was—by now to no one's surprise—opposed to Senator McIntyre's legislation.

While we have some frightening statistics we have very little in the way of action in the United States, and I am not optimistic that any massive action is near at hand. The media owners have a life and death grip on the political life of the country and they seem prepared to sacrifice their journalistic integrity in the cause of increasing profits. The existence of your Special Committee indicates that maybe the future for Canada is not as bleak as that which I see for the United States, but unless the concern generated over this problem continues, I am afraid that changes are impossible.

By "concern", obviously, I do not mean the kind of political utterances that have come from our Vice President, but rather the forceful and well explained and constructive investigation and study which is represented by the work of this Committee. Without such concern and inquiry, I am afraid, at least in the United States we are going to be doomed to increased domination and control by larger and larger media barons.

Well, Mr. Chairman and Honourable Senators, that brings me to the end of my informal comments about this statement. At this point with your permission I would like to insert the prepared statement in the record...

The Chairman: Thank you—And the various appendices as well?

Commissioner Johnson: If you would care to print them.

The Chairman: We would be interested in having all the information you can spare.

Prepared Statement of Nicholas Johnson, Commissioner, Federal Communications Commission, Washington, D.C.

Media Concentration: The United States Experience and Lessons for Canada

It is with some hesitation that I have finally acceded to the urging of your Chairman, Senator Keith Davey, that I testify before your Committee. The questions before you are strictly a matter for Canadians to address and resolve. I would never be so presumptuous as to urge a particular solution upon you. Indeed I do not even know if my observations will be of much relevance to you. But I am willing to come and be of whatever help I can.

I am vaguely familiar with the structure of the Canadian media—especially the broadcast media—and I have some ideas about the unique problems that your nation encounters. But I prefer to confine my remarks today primarily to the United States experience. If there are parallels to the Canadian situation I will leave it to you to draw the conclusions.

I do want to commend you for undertaking this inquiry. Those of us to the immediate south of Canada desperately need to engage in the kind of inquiry your Special Committee is conducting. Lacking our own study, I am hopeful we will be able to learn from yours. I will conclude my remarks with a brief description of what has been attempted or proposed in the United States. But first, it may be useful to describe precisely what I think is meant by "media concentration."

I. Media Concentration: A Definition.

I have dealt primarily in the past with the ownership of five units of media: television, radio, newspapers, cable television, and telephone. This is not to say that I consider this list to be exhaustive, or to say that I believe movies or books or magazines, for example, are unimportant. But due to historical chance these five media have been the principal concern of the Federal Communications Commission, and so I will address myself primarily to concentration of control of these media. When we speak of "media concentration," we are usually speaking of combinations of these five media.

Usually those concerned with the concentration of control of the media do not differentiate between different kinds of concentration. I believe that there are four different situations in which the concentration of media is important. First, there is the problem of cross-ownership: that is, the owner of one of the five media owning another media outlet in the same market. For example, a newspaper may own a local broadcast station or a single owner may control a local television-AM-FM combination. A second media concentration problem is "multiple ownership." Technically, a multiple owner is an owner with more than one of the five media anywhere in the country. But we only are concerned when the control of one owner over the media becomes so great as to create a "regional concentration" or "national concentration" problem. These definitions are necessarily imprecise, varying with the number, geographic distribution, power, and type of media held. A third concentration problem is the conglomerate ownership of media. A problem potentially exists whenever a media outlet is owned by a corporation with other business interests. The final concentration problem is pretty much unique to television: that is, the control over the media by national networks. A analogous problem exists with the power of the wire services in providing news to newspapers and broadcasters.

I. The Reasons for Concern

A. The facts of concentration.

A quick glance at the statistics of media concentration in the United States indicates a part of the cause for concern. The problem of cross-ownership or "local concentration of control," exists in most of the larger cities in the United States and in many of the smaller ones. There are 72 communities where the only broadcast stations are owned by the only local newspaper, and there are 12 communities where the only newspaper owns or has an interest in the only television station. In 1967 there were 250 cities where the local daily newspaper had control over a local broadcast station—and in 20 more it had a minority interest. In approximately 213 of these communities, there was no other daily newspaper.

The statistics of multiple ownership of media—the regional or national concentration problems—show similar concentration. In 1967, 81.3 per cent of the commercial VHF television stations were either owned by a group broadcaster or a daily newspaper. In 11 states and the District of Columbia, all the stations were so owned, and in another 13 states all but one was. In the larger, more competitive markets the concentration is even more pronounced. In the largest 10 markets in the United States, with 40 per cent of the nation's television homes, 37 of the 40 VHF television stations are licensed to group owners and the remaining three are owned by daily newspapers in the same community. In the top 50 markets in 1967, 127 of the 156 VHF stations were licensed to group broadcasters, and 17 of the remaining 29 were licensed to newspaper publishers.

The figures for radio are no less staggering. In the top 50 markets nationally, 526 of the 715 AM and FM stations are owned by multiple owners. Even the new technology, cable television, has not escaped this concentration syndrome. In 1968, 225 newspapers had cable television interests, and presently 32 per cent of the systems are owned by broadcasters. Telephone company ownership of cable television has also been significant.

The trend of these figures over the last few years shows no reason for optimism. In 1967, 50 per cent of the applications for cable systems were filed by broadcasters, and their ownership of cable television continues to grow. Multiple ownership of television shows a similar trend. In 1968 multiple owners controlled 73.6 per cent of all commercial television stations. Just 10 years earlier, the percentage of multiple-owned television stations had been only 45.8 per cent. The average size of a television "group" went from 2.7 stations in 1956, to 2.94 in 1964 and 3.87 in 1967. Daily newspapers have shown a similar decline in independence. In 1945 there were 117 cities with separately owned dailies, but in 1966 only 43 remained.

For the third problem of media concentration—conglomerate ownership—we do not have as precise statistics as for the other problems. This is in part due to the fact that the FCC is just now getting into a study of conglomerates, but it is also the result of the imprecise definition of a conglomerate. In one sense most owners of broadcast outlets are conglomerates, in that they have other business interests. But there are numerous licensees who rank among the most powerful conglomerates in the country by any definition. Certainly even without network and station holdings, RCA, CBS, ABC, Westinghouse, and RKO—to name just a few—would have to be considered large and diversified companies.

Bank ownership of broadcast stock gives one indication of the scope of the conglomerate problem. A staff report prepared for the Subcommittee on Domestic Finance of the House Committee on Banking and Currency entitled, "Commercial Banks and their Trust Activities: Emerging Influence on the American Economy" (90th Cong., 2nd Sess., July 1968) studied the holdings of the trust departments of 49 commercial banks in 10 major metropolitan areas. Large blocks of stock were held by these banks in 18 companies publishing 31 newspapers and 17 magazines, as well as operating 17 radio and TV stations.

The final aspect of media concentration is the dominance over commercial television by the three networks. The networks and their 15 "owned and operated" television stations in 1968 took in revenues of $1.3 billion, or 52 per cent of the industry total. The remaining 48 per cent was shared by the other 628 stations. Besides dominating the industry financially, the networks also dominate the subject matter by controlling the programming of their 542 affiliates. In November 1967, the three networks produced and owned, or controlled through licensing arrangements, 95.2 per cent of all prime-time programming. Ten years earlier the figure had been 67.2 per cent. Yet most television stations choose to affiliate if given the choice. The blunt fact is that they must in order to be profitable in a market controlled by the oligopolistic decision making of the three networks. Eighty-three per cent of the network affiliates in the United States are profitable, while only 33 per cent of the non-network stations make money.

B. Some reactions to concentration.

Although startling and intriguing, statistics can describe only a part of the reasons for concern over the concentration of control of the mass media. Another aspect of the concern is shown by the observations of many Americans on the growing concentration of the media. The issue gained by-partisan support in the United States when Vice President Spiro T. Agnew railed against media control in a few hands. He warned that network managers possess "a concentration of power" that "the American people would rightly not tolerate...in Government." (Address at Des Moines, Iowa, November 13, 1969.) The Vice President in a second speech on the subject said:

"The American people should be made aware of the trend toward the monopolization of the great public information vehicles and the concentration of more and more power over public opinion in fewer and fewer hands."

(Address at Montgomery, Alabama, November 21, 1969.)

The Vice President was not the first to express fear over the political power of a concentrated media. In the Congressional debates over the adoption of the Communications Act in 1934, Congressman Johnson of Texas said:

"When... a single selfish group is permitted to either tacitly or otherwise acquire ownership and dominate these broadcasting stations throughout the country, then woe be to those who dare to differ with them."

Another often articulated concern over concentration is the frustration it causes to those who "nowhere... hear being articulated their burdens, and their aspirations," (Address by Secretary of Health, Education and Welfare, Robert H. Finch, at Peoria, Illinois, May 31, 1969.) In its report on group violence, the National Commission on the Causes and Prevention of Violence cited "increased concentration of control over existing media" as one factor frustrating dissident groups. "We need more effective and different voices, not fewer and fewer standardized or homogenized ones," the Commission said. In a speech to the incoming freshman class of Yale University last fall, Yale President Kingman Brewster spoke of the growing cynicism among college students toward the established institutions of the United States. He blamed the mass media for causing a part of this cynicism:

"With mass communications concentrated in a few hands, the ancient faith in the competition of ideas in the free market place seems like a hollow echo of a much simpler day."

The courts of this nation have for years been aware of the necessity of a competitive media. When dealing with the structure of the media industries, they have been especially vigilant in enforcing the antitrust law. The Supreme Court in 1953 said:

"A vigorous and dauntless press is a chief source feeding the flow of democratic expression and controversy which maintains the institutions of a free society

(Time-Picayune v. U.S., 594, 602 (1953) citing Associated Press v. U.S., 326 U.S. 1, (1945).) The Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia has placed an affirmative duty upon the FCC to encourage competition. Joseph v. FCC, 404 F. 2d 207, 211 (D. C. C. 1968), the court said:

"The public welfare requires the Commission to provide the 'widest possible dissemination of information from diverse and antagonistic sources'..."

In an important recent decision, Judge Edward A. Tamm, after discussing the necessity of free and competitive media, and the FCC's responsibility for its maintenance, went on to write:

"It is also becoming increasingly obvious that the application of antitrust doctrines in regulating the mass media is not solely a question of sound economic policy; it is also an important means of achieving the goals posited by the first amendment."

(Hale v. FCC, —F.2d—(D. C. Cir., Feb. 16, 1970) (concurring opinion).) He quoted Judge Learned Hand who wrote, in rejecting a claim that the First Amendment provided protection for anti-competitive practices of a news service:

"Neither exclusively, not even primarily, are the interests of the newspaper industry conclusive; for that industry serves one of the most vital of all general interests: the dissemination of news from as many different sources, and with as many different facets and colors as is possible. That interest is closely akin to, if indeed it is not the same as, the interest protected by the First Amendment; it presupposes that right conclusions are more likely to be gathered out of a multitude of tongues, than through any kind of authoritative selection. To many this is, and always will be, folly; but we have staked upon it our all. (U.S. v. Associated Press, 52 F. Supp. 362, 372 (S. D. N. Y. 1943), aff'd, 326 U.S. 1 (1945).)

The enforcement of the antitrust laws is ever a trivial matter. In their application to the mass media, vigorous enforcement to promote competition is absolutely essential to our system of government. For a democracy can only survive when supported by an informed electorate. Without information the people cannot exercise their right of participation, and the government becomes remote and seemingly unresponsive. Democracy will have failed, if ever the people, as Judge Tamm wrote, "feel that they are being cheated out of the vigorous marketplace of ideas promised by the first amendment."—F.2d—

C. The effects of media concentration.

The statistics are alarming; the rhetoric demands immediate action to combat the increasing concentration of control over the mass media. But why have so many Americans, of such diverse political persuasions, reacted so strongly to what they consider to be the dangers of media concentration? Why is an inquiry such as yours applauded by people from many countries? What are the specific abuses that it is feared will result from the concentration of the mass media in the hands of a few?

I believe that there are seven specific reasons why concentration of the media will result in a lower level of economic and journalistic performance by the media. I earlier described some of these reasons in an opinion I wrote opposing the notion that increased rights of access for citizens should lessen our concern over concentration issues. (KCMC, Inc. (KTAL), 19 F. C. C. 2d 109, 110, 111 (1969).)

A first reason is derived from the notion of "a marketplace of ideas." If the media in a market—whether local, regional, or national—are controlled by only a few people, fewer views probably will be presented than if there were greater competition among the media. Any deviation from separate ownership for each individual media outlet will result in some loss of diversity to the public. The only question is how much less than the optimum diversity a free society feels it can afford. In a pluralistic society such as we have in the United States, I do not feel that we can exist forever with a large part of our population cut off from the media, unable to communicate with those of similar persuasion and interests. I am not just talking about political and social dissatisfaction with the media. I am not just complaining that those things I would like to see in the media are ignored. I am saying that the media of the United States is failing when, for example, one contrasts all the rich, wonderful diversity of a nation the size of ours with the very little diversity that appears on television.

A second reason is our concern about the political power that can be exerted by media concentrations. The raw, crass power of the media in the United States is shown by its ability to get essentially any single piece of legislation it wants passed by the Congress. This same power over the minds and thoughts of the public, through the faucet-like control of the information available to the people, is used to influence local and state politics.

Third, undue concentration subverts the concept of local ownership of the media—thought to be a worthwhile concept by the Congress and the FCC. Local ownership produces closer supervision over the everyday operations of the media by the owners. It brings the ownership closer to its audience. The FCC believes that this integration of management and ownership will produce better performance by the media. But for every multiple owner with media located in separate markets, there is an absentee owner. The conflict between multiple ownership and local ownership appears every time the FCC attempts to ascertain responsibility for a violation of our rules. The owners always seek to escape responsibility by blaming some faceless manager who was simply enmeshed in the bureaucracy of the company.

A fourth possible abuse from excessive concentration of control is the increased possibility for anti-competitive practices. For example, a media owner with two separate media outlets in the same market might use the monopoly power of one outlet to destroy competition against the other outlet. This could take the effect of a "tying" arrangement in which the owner of a broadcast station would give preferential advertising rates to those people who also advertised in his local newspaper. (See Complaint of Daily Herald-Telephone and Sunday Herald-Times, Bloomington, Indiana,—F.C.C. 2d—(1970).)

Such abuses may also result from conglomerate involvement with the media. There are a variety of ways in which conglomerate ownership of media can affect the proper functioning of competing mass media—competition which is often so necessary to insuring the presentation of diverse views and information in our society. Suppose a bank owns broadcast stations or a newspaper in a community—and is the only bank in the community. An actual or potential competitor—newspaper or broadcast station—may have great difficulty obtaining credit on reasonable terms. The bank's own media may get very favourable credit, giving them a substantial competitive advantage. Advertisers who must deal with the bank may be reluctant to place advertising on its competitor's stations. Business entities that depend on the bank for financial resources and services may be induced to advertise on the bank's media—advertising these businesses might not have otherwise undertaken. Finally, the bank itself is often an important local advertiser which may favour its own media.

Fifth, multiple ownership and conglomerate ownership of the media makes more likely the distortion of media content to achieve certain economic aims of the corporate owner. It would be no more than human for the non-media interests of media owners to, in some way, affect the content of their mass media. If a bank, for example, owns newspapers or broadcast stations, the interests of the bank in urban renewal, community planning, government housing development, local taxation, and a host of other issues may very well substantially affect what the people of the community will know about those issues. The distortion of content may be direct. Management knows what the interests of the corporate parent are and insures that these interests are protected. But the distortion may be more subtle: No one is ever chosen as station manager or managing editor who would be "untrustworthy" when it came to the parent's interests, and reporters soon learn that continued employment and promotions come only to those who are willing to compromise their journalistic standards a little.

The FCC recently has been confronted in two cases with allegations that broadcast stations have been operated in a way to benefit other business interests of the licensee. Both cases were designated for hearing in an effort to ascertain the facts. (See Midwest Radio-Television, Inc. (WCCO) 16 F. C. C.2d 943 (1969); Chronicle Broadcasting Co. (KRON) 16 F. C. C.2d 882 (1969).)

If such anti-competitive practices, and unfair use of the news media, exist more often in a concentrated market than otherwise—as the evidence suggests—then we cannot afford to wait and try to catch that fraction of the abuses that come to light. Abuse is very hard to show. And there is no institution in our society that regularly examines the functioning of the mass media to determine whether these abuses occur. We must take action against the industry structure which is a stimulant to anti-competitive abuses by the mass media. The fundamental antitrust tenet of "incipiency" provides that monopolies must be stopped short of the point where the monopolist is in a position to exercise his power in anti-competitive or anti-social ways.

A sixth reason is what I will call "economic." Concentrated ownership of the media can produce an economic domination of a market with all the results of monopoly: higher costs, decreased efficiency, and so forth. For the same economic reasons we oppose concentration of ownership in any industry, we should oppose media concentration. (See United States v. Gannett Co., 1968 CCH Trade Case § 72,644 (N. D. 111. 1968); Frontier Broadcasting Co., — F. C. C.2d — (1970); KSL, Inc., FCC 68-1005 (1968); 1 F. C. C.2d 340 (1969).) The stifling of innovation that is inherent in all concentrated industries is an even bigger loss to society in the media industries than in other industries.

A seventh reason to oppose concentration of control in the mass media is that the existence of competition in an industry permits less, not more, governmental supervision over the day-to-day operations of that industry. A competitive system, to some extent, is one that polices itself, avoiding expensive—and potentially dangerous—continual governmental surveillance.

III. Solutions to Media Concentration Problems.

Reaction to the growing concentration of the media in the United States is great—but little has been done to improve the situation. The Federal Communications Commission and the United States Congress have usually approached the problem in a piecemeal fashion, fragmenting the recommended solutions to deal with only one problem at a time—and, as often as not, in ways urged by the industry that make matters worse rather than better.

The FCC rules contain a general prohibition against concentration. They prohibit the granting of a broadcast license if "the grant of such license would result in a concentration of control of ... broadcasting in a manner inconsistent with public interest, convenience, or necessity." (47 C. F. R. § 73.35 AM, § 73.240 (FM), § 73.636 (TV) (1969).) Theoretically these rules should work to reduce the concentration of the media, because the renewal of a license after a three-year period is considered to be a "grant". But in practice the Commission has been reluctant to give any meaning to these rules beyond some specific prohibitions. For example, the granting of a license in any one of the three broadcast services to any person who already has another license for the same service in the same market is prohibited. This so-called "duopoly" rule has been the FCC's chief means of preventing the increase of local concentration. These FCC rules also contain a prohibition against any person having an interest in more than 7 AM, 7 FM, or 7 TV stations, and this "national concentration" rule has generally been followed.

Both Congress and the FCC have tentatively recognized that these rules do not provide nearly enough protection to the public, and so additional rules to deal with media concentration have been proposed. In a rulemaking proceeding begun in March 1968, and still pending, the FCC proposed an extension of its "duopoly" rules to further limit local concentration. (Notice of Proposed Rulemaking, Standard, FM and Television Broadcast Stations—Multiple Ownership, 33 Fed. Reg. 5315 (1968).) Known as the "one-to-a-market" rules, the provisions would bar grants of new licenses which would produce common control within the same market of two full-time broadcast stations. The Department of Justice has urged the Commission to extend these local concentration rules to include newspaper ownership, and to provide for divestiture. But such action would require a further rule-making proceeding, and so its implementation is, at best, several years off.

In December 1968, the FCC proposed similar one-to-a-market rules to include cable television within the prohibition against overlapping ownership in a single market. (Notice of Proposed Rulemaking and Notice of Inquiry, 15 F. C. C.2d 417 (1968).) But no action has been taken on this proceeding yet, and its future remains in doubt. The only major action that the FCC has taken against local concentration in recent times is the adoption of rules prohibiting telephone companies from owning cable television systems within their markets. (—F. C. C.2d—(1970).)

Although action against local concentration through rulemaking has been limited, there have been a number of recent adjudicative decisions which involve local concentration as an issue. Most of these cases have been initiated by the Department of Justice, rather than the FCC. But in WHDH, Inc., 16 F. C. C.2d 1 (1969), the FCC took away the license of a television station owner who was also the owner of a local daily newspaper.

Outside of the rather liberal limit on the number of stations that may be owned in each broadcast service (the "7-7-7" rule), the FCC has scarcely been concerned with problems of national or regional media concentration. In 1964 the Commission had proposed rules limiting to two the number of VHF television stations that any one owner could have in the largest 50 markets. But this rule was completely ignored by the FCC, and a waiver was given to any party asking for it. In 1968 the rule was discarded by a divided Commission. (Television Multiple Ownership Rules, 12 Pike & Fischer Radio Reg. 1501 (1968).)

In the mid-1960's, the Senate Subcommittee on Antitrust and Monopoly considered the Failing Newspaper Act. This bill, reintroduced this year as the Newspaper Preservation Act, provided an antitrust exemption to joint operating agreements between competing newspapers. Senator Philip A. Hart, the Chairman of the Subcommittee, used the opportunity to conduct extensive hearings into the structure and conduct of the newspaper industry. The eight volumes produced by these hearings are among the most important documents ever produced on the subject of media concentration. But despite the fine efforts of this subcommittee, and its strong recommendation against this "monopolization" bill, the Senate recently overwhelmingly approved it.

A recent bill introduced by Senator Thomas McIntyre (S. 3305) is the first significant legislative response to media concentration. The bill would prohibit newspaper-television common ownership in the same market, and would limit the number of daily newspapers owned by one company to five. However, despite the Nixon administration's declared dissatisfaction with media concentration, the President's Director of Communications, Herb Klein, indicates that he opposes this bill. Most observers have few hopes for its passage.

To gain a greater understanding of the potential and actual problems involved in the conglomerate ownership of the media, the FCC initiated an inquiry into the ownership of broadcast stations by persons with other business interests. (34 Fed. Reg. 2151 (1969).) But this inquiry was begun over a year ago, and so far there have been few results.

The FCC currently has before it two important rulemaking proposals—each of which might alleviate the current network monopoly over programming. The "50-50" rule would prohibit networks from owning more than 50 per cent of all prime time programming and would bar networks from the syndication business entirely. (30 Fed. Reg. 4065 (1965).) This rule would permit corporations and advertising agencies to contract for and produce their own programming and submit the finished product to the networks. Westinghouse Broadcasting Co. has submitted a counter-proposal. Under its version, no station in the top 50 television markets could carry more than three hours of network programming during prime time. The remaining hour or half hour would have to be filled from other sources. The purpose would be to open up a new market for independent program producers—possibly injecting fresh streams of creativity into the daily flood of mass-appeal programming. These rules have been before the FCC for years, and final action has yet to come.

Conclusion

The rhetoric for change exists in the United States, but thus far we have seen little concrete action toward breaking up the media monopolies which rule the country. I am not optimistic that change is near in the United States. The media owners have a life-and-death grip on the political life of the country, and they seem prepared to sacrifice journalistic integrity in the cause of increasing profits. The mere existence of this Special Committee indicates that maybe the future for Canada is not as bleak as that I see for the United States. But unless the concern generated over the problem continues, I am afraid that changes are impossible. By "concern" I do not mean political concern such as that shown by our Vice President. I mean forceful, well-planned, constructive concern, such as that which produced the initiation of this inquiry. Without such concern Canada and the United States are both doomed to increased domination and control by larger and larger media barons.

The Chairman: Honourable Senators and Commissioner, it seems to me that what you have dealt with in your paper today is essentially the second chapter of your book. The second chapter of the book is entitled "The Media Barons and the Public Interest" and I would like to ask you some questions about that chapter and as would some of the senators, but I am wondering just for a change of pace, if I should ask you a few questions about the first chapter, and may I say to the Senators that what I am about to begin is by no means a dialogue with the Commissioner. If any of you want to ask questions at any point by all means please do.

The first chapter of this book is called "The Crush of Television" and it deals with some of the things which has concerned this Committee and what I would like to do Mr. Johnson is quote two or three statements from the book and then ask you to explain what you mean.

Commissioner Johnson: I would be happy to, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: I really don't have to ask you what you mean, it is apparent, but I just think the Senators would be interested in the beginning of the book which outlines what you mean by "The Crush of Television." You say:

"There are 60 million homes in the United States and over 95 per cent of them are equipped with a television set. (More than 25 per cent of the homes in the United States have two or more sets.) In the average home, the television is turned on some five hours forty-five minutes a day. The average male viewer, between his second and sixty-fifth year, will watch television for over 3,000 entire days—roughly nine full years of his life."

Senator Prowse: Between what ages?

The Chairman: Between his second and sixty-fifth year. I don't know where that leaves you, Senator Prowse!

Senator Prowse: There is still hope.

The Chairman: And it goes on to say:

"During the average weekday winter evening, nearly half of the American people are to be found silently seated with fixed gaze upon a phosphorescent screen.

Americans receive decidedly more of their education from television than from elementary and high schools. By the time the average child enters kindergarten he has already spent more hours learning about his world from television than the hours he would spend in a college classroom earning a B.A. degree."

Now, I might say for your information there is nothing there which is startlingly different from the statistics here in Canada that some of the Committee members are familiar with. You go on then and you list four influences of television which I needn't repeat, and then you say that the "industry spokesmen are likely to respond with variants of three myths." We have heard a great deal about some of these things and the committee has to decide whether they are fact and it is your judgment, obviously, that they are.

It goes on to say—this is the industry saying this:

"We just give the people what they want. 'The public interest is what interests the public.'"

I would be most interested, Commissioner Johnson, if you could comment on that. won't read what you have said in here but...

Senator Prowse: Well, how about letting us in on it.

The Chairman: Well, I will quote. The commissioner says:

"To say that current programming is what the audience 'wants' in any meaningful sense is either pure doubletalk or unbelievable naiveté. There are many analytical problems with the shibboleth that television 'gives the people what they want.' One of the most obvious is that the market is so structured that only a few can work at 'giving the people what they want'—and oligopoly is notoriously poor substitute for competition when it comes to providing anything but what the vast majority will 'accept' without widespread revolution."

Isn't television a particularly well-analyzed statistically-analyzed industry and aren't the networks and the private stations responding to what the public want? I am just wondering how you would answer that.

Commissioner Johnson: Well, that certainly is their contention. I think it is a demonstrably fallacious contention. Mason Williams has said, "The choice you will never know is a choice you will never make". This is a problem I think that most people confront. It is possible to overstate the influence of television in our society but it is very seldom done and it's far more often that we fail to see it fully. This gets back in part to the first passage that you read from the book about the crush of television.

The general semanticist and now president of San Francisco State College, Dr. S. I. Hayakawa, has said that man is no more conscious of language and communication than a fish would be conscious of the waters of the sea. I think that is true with the really revolutionary technological innovations that we accept in our society: the telephone, the automobile, the television set. They have had an impact upon us as a people well beyond what any of us tend to be reflective about. You breathe polluted air and you don't really think about it until somebody points out to you what it is doing to your body; you pour polluted ideas into your head and into the minds of most of the people in the United States for that number of hours everyday and you have had an influence on the national spirit and the national intelligence, the information people have, the opinions they hold, the moral values they believe in. You have determined the sense of national priorities. Whether the United States is going to use its resources to go to Mars or to feed the hungry here on earth, is largely going to be a function of how the alternatives are posed to the nation on television. Every time we set up a new national commission to study the latest national disaster—it used to be called juvenile delinquency but now we have an anti-olence commission and one on race relations and so forth—they all come back to television and the influence of television on any given phenomenon in our society. I think we tend to overlook that. You know, television is just that box in the living room. Many of us don't watch it as much as many others do, and I think we probably tend to under-rate drastically the tremendous, awesome impact of this instrument upon us.

Now, then, when you come to your question about the choice of the people, I think that we are being grossly unfair when we wash over to people, 20 years of the kind of stuff that Hollywood manufactures like plastic Christmas trees on an assembly line and puts out in television commercial products, and then expect the people to engage in intelligent choice with regard to this aspect of their culture, or any other.

Beyond that, however, I would point out that on those rare occasions when the networks do offer the people some alien and unfamiliar programming in prime time, it tends to do rather well in terms of the ratings. NBC didn't undergo commercial disaster as a result of the programming it put on last Sunday evening—"The Wizard of Oz" and then "David Copperfield" and then another drama. The National Geographic specials have done quite well after the National Geographic succeeded in beating down the resistance within the network to putting the programs on at all.

Finally, there is the point embodied in the paragraph you read which is that oligopoly tends not to produce competition. This is true in the automobile industry and it's true in the television business. The people really haven't been offered a choice. We have necessarily circumscribed the number of stations in a given community—they just don't have competition in television in the sense that you do in magazines where I think you can demonstrate that there is a far wider degree of choice.

In the United States, if you examine the subjects covered and the way in which they are covered in books, in magazines, phonograph records, the theatre, or virtually any other art form you will discover tremendous diversity and range of interest and modes of presentation, and ideas discussed, that simply do not appear on television.

Now when you give the people their choice in these other modes they often choose things other than the lowest manufactured plastic common denominator and I have no reason to believe that the same could not be true with television.

The Chairman: Is the largest-selling newspaper in New York—the New York Times?

Commissioner Johnson: It is a subsidiary of the Chicago Tribune Syndicate which controls the major newspaper in New York, which is the newspaper of largest circulation in the country—the New York Daily News. It also owns a major television station there as well as the Chicago Tribune and a major television station in Chicago.

What point are you suggesting?

The Chairman: I am suggesting that that paper outsells the New York Times about three to one every day.

Commissioner Johnson: Well, here are a great many intellectuals who think it's a much better paper than the New York Times. However, the fact remains that there is a New York Times. There is not, I would suggest, "a New York Times of television". There is one in the newspaper business. It can exist. And in the magazine business we can have a Saturday Review or a New Republic, New Yorker, Harper's or Atlantic. Where are their equivalents in television?

The Chairman: Mr. Fortier?

Mr. Fortier: How would the "New York Times of television" survive, though?

Commissioner Johnson: I presume the same way that the New York Times of newsprint survives, by advertising created by those merchandisers who want to reach the audience that can be reached through the medium involved, and through a subscription service of some kind. One of the most obvious failings of the commercial television industry, in terms of serving the people, is that the people have absolutely no control whatsoever, no participation whatsoever, in what it is they get. In a way, they still retain some role with regards to newspapers and magazines.

Now, it is true that magazines such as Life spend far more than they receive in subscriptions, in gathering subscriptions, so in point of fact the magazine is totally supported by advertising; but the subscriber nonetheless is paying something. In broadcasting he is paying nothing—and he is getting his money's worth.

One of the arguments for subscription television is that this would give the consumer the means of participating in the market choice that consumers have traditionally exercised, and that is putting his money where his desire may be.

Mr. Fortier: But ideally should not advertising be kept away all together from the "New York Times of television"?

Commissioner Johnson: It's not kept away from the New York Times of newsprint.

Mr. Fortier: Is the issue the same really? We have heard it said before this committee that advertisers, as indeed you indicate in your brief as well as in your talk last December in San Francisco—that advertisers buy the audience. In other words, they will buy the program with the largest rating. So if there is no audience, no meaningful audience, how will those advertisers agree to spend money on subsidizing a program which may appeal to people like you and the Senators?

Commissioner Johnson: I think the answer in broadcast media can be the same as the answer to the print media. There are advertisers who want to reach specialized audiences. There are advertisers who want to advertise on classical music FM radio stations because the people they are trying to reach with their product are listening to those stations.

Mr. Fortier: It is very limited quantitatively and qualitatively I would suggest.

Commissioner Johnson: I think not.

Senator Prowse: How limited is it?

Commissioner Johnson: We have in the United States, a large number of corporations, trade associations and various institutions that would very much like to be identified with something other than the trash that is now offered to them by the three commercial networks. They include corporations like Xerox, Hallmark, U.S. Steel, Firestone, Union Carbide, and many other companies. They are seeking a positive institutionalized image because it sells some products, because it helps them in recruiting personnel, because it helps them with morale in their organizations, because it helps them with their governmental relations in Washington—for a variety of corporate purposes known best to them.

These corporations have a great deal of difficulty getting their programming onto the commercial networks, notwithstanding the fact they are fully prepared to pay the full commercial rate for that time. Xerox, with some of its very best programs, has had to go into the market itself, contact individual stations, line up enough stations to, in effect, make a one-shot Xerox network, and put on its program, because it can't get the network to accept it. The National Geographic has the same difficulty with its programming.

The Chairman: Why wouldn't the networks accept them?

Commissioner Johnson: The reason the networks won't accept them is because they believe they could do better in terms of the average rating for the evening, as a result the phenomenon known as flow-through of audience, by trying to maximize the total audience out there for each hour without regard to how much income they derive from the advertiser.

Mr. Fortier: Would you agree then that the viewers of a point buy advertising as much as, if not more, than they buy program content?

Commissioner Johnson: I would say advertisers buy...

Mr. Fortier: During prime time?

Commissioner Johnson: I would say advertisers buy viewers more than they buy programs.

Mr. Fortier: We had a view expressed last week here that people will turn to a particular television program, for a particular radio program because of the advertising.

Commissioner Johnson: Yes, we heard about that. One of the reasons I came up, in addition to being invited, was that we are very interested in advertising, commercials, and so forth, in the States. We just held a hearing at the FCC, with the three networks present, about their increasing the number of commercials that they were running. And we heard tell that here in Canada, you have a unique form of commercial unknown to commercial television anywhere else in the world which actually attracts viewers, and I thought that I really owed it to the citizens of America to come and check this out here and see if we couldn't adopt some of these marvellous advertising techniques of Canadian broadcasters.

The Chairman: Well, the private broadcasters were here on Friday and here is the headline in the Globe and Mail—"TV commercials add Canadian content"—I don't want you to discuss that as we are going to ask you about Canadian content; but it also says "TV commercials attract viewers, broadcasters claim." Is that true in the United States as well as Canada?

Commissioner Johnson: Well, we have never noticed that phenomenon in the United States.

Senator Prowse: Is that when the water ressure goes down?

Commissioner Johnson: Yes, Senator, and the observation has been made that McLuhan side, there are some very practical consequences of television in our society. It has, according to sociologists, altered eating schedules in about 65 per cent of the homes and sleeping schedules in about the same percentage. There have been some rather exhaustive analyses of what it has done to the birth rate that I won't spread upon the record, but it has also had the impact apparently that you refer to, which is that water systems engineers have had to re-design city water systems to take the tremendous drop in water pressure that occurs at the commercial breaks. One would think that tends to refute the assertion here—probably because of the higher quality of commercials here.

Mr. Fortier: That could drive advertisers away!

The Chairman: Well, may I quote you at page 31 in the book on this question of advertisers?

Commissioner Johnson: Oh, of course.

The Chairman: You say:

"We learn that the great measure of happiness and personal satisfaction is consumption—conspicuous when possible. 'Success' is signified by the purchase of a product—a mouthwash or deodorant. How do you resolve conflicts? By force or by violence. Who are television's leaders, its heroes, its stars? They are physically attractive, the glib and the wealthy, and almost no one else. What do you do when life fails to throw roses in your hedonistic path? You get 'fast, fast, fast' relief from a pill—headache remedy, a stomach settler, a tranquilizer or 'the pill'. You smoke a cigarette, have a drink or get high on pot or more potent drugs. You get a divorce or run away from home. And if 'by the time you get to Phoenix' you're still troubled, you just 'chew your little troubles away'."

Do you think that television reflects a false image of America?

Commissioner Johnson: Oh, there is no question about that, but it does much worse than reflect a false image of America. It builds an image as well. We tend to reflect what we see on that mirror that is our television screen. The passage that you just quoted was an effort to describe some of the impact of the commercial content in ways that go far beyond the mere selling of goods. Much of what advertisers are trying to sell us are goods that positively contribute to death of human beings, or disease, or other degradations. Other products are simply products that we don't need, won't work, are over-priced, or otherwise unsatisfactory. A small proportion of the products are harmless.

The Chairman: Are you against advertising?

Commissioner Johnson: Some of them are actually good for you. No, the business of America is business after all, and the way you promote business is through advertising. It has been a marvellous stimulant to the growth of the gross national product.

The Chairman: You are against television advertising?

Commissioner Johnson: No.

The Chairman: You are against the quality of television advertising?

Commissioner Johnson: I will tell you really what bothers me about it. I think that advertising does perform a useful function when kept in balance and used for the distribution of products that contribute to the society. What disturbs me is when you take an entire nation's affairs and make all decisions based upon commercial considerations. That it seems to me, is a mistake.

As Mason Williams has said, "Cigarette smoking is not a pleasure, it is a business." I was deeply concerned by the position of the American broadcasters when the FCC said that under the fairness doctrine, they had an obligation to bring to the attention of their audience the health hazards of cigarette smoking. They went all the way to the Supreme Court of the United States with the rather preposterous argument—at least it was found to be so by the Supreme Court—that the First Amendment somehow guaranteed them the right to keep this health hazard information from the American people. It is the failure to temper commercial standards with anything else; it is the failure to provide the balance.

I think most civilized countries in the world have tried to accommodate commercial television but also to balance it with a strong public television system. We fail to do that in the United States.

The Chairman: Well, let me ask you this then. Who wants the Beverly Hillbillies? Is it the advertisers, is it the networks or is it the viewers?

Senator Prowse: The CBC.

Commissioner Johnson: Yes, the CBC.

The Chairman: Well, in the first instance—who wants the Beverly Hillbillies; the viewers, the advertisers or the networks?

Commissioner Johnson: Well, I think the advertisers principally and the networks. As one writer or producer in Hollywood told me, he said, "I am basically a shill for snake oil. I am supposed to keep the audience here for the commercial." The advertisers and the networks are looking for a formula that will result in the fewest number of people turning off their television sets. So that is really what it comes down to.

The Chairman: They want the Beverly Hillbillies?

Commissioner Johnson: That's right. And they will package the commercials in the context in which they will be shown in their best light. Just as raisins show up much better in breakfast cereals than they do in fruitcake, so commercials look much better in the Beverly Hillbillies than they do elsewhere.

The Chairman: The thing that troubles me in all of this, and I don't think we are really coming to grips with it. You said a moment or two ago that this chap said that he was "a shill for snake oil"—that his purpose was to hold the audience until the commercials came on.

Well, doesn't that mean really then that they are giving the people what they want?

Commissioner Johnson: I don't think so at all. I think we have, in the United States at least, a very broad and deep dissatisfaction with television. Judging by my mail at least this is something that spreads across the land in every geographical section, every age group from grade school kids to folks in old folks' homes, from the poverty-ridden to the chairman of corporate boards of directors, and all shades of the political spectrum.

The Chairman: Why don't they turn their sets off? You say 3,000 entire days between the ages of two and sixty-five.

Commissioner Johnson: If you are living in an old folks' home, you have very little option but to keep your television set on. If you are a two-year-old child with very little else to entertain you around the home, you have very little option but to turn your television set on.

Senator Prowse: Or if you are a married man and broke between pay-days.

Commissioner Johnson: And as the Senator says, if you are a married man and broke between pay-days. The people watch the programming which they find the least offensive of that which is offered to them. There is all the difference in the world between that and watching something which is truly meaningful and relevant in their lives.

Television programming, I think, is very much like cotton candy. It is something that is very good in attracting your attention but then after you have consumed it, you are left with this hollow, empty feeling and nothing but a toothache and very little in the way of nourishment.

Newsweek magazine recently did a piece on the Middle American and quoted one fellow who had gone to the same factory every day for the last 30 years, I guess, and he described his role as that of one of standing in the same place, drilling the same holes for every day of these many, many years.

He gets up in the morning and he hasn't slept very well. He gets into a car after eating a breakfast that is designed to shorten his life—not aid his nutrition—and probably upset his stomach. He gets into a car and it was deliberately designed into it, dangers that will needlessly take 50,000 lives every year in the United States, with a bumper that cannot withstand a crash of over six miles an hour without contributing to the billion-dollar-a-year theft of the American people necessitated by bumper repairs. He drives at speeds scarcely in excess of those used in horse-and-uggy days through congested traffic, breathing polluted air, to arrive at this factory where he is certainly not treated as a human being—where he stands in the same place rilling the same holes. He drives home at night reversing the process, and sits down to watch television. It promises him a fuller and richer life and happiness and satisfactions of all kinds if only he will use a different hair spray or cologne or deodorant or a mouthwash, or take the new and different pill or garette brand or whatever it might be this month.

He gets no more satisfaction from the new products than he gets from the old programs, and he goes to bed at night waterlogged, half dead in the water, and doesn't sleep very well, and starts the same process the next day. And you tell me that the American society in general and the American television in particular is giving him what he wants.

Well, he may not be able to articulate what is wrong with his life but he knows there is a lot wrong with it, and depending upon his background and predilection he expresses that frustration in a variety of ways, which we have seen in our country.

The thing that I find so disturbing about television is the awesome, woeful, disgusting, criminal contrast between the fantastic potential that this industry has and the depressing use that is being made of it. To me that is the greatest sin. Television can contribute to the richness of people's lives; it can give them information they need; it can inspire them; it can instruct them; it can open up new visions for them. It fails to do so.

President Kennedy used to say that with great power goes great responsibility, and there is no one in our society who has greater power and therefore greater responsibility, no one who is falling more short of meeting that responsibility, than American commercial television networks, in my judgment. That is the great tragedy, and it washes like blackish water over the American people hour after hour, day after day, year after year, and produces the problems that we have in such abundance, or certainly contributes to it.

Mr. Fortier: But your average fellow citizen cannot articulate what he wants but you can. Are you going to impose it on him now although he has been unable to communicate it to you?

Commissioner Johnson: Impose what on him?

Mr. Fortier: A type of programming which will be commensurate with what he craves but which he has not been able to tell you that he wants.

Commissioner Johnson: I think the way to do that is simply to make more choice available, to make a greater richness in diversity available. One assumes, when we talk about the failures of television, that we are talking about the difference between the masses and the intellectual elite. That is not really the point at all. There is no such thing as a majority audience in the United States. That is really what is wrong with television.

It is programming for an audience which simply doesn't exist. We have 20 million people in the United States who are under five years of age. What is television doing especially for them, commercial network television? We have 20 million people who are over the age of sixty-five, what is television doing for them? We have 22 million blacks, we have 27 million white-collar workers, we have some fifty or sixty million in schools. Ask people what really concerns them. They are concerned about the quality of their life; they are concerned about making their marriage and their family work; they are concerned about getting greater satisfaction out of their employment—about opportunities for training and for expansion and assumptions for greater responsibilities and more rewarding enterprises.

People don't get helped with these things on television.

Mr. Fortier: The spectrum of the package is too broad.

Commissioner Johnson: It's nothing. I mean, as Mason Williams says, "When television gets off into life it gets lost". A lot of the young people in the United States are interested in working on automobiles. I don't happen to be numbered among them. But they don't find anything on television that they would be interested in either. It is the difference between a program you really want to watch which is an important part of your life, which really contributes something to making your life and your day better, that you will cancel everything else so that you can sit down and watch because it is so compelling, and a program which is simply inoffensive enough that if you have nothing else to do that you are going to "watch television," you will select it rather than the other things that are on.

There is all the difference in the world between those two programs. And there ought to be a difference in the eyes of the advertiser, in terms of the commitment of the viewer to what it is he is watching, the intensity with which he is watching.

The program that means most to me is Laura Weber's guitar lessons, which is carried on educational television in the United States. I try very much not to miss that program. There is virtually nothing else on that I really care if I miss.

The Chairman: Did you bring your guitar this afternoon?

Commissioner Johnson: No, I didn't. But I have a talking blues, however, which I believe encapsules the whole problem.

The Chairman: In the book, much of the material is futuristic in terms of technology.

Let us be futuristic in terms of advertising and programming. Are you optimistic that these things that you have been talking about are going to change?

Commissioner Johnson: Yes, I am always optimistic, because if you stop being optimistic you stop getting out of bed in the mornings. I mean, you have to be optimistic. There is even some basis for optimism.

The Chairman: Before you come to the basis of optimism, may I submit one basis for pessimism? I was reading rather recently Alexander Kendrick's book, "Prime Time: The Life of Edward R. Murrow" and I was terribly impressed with the last two sentences. They are very short and I would like to recall them for you then you can tell me why you are optimistic.

The last two sentences were, and I quote, as I recall: "Ed Murrow was dead. The Beverly Hillbillies lived on". Doesn't that say it all?

Commissioner Johnson: Well, it says a great deal, but it doesn't really say too much about the new technology which was the original question you put to me.

The Chairman: No. I am specifically asking about programming and advertising.

Commissioner Johnson: Very well, let me address that.

Senator Prowse: You had better get then separated.

Commissioner Johnson: In the context of the new technology?

The Chairman: All right.

Commissioner Johnson: Our regulation of broadcasting was originally established on the premise that a full range of competition was going to be impossible. There was going to have to be a quasi-monopoly, and therefore there would have to be regulation. We now see near at hand new technological innovations, which would radically alter that structure, and the operation of the mass media and therefore the need for a regulation, and therefore, in my judgment, many of the failings which you and I address this afternoon.

We have already seen an expansion in the United States from roughly 700 AM radio stations to 7,500 AM radio, FM radio, VHF television and UHF television stations. We have seen the establishment of an education radio and television system, and the creation of a public broadcasting corporation—which now enjoys live interconnection in prime time. This tenfold increase has provided a great amount of diversity. In large measure it just means that there are more stations in each community playing the top 40 records, but there has been some additional service as well.

Specialized radio is by now well accepted, and there are a number of cities that have 24-hour-a-day all-news programming services that did not exist before.

The next breakthrough that we see, and are now experiencing, is cable television. Now, theoretically, this offers the option of virtually unlimited number of channels into the home, and let me explain why.

The telephone which you now have in your homes and offices is itself a form of cable communication, one of the earliest. With direct distance dialing you can now interconnect that telephone of yours with that very small pair of two little twisted wires to, in the United States, 100 million originating points—100 million other telephones. And you can access those within about 30 seconds, when the television service is working, which raises yet another problem which I gather isn't of interest to this committee.

Now, cable television could do much the same thing, bringing you by way of cable a video picture in addition to sound. If that were truly done, and if you had a common carrier principle—which is terribly important because that makes all the difference in the world—you would then have something more like the magazine industry.

And let me explain that. By "common carrier system" I mean that anyone could walk into the cable television distributing company and ask for a channel to put on his program. Under common carrier principles, the cable distributing company would be obliged to make a cable available or a channel available for whatever the rate might be for the particular day or hour that was being requested.

This would mean that you would no longer have an economy of scarcity in television. It could mean that anybody through reduced production costs and some sale of advertising could put on his own program, underground or whatever it might be. It would make possible the equivalent of the underground newspaper, or the fluidity which we have in the magazine industry.

Added to this, or complementary to it, is the concept of subscription television, which is put back in the hands of the audience a total marketplace control over what is produced and what is made available; it makes it possible for people who are prepared to pay for it to get programs that would not otherwise be made available to them. These could of course be distributed over the air, which is now being proposed by the Federal Communications Commission in the United States in the largest markets, but it could also of course be done with a cable distribution system as well.

If the common carrier principle is adopted in the United States, I see great hope for this particular combination of innovations. Beyond that, once you have access to virtually an unlimited number of continuously programmed channels you pretty soon find yourself moving into a totally viewer-controlled system. In other words, you could access from your television set a library with a collection of films, television programs and so forth which you would watch when you want to watch it, with or without commercials, however you want to pay for it, or this could be distributed instead of being distributed down a line from a library it could be distributed with a hard copy being delivered to your home in the form of video tapes, or the EVR system of CBS—the video records.

This makes or turns the television business into something more like the record industry in which virtually anybody can get into a recording studio, cut a record and make copies available, and it would make it possible for distribution, in a mass way, virtually any idea.

The Chairman: What did you mean when you wrote this about cable in your book at page 153:

"Its fate is now being determined in a grim political and economic struggle with the giant interests whose prosperity and power it has challenged—the broadcast industry and the telephone companies. As this battle unfolds, only the CATV industry is there to speak for its own economic interests. Almost no one speaks for the public."

What did you mean by that?

Commissioner Johnson: Well, I meant that almost no one speaks for the public.

The Chairman: Doesn't the FCC speak for the public?

Commissioner Johnson: Well, that was the theory under which the agency was set up, but as has been the pattern under which most regulatory agencies have evolved, they very quickly come to be the hand-maidens and spokesmen for the very industries that they are supposed to be regulating.

There was an amazing story told about the creation of the ICC—The Interstate Commerce Commission, which is responsible for regulating railroads. It is sometimes referred to as the granddaddy of the regulatory commissions (a term referring more to its age than to the affection in which it is held by its grandchildren). A railroad company president is alleged to have written the Attorney-General asking what on earth the administration was thinking of in establishing this agency, and he received a reply back as follows:

"The Commission... can be made of great use to the railroads. It satisfies the popular clamour for a government supervision of the railroads, at the same time that the supervision is almost entirely nominal. Further, the larger such a commission gets to be the more it will be found to take the business and railroad view of things. It thus becomes a sort of barrier between the railroad corporations and the people and a sort of protection against crude legislation hostile to railroad interests... the part of wisdom is not to destroy the Commission, but to utilize it." (Letter of Attorney General of the United States Richard Olney to Charles E. Perkins, President of the Chicago-Burlington and Quincy Railroad, December 28, 1892, quoted in Josephson's, "The Politicos", page 526.)

Thus reassured, the president of the railway company is supposed to have given his support to the creation of this agency.

The Federal Communications Commission was likewise established in the 1920's as the Radio Commission. It was the result of a series of conferences called at the urging of the radio industry. They were presided over by that great spokesman for the New Left of the twenties, Herbert Hoover, who was then the Secretary of Commerce.

The FCC has been basically true to the pattern. What happens, of course, is that the agency, in its desire to bend over backwards and be of help to the industry, often gets itself into such a weakened position that it is likely to do more harm than good.

I could document that with a number of instances, but I won't take up your time with them now.

The Chairman: Well, then, as far as CATV is concerned, in the United States at least, people are on your side looking in—that is what you are saying?

Commissioner Johnson: Well, what has happened is that the FCC is held back the development of cable television until the broadcasters could buy up all the systems. They now have control of a sufficient number of systems and the FCC is now prepared to open up and let the industry grow a bit. Whether that was by design at the time or not I wouldn't allege, but that's been the net effect.

The Chairman: Mr. Fortier?

Mr. Fortier: We have an agency in Canada called...

The Chairman: Do you have a supplement, Senator Prowse?

Senator Prowse: Yes, Mr. Chairman. We are down talking about cable television so let's deal with that one.

The Chairman: All right. We will get back to you, Mr. Fortier.

Mr. Fortier: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Senator Prowse: I understand from information we have had from our research and from one or two things that I have read here, that this cable television development is not something way off in the future, but we could have it right today, couldn't we?

Commissioner Johnson: Not only could, but do.

Senator Prowse: But in the United States you have 3.6 million viewers—we have 450,000 which is about 30 per cent more per capita than you have.

The Chairman: You are talking cable viewers?

Senator Prowse: Yes; cable viewers.

The Chairman: Well, I just wanted to make sure that we understood that.

Senator Prowse: Why don't we set this thing up in the grid and get rid of these antennas and all of this nonsense and the interference? What is holding it up? Can you tell us what is holding it up in the United States? I know you can't tell us what is holding it up here, we are I think aware of that but we would like to know what your problem is.

Commissioner Johnson: Let me first of all address your premise then your question. Your premise is that if we had cable television we could close down the over-the-air stations?

Senator Prowse: Well, that really wasn't...

Commissioner Johnson: I am not sure if that is so. At the very least there would be a very long transition period while the wiring-up was done. Beyond that, however, the concern has been expressed that those living in sparsely-populated areas have very little alternative means of receiving any television service at all due to the economics of wiring or cable. This is a problem that the United States also was confronted with, telephone installation in rural areas, and we ultimately had to fund through subsidies from the federal government.

The initial problem is that at the present time at least, most of the programming is being originated by and for over-the-air broadcasters. Little or no programming, or meaningful programming, is being programmed by the cable companies. So that, at the present time, if you were to close down the over-the-air stations, you would have very little that you could put out over the cable system. This matter has come up in the United States with regard to the demand for greater frequencies for land mobile radio and frequencies used in taxi-cabs and police cars and operations of that kind.

The point has been made that unless you could virtually close down over-the-air broadcasts we have very little left in frequencies. I am not sure that your premise required that much analysis but I felt I should address

Senator Prowse: Well, I appreciate that.

Commissioner Johnson: Beyond that, you asked why cable is being held up. The cable television issue was originally conceived in the United States as a conflict between broadcasters on the one hand and cable television operators on the other.

It was viewed by the telephone companies as a potential competitor. It was viewed by the broadcasters as a potential competitor, and there was no one really to speak of the potential benefit to the country from cable television—not alone as a source of the distracting by cable a television product but also as a way of providing access to computers, closed-circuit television, facsimile transmission of newspapers and other materials to the home and so forth.

Because cable television issues were seen by others in terms of a conflict between broadcasters and cable men, the FCC perceived it in this fashion, and intended its regulations as protection to the broadcaster, rather than really getting on with the job of analyzing the problems in cable as well as the potentialities to the consumer.

Senator Prowse: Well, why would you protect the broadcasters? You don't protect the coal miner and you don't protect the businessman that is going out of business on the corner, so why would you protect the broadcaster, because he has had a pretty good thing for quite a long while anyhow?

Commissioner Johnson: Because the broadcasters have considerable power.

Senator Prowse: In other words, it's the practical implications between the power structure and the political structure and the reliance on each other that has resulted in a reliance on the part of governmental institutions to use the same ruthlessness of the market-place that they would use on an antiquated industrial production system in any other part of the economy?

Commissioner Johnson: That is my judgment, yes.

I might refer back again to what I said earlier, however, about the belief that there are benefits to an over-the-air system for those living in remote areas.

Senator Prowse: All right. Let's take the over-the-air system and the cable television system and let's put the two of them together.

Would you agree with me that in one week in the best listening area in the United States, where you had access to three systems plus UHF, that if you got one good program a week you would be lucky? You can leave out newscasts for a moment.

Commissioner Johnson: Well, that may be a little harsh but I wouldn't differ with you greatly as to your conclusion. Charles Sopkin who wrote the book "Seven Glorious Days, Seven Fun-Filled Nights" after watching the ten channels in New York City through a bleary-eyed week, concluded that when he began, he expected the ratio of trash to worthwhile programs to run something like three to one and when he had concluded he discovered it was more like 100 to one.

Senator Prowse: Yes.

Commissioner Johnson: So his empirical study supports your judgment.

Senator Prowse: My judgment is based on two weeks in New York and three weeks in Dayton, Ohio. I was able to look at TV whenever I wanted to and see it and judge it; and I can't remember a single program that I saw in either place—except in New York City where they had the civic election programs on and there were one or two of those which were a little astounding to me as a visiting politician...

Commissioner Johnson: Well, this is really what I meant when I referred to compelling programming.

Senator Prowse: Yes.

Commissioner Johnson: There are programs, a great number of programs, that are actually so offensive or so boring that you would far prefer to have the set turned off rather than to watch them at all. There are other programs which are really not very interesting, but if you had absolutely nothing whatsoever to do except to watch television you would prefer to have the set on rather than have it off. There are other programs that you actually rather enjoy and there are some that are really compelling. I think there are some which can be very compelling and I think they relate to something you are interested in, or they are showing you something and they are of value and contributing to your own personal life in some way. It's just that there are very, very few in the last category.

Senator Prowse: Well, leading on from that, I would like to get to the calibre of programs. The cost of programming—we have been told—is in the neighbourhood of $1,000 a minute.

Commissioner Johnson: Unless it happens to be a commercial minute, in which case the cost would be more likely sixty to seventy-five thousand dollars.

Senator Prowse: Well, let us leave those out for the moment here.

Commissioner Johnson: When you look at the allocation of programming production costs among all the minutes during the half-hour, it's very clear where the industry's interest lies. It lies in producing those minutes that relate to products rather than those minutes that relate to programming.

Senator Prowse: Suppose we do as you suggest or as I understand some things you have said here. I think you and the Commission are agreed that you think it would be desirable—you wouldn't have networks; that everything would be individually owned, that every communication outlet would be individually owned and not associated with another.

Is this commercially possible?

Commissioner Johnson: Yes, I would think so. That is to say that each enterprise has to stand on its own anyway. It is undoubtedly true that there are some AM and FM radio stations that are run jointly in the very smallest communities in the United States where the economies of joint operation are such that they would not be economically viable as separate entities.

It is also true that there are probably some UHF television stations in the United States that are being run by multiple-station owners at a loss because it just would not be economically viable and they would not yet be on the air but for their willingness to sustain that loss.

However, by and large, this is an industry that is making truly gargantuan profits, and most station-owners are really doing quite well, and to suggest that they have to be multiply owned in order to make a profit I think would be very difficult to sustain.

Senator Prowse: Could you suggest—let's take a hypothetical case—suppose you were being asked by the State of Alaska to make recommendations as to how they might set up an ideal system of television for their people that would give them a maximum choice and minimize the control in the hands of a particular individual; have you any suggestions as to how they might with a small, marginally economical station, be able to provide what you have referred to as meaningful programming?

Commissioner Johnson: Well, I think part of what we need to do—it has really nothing to do with population density—is simply reorient our thinking about the role of the mass media in our society. The three commercial networks in the United States have demonstrated that you can produce what I have characterized as plastic Christmas trees and get people to look at them, and you can do this on an assembly-line basis, but the med-it seems to me has a higher responsibility and a more important role to play in our society.

The media truly belong to the people and they ought to be used by the people. The letters to the editor column in the newspaper is a rather feeble gesture in the direction of inclusion of people in making this a true method of communication and suggests a two-way process. Where is the letters to the editor column on television? There is so much going on in the real world, all kinds of talent that exists that never finds its way onto television. This is not just a matter of rights of access guaranteed through court suits, it's a matter of training in the schools, in the arts of the use of audio tape and video tape and film. It's making available production facilities that citizens can use. It's inviting them in, asking them to come, because very few people will assert themselves enough to come. It's going out into the streets with an audio tape recorder and talking to the people. Covering events and affairs as they happen, staging discussions of important community issues that otherwise would not have been held, and covering those that are already being held—quite literally turning the media back to the people, out to help build a sense of community, and to reduce the sense of alienation that is so prevalent in the United States, in the large cities especially.

That is the kind of job that television could do but is not doing.

Senator Prowse: Isn't this the problem—that the whole communications industry is set up to get the advertisers' dollars today?

Commissioner Johnson: That's right.

Senator Prowse: This is the whole basis of the problem, and if we are to solve it, then don't we have to educate the people so that they will demand the entertainment and education and information industries be separated in the electronic area from the advertising industry; otherwise we are caught in a mousetrap we can't get out of?

Commissioner Johnson: Well, if I may respond to that, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: Yes, by all means.

Commissioner Johnson: There is a new magazine in the United States called Scanlax, that some of you may have seen. I have seen it on the stands up here. And the editor of that appeared with me on a panel in New York recently. He made the suggestion that we have something called print pollution, which is in his judgment the publication of a great deal of material which people really have no need or desire to read, that is published to fill up magazines that need to carry advertising messages to people. He pointed out the tremendous amount of money that magazines spend in trying to get new subscribers and the very low rates they charge and so forth. A lot of people are really subscribing to magazines which they really don't want, because they are not really paying too much for them and they are not particularly interested in them.

So his proposal was that we should have a six-month moratorium in the United States during which there would be no advertising in any magazine. All magazines would be required to charge a newsstand price or subscription price sufficient to cover their sole cost of production and a profit.

At the end of the six months we would look about and see how many magazines still remained. Those magazines that still remained around have really meant enough to the reader that he was willing to pay for what he was getting—his proportionate share of what he was getting. Those magazines would then be permitted to return to advertising in modest amounts.

Well, I think the same kind of point can be made about television, which is in part what you are suggesting.

Senator Prowse: Well, it's an interesting story but I don't know whether it is a completely valid one.

Commissioner Johnson: Well, I am not suggesting that you are proposing that particular resource...

Senator Prowse: No.

Commissioner Johnson: Only that you are proposing a kind of an analysis of what the problem is.

Senator Prowse: Well, not just that type of analysis but we do have two problems today. One is the pervasiveness of advertising all through everything, and in order to meet its demand, we have had a complete debasing of the media which could be of tremendous value to people. Everybody is getting a little fed up with it, so it may be defeating itself in the end anyway.

The Chairman: Well, perhaps at this point I could interrupt long enough to say that I think we will adjourn now until 4:25. We will adjourn for ten minutes. Thank you.

[Short Recess]

The Chairman: Honourable Senators, if I may call the session back to order. I would like to begin by asking you a question—I would like to turn the discussion, Commissioner Johnson, to concentration of ownership and to your discussion on the media barons. I would like to read two quotes, and ask you to comment on them.

The first quote is from the statement you made today and the second quote is from the book. Perhaps I could read them both and then ask you to comment.

At page 12 in your statement you say:

"The raw, crass power of the media in the United States is shown by its ability to get essentially any single piece of legislation it wants passed by the Congress."

That hit my eye because one day here Senator McElman used almost those very words—certainly the raw, crass power—in fact I think those were the actual words he did use...

Senator McElman: I am glad so many remember my words!

The Chairman: Well, I raised the point because that particular day the witness, who was a publisher, told Senator McElman on and said that this terminology was a gross exaggeration. I am not sure whether or not Senator McElman conceded the point but I am sure he is as interested as I am in seeing almost the same wording in your presentation.

The other quote is from the book and this is a quotation that I am frank to say, I think first appeared in the Atlantic Monthly, and I have used it many times. I think it is worth quoting here and putting on the record, then perhaps I will ask you to comment on it. You say:

"I do not believe that most owners and managers of the mass media lack a sense of responsibility or lack tolerance for a diversity of views. I do not believe that there is a small group of men who gather for breakfast every morning and decide what they will make the American people believe that day. Emotion often outruns the evidence of those who argue a conspiracy theory of propagandists' manipulation of the masses.

On the other hand, one reason evidence is so hard to come by is that the media tend to give less publicity to their own abuses than, say, to those of politicians. The media operates as a check upon other institutional powers in our country. There is, however, no check upon the media. Just as it is a mistake to overstate the existence and potential for abuse, so, in my judgment is it a mistake to ignore the evidence that does exist."

We would be I think interested in knowing if you could state some of the examples of the evidence that does exist.

Senator McElman: Before you move into that, could I put this into its real perspective?

The Chairman: Well, if I didn't, you may, yes.

Senator McElman: I used those words but I said in Canada "we had the potential for the use of raw, unadulterated power". In deference to Mr. Johnson I used the United States as the example of how such power can and has been used upon Congress itself to block or reduce the effect of legislation proposed by Congress. That is the total context.

The Chairman: Thank you.

Could you, Commissioner Johnson, give us some examples of this kind of power and this evidence of abuse?

Commissioner Johnson: Well, I would be happy to. I might also simply cite some general sources. One is the chapter in the book "How to Talk Back to Your Television Set" entitled "The Silent Screen" in which I document a number of instances of corporate involvement in the content of programming.

A second source would be an opinion National Broadcasting Company, 16 FCC 2, 698, which dealt with a situation in which a major American television newsman, whose name would be known to all of you, was found by the FCC to have been editorializing against the Wholesome Meat Act at a time when he and his business associates had an interest in that legislation, and in the foot notes to that opinion I cite a great many other instances.

Finally, there was a speech I gave to the Radio and Television News Directors' Association in Detroit this past year, which has been reprinted in our Congressional Record 115 Cong. Rec. E10178-82 (daily ed. Dec. 1, 1969) which contains a great many more examples.

The case that first brought this to my attention, the problem generally, was the ABC-IT merger. This would have been the largest merger in broadcasting history. It did not ultimately go through. The decision of the FCC approving it, over the dissent of three commissioners, was appealed to the United States Court of Appeals by the United States Department of Justice, and while that appeal was pending ITT backed out of that merger.

One of the concerns in that case was that ITT might view ABC as simply a part of its public relations activities, and that it might use pressure from ITT on ABC to try to distort some way the coverage of news items.

Mr. Fortier: And indeed did while the case was pending.

Commissioner Johnson: Well, that was the point I was going to come to.

Mr. Fortier: I am sorry.

Commissioner Johnson: Yes, indeed. The companies responded there by saying, "Oh, goodness, no, we would never do anything of that sort"—assurances which the Commission majority was fully prepared to accept. But when the case finally did go to a hearing, while that very hearing was pending on the very issue of whether ITT would ever interfere with news judgment, the Wall Street Journal broke the story that an ITT senior executive vice-president and numerous other corporate officials were in fact bringing rather extraordinary pressures to bear on the wire service reporter and a reporter for the New York Times, and so forth, calling them at their homes, calling them as soon as the wire service copy began to move, trying to get the stories changed, et cetera.

They called the reporters in an effort to try to get them to get confidential information out of the Justice Department about its intentions in the case, in their role as reporters, which ITT wanted them to pass on to ITT for its use in that litigation. It was a rather extraordinary spectacle, actually, of disdain for the proper role of the media.

There have been instances of intra-corporate memoranda that have come down ordering certain stories not to be covered or other stories to be covered in a particular way, instances of broadcasters taking positions in opposition to pay television or cable television without providing opportunities for other points of view to be heard. A long list of these instances have come up over the years, and it's remarkable really that they exist.

As you read, Mr. Chairman, in that passage from the book, usually these matters are not handled in the form of intra-corporate memoranda, they are handled in the form of sort of an unspoken understanding on the part of everyone involved.

The dangerous pattern, in my judgment, goes through these phases. The reporter or the producer comes up with an idea which he presents and the idea is turned down; he comes up with another idea and it is turned down; he comes up with a third idea and it is turned down. And by now he begins to see a pattern. Whenever he comes forward with an idea that somehow is disruptive of corporate interests a story gets killed, or the documentary never appears.

The second phase that he goes through is that he gets the ideas but he fails to propose them to his supervisors because he knows the ideas are going to be turned down.

The final stage he enters is when he no longer has the ideas. That really is the most dangerous phase. You then reach the stage when there is no need for censorship because the ideas are no longer even being thought of, let alone proposed.

However, this is a matter to which those of you who are in the political system here and those who are actually reporters and publishers can speak with greater authority than I have. All I have done is simply gather together the examples that I have come upon as a result of reporters talking candidly to me and as a result of my reading the articles and books that they have written about the problems they confront. Where else would I get the information except from the people within the industry themselves? But the three sources which I have cited, I think, along with the ABC-ITT opinion—especially the first dissent and the footnotes—are probably the best collection of horrible and damaging corporate involvement.

The Chairman: In the book you talk about possible solutions to the problems of concentration and you point out first of all that technological change is likely to increase the problem. You say: "Technological change"—and I am quoting you now—"...is likely to be changed to even greater concentration..." But you then suggest five solutions. I would like to ask you for a couple of comments in talking about solutions. You say:

"...it is clear to me that we simply must not tolerate the concentration of media ownership—except where concentration creates actual countervailing social benefits. These benefits cannot be merely speculative. They must be identifiable, demonstrable and genuinely weighty enough to offset the dangers inherent in concentration."

Could you give us an example of the kind of media concentration which there would be or could be countervailing social benefits?

Commissioner Johnson: Well, it is hard for me to think of the benefits but...

The Chairman: What did you have in mind there?

Commissioner Johnson: Well, what I had in mind was that it seems to me that one should be open-minded on this. I would start with the presumption that there ought not to be any concentration; that each outlet of opinion ought to be independently owned. Now if you are going to move from that position to a position of some concentration, it seems to me that the burden is on the person who wants it to demonstrate that he should be permitted to own more than one. But that should not be an insurmountable burden. He may very well be able to come up with reasons why the benefit to the public interest is substantial and clearly demonstrable, and the public will suffer some irremedial harm if he is not permitted to own more than one. If he can so demonstrate we ought to be prepared to have that measure of concentration.

However, it seems to me that that is where the burden ought to lie. At the present time, before the Federal Communications Commission the burden is rather the other way about. The unspoken implied presumption is that anyone who wants to merge ought to be permitted to do so unless Commissioner Johnson can come up with compelling reasons as to why it should not be approved. It just seems to me that is rather backwards, that's all.

The Chairman: You tend to dismiss the anti-trust laws as being helpful. You say that they can block concentration only when the threat is economic. Could you discuss that?

Commissioner Johnson: Well, in general the anti-trust laws are directed to economic concentration and problems in the marketplace. You can have the same kind of economic consequences from concentration in motion pictures or magazines or books or television or newspapers that you have in economic concentration in steel or automobiles or any other industry.

Basically the anti-competitive practices—higher prices, less technological innovation, tie-in agreements, and monopoly power of various kinds—can exist in these industries as well.

The point is that that is not really the problem, or at least it is not the first problem. We need to be concerned, it seems to me, about a great deal more than simply economic concentration. What we are concerned about is concentration in the marketplace of ideas. And there, it seems to me, at least for the United States, I want to see the greatest possible diversity and I am prepared to pay an economic price for that diversity. I mean, I am willing to forego the possible economic efficiencies that might come from only having one newspaper in the United States or only three national commercial networks.

The Chairman: You write off the anti-trust laws as being useful—I shouldn't say you write them off—you write them off in this context—you tend to dismiss the politician—you have a very colourful passage here. You describe—you say:

"Whenever the FCC stirs fitfully as if in wakefulness, the broadcasting industry scurries up the Hill for a congressional bludgeon. And the fact that roughly 60 per cent of all campaign expenses go to radio and television time gives but a glimmer of the power of broadcasting in the lives of senators and congressmen."

Well, if the government isn't going to give the lead where is it going to come from?

Commissioner Johnson: Well, the reason for the book, "How to Talk Back to Your Television Set," is to address that question, and I think, at least in the United States, ours is very much a do-it-yourself country and do-it-yourself government. We do have institutions that are responsive to pressures of all kinds not just to evil pressures, not just to the pressures of economic self-interest and corporate greed. But it is up to the people to organize and express their views and to utilize this legal machinery that is available and lie about rusting waiting to find somebody to push the start button.

The Chairman: If the president said to you "Commissioner Johnson, I am going to make you the head man of all broadcasting and communications in this whole area"...

Commissioner Johnson: That is such a preposterous assumption I find it impossible to address it.

Senator Prowse: They would lock you up!

Commissioner Johnson: Yes; me AND the President!

The Chairman: The question I was going to ask, and I won't even give it a preamble, if you were dealing with concentration would you propose only prospective standards or is the situation such that you would require divestiture of existing concentrations? That is perhaps a tough question.

Senator Prowse: It is a very good question.

Commissioner Johnson: No, I think it is a very appropriate question. It seems to me as our Justice Department advised the Federal Communications Commission, one simply must deal with divestiture if for no other reason that it's quite unfair, putting the public interest aside, it's quite unfair to those in the industry to permit some to have an economic advantage and to be locked into that economic advantage and exclude others from competing with them. I would think that you would want to put all on an equal footing in the United States, but you may very well have other considerations here.

The Chairman: Mr. Fortier?

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Johnson, when Mr. Henry, chairman of the Canadian Restrictive Trade Practices Commission, appeared before this committee, he recognized a problem which has also been encountered in the United States in trying to apply the marketplace anti-trust statutes, the Sherman and Clayton Acts in the States to the communications industry. It was the fact that the "wares" which were being offered for sale consisted of advertising and as long as there were no restrictions as to the number of advertising outlets, the Act could not be resorted to. Our Restrictive Trade Practices Commission in two of three instances where it looked at the concentration of ownership in newspapers, found the Act was useless. I gather that you in the States have encountered the same problem.

The question that we put to Mr. Henry was how are you going to evaluate whether or not a newspaper for example is doing a good job; whether a newspaper in its presentation, in its content, is serving the public interest. I ask you the question: how have you in the United States resolved that particular problem in seeking to prevent the concentration of ownership within either the newspaper field exclusively or within cross-communications media? Do you look at the program content for example with respect to television and radio? Do you look at the newspaper content and do you say is this what the public wants? Does this fare serve the public interest?

Commissioner Johnson: Well, you have asked me a number of questions there. Let me say, first of all, that we do have the problems to which you and I have both alluded with attempts to analyze the problems of concentration and control of the mass media within the classic anti-trust economic standards that tend to leave you to examinations of the advertising market. In the case of motion pictures and television product, you can also look at the impact upon the market for potential producers of programs. In newspapers you could look at the market for syndicated columnists and things of that sort. So there are other business aspects which one could address. And there have been some cases in the United States in which we have looked at the advertising and taken some action as a result. In general I would agree with you that we have to look beyond this, and that presumably is what the FCC "public interest" standard is supposed to be all about. This is supposed to enable the FCC to apply the standards in the anti-trust division.

Mr. Fortier: As you were asked on the program "Face The Nation" back in December—if there were more Nicholas Johnsons on the FCC, would the FCC work?

Commissioner Johnson: Oh, I don't know. I don't know what I responded on that particular occasion.

Mr. Fortier: I can give you your answer if you wish.

Commissioner Johnson: Well, please. I will see if I still believe it now.

Mr. Fortier: Well, you give me today's answer then I will tell you your answer.

The Chairman: Well, in fairness to the witness, I think we will have the December answer.

Senator Prowse: On the advice of counsel, don't answer!

Mr. Fortier: Is it the men or the system? "If there were more Nicholas Johnsons, would the FCC work in your view? Your answer was—"Well—" Continuing the interview, Mr. Herman asked:

"If you had a majority?" And you replied: "I think that historically it has been the case in most of the commissions that you have one or two, a minority, on the commission who speak out with some independence. That has historically been the case at the FCC. The difficulty at the FCC, with seven commissioners, a majority is four. And so on every issue the problem is, can you count up to four. And it's very difficult to do."

Commissioner Johnson: I think that tradition plays a heavy role in the quality of service and the character of service that you get from public officials. A nation could have a standard excellence in appointments where this is rewarded politically and is simply expected as a matter of course. But I think this depends in large measure on the public pressures that do exist on government—some organized unit within the society that is pressing for good government, representation of consumers, of taxpayers, of citizens, of viewers and whatnot, in order to bring balance into it. Sure it is possible and I am sure you have many examples here of agencies which you feel are functioning well, and in the public interest.

Mr. Fortier: We have our own supervisory and regulatory agency in the field of communications which is called the Canadian Radio and Television Commission which has only been in existence for two years now and it also had its predecessors. One of the problems which the CRTC has applied its mind to, and which is one I don't think the FCC has ever concerned its mind with, although if it has I would very much like you to correct me, and it has to do with the citizenship of the owner of communications media.

In Canada recently the CRTC acting on directions from above, meaning from the Canadian Cabinet, the Canadian Government, has said no one who is not a Canadian citizen may effectively own "more than 20 per cent of a broadcasting industry". This was particularly directed to CBS, RKO and Famous Players who controlled, particularly in the CATV field, an excessive amount of outlets of broadcasting media.

Do you as an American and one who is concerned with the communications media principally, although not exclusively in the United States of America, do you think that this is a valid approach for an agency such as the CRTC, or such as the FCC, to say insofar as ownership is concerned that we will only allow our nationals to effectively own our broadcasting industry?

Commissioner Johnson: That is a standard which is applied by the FCC as well. I would presume that this is a standard practice in most of the countries of the world.

Mr. Fortier: Has there ever been such a problem of that sort in the United States?

Commissioner Johnson: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: There has?

Commissioner Johnson: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: Could you give us instances?

Commissioner Johnson: Well, I am not sure I could, to tell you the truth.

Senator Prowse: The ITT and ABC was precisely that, wasn't it?

Commissioner Johnson: There was a problem back in the 1930's with regard to ITT's operation, and the suggestion was made that it was substantially controlled by foreign interests. We have a provision in our Act regarding ownership by U.S. citizens. Occasionally foreign corporations wish to hold licences for mobile radio equipment...

Mr. Fortier: Is there a provision made for minority equity interests by non-U.S. citizens?

Commissioner Johnson: Yes, I believe so.

The Chairman: A present example comes to my mind is Jack Kent Cook who had extensive radio holdings in Canada and now is a broadcaster in California, and I believe special legislation was passed through Congress...

Senator Prowse: Yes, to make him an American citizen.

The Chairman: Yes, Senator Prowse, I think that is right.

Mr. Fortier: That's right. Well, that is the ownership—that is the foreign ownership aspect. Now, as far as the content is concerned—in your paper prepared for the Trade Regulation Roundtable, Association of American Law Schools' Annual Convention in San Francisco, California, in December, '66, you refer to how content control was exercised, and you say that it was mainly exercised in five areas.

There was the direct content specification, the personnel policies, the financial policies, the anticipatory self-censorship, and the outside pressures on management. I was very curious to note that nowhere do you refer to the content control which could be exercised by the FCC. Why is that?

Commissioner Johnson: I suppose because it is so far from the experience of mortals. In other words, it would simply not have occurred to me.

Mr. Fortier: You one-hundredth of one percent content control that you referred to earlier...

Commissioner Johnson: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: This would be the infinitesimal area where there has been such a thing as content control by the FCC in the United States?

Commissioner Johnson: I would have to defer to you for any examples of anything that you would recall that would involve content control by the FCC.

Mr. Fortier: In view of what you refer to as bland television programs which is the common fare of television stations, why is it that you complain, you criticize and you do it very eloquently and very effectively, but I am forced to ask you the question: what has the FCC ever done to change the fare which is offered to the American viewer?

Commissioner Johnson: I think very little.

Mr. Fortier: And why is that?

Commissioner Johnson: Again, it comes back to the matter of political power of the industry.

Senator Prowse: And you terms of reference?

Commissioner Johnson: I beg your pardon?

Senator Prowse: And you terms of reference?

Commissioner Johnson: I guess I don't understand.

Senator Prowse: And the framework within which you exercise your authority?

Commissioner Johnson: No. I think basically the FCC has ample authority under the Communications Act to do anything that is not immoral. We have been established essentially to work "in the public interest", which is the phrase of Congress, and it seems to me that that authorizes us to do very nearly anything that seems reasonable and is not arbitrary and is grounded in some fact.

The Chairman: Mr. Fortier?

Mr. Fortier: Commissioner Johnson, your bland programs which are not censored as to content by the FCC, which are shown on our Canadian television stations, not only become bland programs, but they become U.S. programs; and this is where the CRTC has said "Aha, we must regulate the program content". As I am sure you are well familiar they have issued a proposal recently which would increase to 60%, the average of Canadian content on television during any given day and this would even include the prime-time period.

Now, as our Prime Minister has said, living next to the United States is like being in bed with an elephant—the elephant is far-reaching, particularly...

Commissioner Johnson: He has had a wide range of experience, hasn't he?

Mr. Fortier: Well, some others have been excluded, like Barbra Streisand!

The Chairman: May I suggest that Mr. Fortier and the witness get back to a discussion of mass media!

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Johnson, as a man so immersed in the field of communications, what are your views about a broadcasting regulatory and supervisory agency saying to its broadcasters "You must show national fare during a minimum 60% of the time"? Would you term this anti-Americanism or would you term this good policy?

Commissioner Johnson: I would term it neither. I would term it an area of public policy that lies well outside the jurisdiction of a United States Federal Communications Commissioner.

Mr. Fortier: Of that I am certain, but I am addressing the question to you as a man well-versed in the industry, not necessarily as a Commissioner.

Commissioner Johnson: Well, I am not sure that it is a matter that has anything to do whatsoever with the industry. I think it has all to do with the kind of Canada that you wish to build, and I think that is a matter about which only Canadians can know.

I, as a matter of law, would have no difficulty whatsoever justifying as within the jurisdiction of the FCC a comparable ruling by our agency. It is highly unlikely that we would ever be motivated to do so since well in excess of 100 per cent of our programming comes from American sources.

Senator Prowse: You would get into trouble if you tried it?

Commissioner Johnson: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: But you could be motivated into ruling: no more American westerns!

Senator Prowse: Oh, no!

Mr. Fortier: As an example.

Commissioner Johnson: Well, we have gone so far as to have the Surgeon-General enquire as to whether or not there should be no more programmes with violence, although that is not an honour that is limited to the western.

Senator Prowse: What would we do without Audie Murphy!

The Chairman: If I may—I am less interested in the regulatory powers of the CRTC vis-à-vis the FCC, then I am in the whole problem we have here. It is perhaps unfair to ask you to comment, but I am going to anyway. I know you well enough that you won't if you don't want to, but this whole are of Canadian content—were you going to pursue this part, Mr. Fortier?

Mr. Fortier: Well, I have received my non-committal answer.

The Chairman: As Mr. Fortier has said so well, the programming of which you are so critical is probably even more critical here because it is coming to us with respect, which you will appreciate, from a foreign country.

Commissioner Johnson: Yes.

The Chairman: I recall Mr. Johnson, the first time we met; it was a hot summer evening in Toronto and I remember one of the first things you said was that you were surprised to find out that on the publicly owned broadcasting system, the CBC, at 8 o'clock Sunday night—I suppose, the prime of all prime times—carries Ed Sullivan on the national network. You found that rather surprising.

Would you comment on that? Why did you find that so surprising?

Commissioner Johnson: Well, I don't like commenting on it.

The Chairman: I don't want to put you in an impossible position.

Commissioner Johnson: Well, I can comment as an American on what I value about the diversity that is offered by Canadian culture in North America. I happen to think that everybody benefits from diversity. I think that America is stronger and better for the differences that do exist here in Canada, and among those I would include the Canadian Film Board and its product of films and the men who have been trained under that programme who have done some marvellous work.

The instance you referred to follows upon a meeting I had with some CBC television people about programming and midway through that meeting I suggested that it might be useful if we looked at the programme log to see what in fact was on the air, and I was indeed rather shocked to discover that this Canadian institution was televising a rather substantial quantity of American programming, particularly in view of the fact that roughly 80 per cent of the Canadian population can watch American programming if it chooses to do so by watching it over the air from American stations.

We discussed that subject a bit that afternoon and I won't repeat the position of the CBC since that is something they should state if they choose to do so. But it seems to me that television is such an all-pervasive influence in every society that as an American official, I certainly would not feel myself in a position to take offence should the CRTC and the CBC and this Committee come to the conclusion that in order to develop, preserve and extend Canadian culture that you feel is obviously essential that the CBC engage in nothing but a televising of Canadian television products, because I don't know how you can have a society without a communication system, a mass communications system.

At the same time it seems to me that you might very well want to make it possible for people who live in Canada to have access to information from as many sources as possible.

American magazines are sold in Canada, American films are shown in Canada and unless you would wish to exclude American films and magazines and books it would at least be inconsistent to exclude television and permit the others to come in here.

I enjoy, for example, listening to CBC radio in Washington, D.C., at night. I get a skywave signal from CBL Toronto quite regularly and occasionally one out of Montreal, and I find it quite enjoyable radio, quite frankly.

However, this is a matter that ultimately you will have to address. It is not your task, after all, to serve my desire for diversity and the opportunity to listen and to watch something different than I am able to get from my American stations.

The Chairman: Mr. Fortier?

Mr. Fortier: Much of the criticism, and you have been discussing a personal opinion, you validly direct to the programme content of American television stations. Would not much of it have been answered if your government had seen fit to create what we call in Canada a national broadcasting system subsidized by the state?

Commissioner Johnson: Well, as you know we now have a Corporation of Public Broadcasting, so-called, which holds the potential for developing into that kind of a system.

Senator Prowse: Is that for ETV or is it general?

Commissioner Johnson: Well, let me say a word about the system.

We have now about 190 educational television stations, but some of these are in fact owned by community groups and others are owned by school systems or universities.

There is a programming service known as National Educational Television, NET, which distributes programmes for a general audience which these stations broadcast in the evening. Many if not most of them during the day provide instructional programming to be received within school classrooms and used as part of the teaching materials.

Recently this year we have added the programme "Sesame Street", which some of you may be familiar with, which is designed to teach reading and arithmetic to pre-school children in the home. It has been a fantastic success and is without question, I think, the best undertaking whatever of public broadcasting in the United States and has had a marked impact already in a few months on the general educational level of those 20 million Americans who are under 5 years of age. It has had a very, very dramatic impact.

We now have a live network during the week in the evening to permit these stations to interconnect, at least many of them can to do this.

The Ford Foundation has provided most of the funding up until now for this system. We had an Educational Television Facilities Act in the early sixties which provided funds for the building of the stations but as yet we have had great difficulty with coming up with any significant quality of funding for the development of programming itself.

The Chairman: What about the idea of the government network?

Commissioner Johnson: That has never been held in much favour in the United States. There is concern about government control of the media as it is, although some have expressed the view that as long as you are getting government propaganda anyway how much better it would be to get it from a government station than to get it from NBC, and there is something to be said for that view.

The Chairman: Mr. Fortier?

Mr. Fortier: You have alluded to factors which have caused the disappearance of many newspapers as well as the merger of others in some of the larger cities.

Do you envisage that these same factors may come into play in the field of electronic media and consequently work against your utopian view of only one media to be owned by one person in one community?

Commissioner Johnson: Well, I think the concept of the common carrier cable television system really is a whole new ball game, because then, you see, it would be possible for essentially any individual who wanted to put on a programme on a one-shot basis or on a one-programme a week basis to in effect have his own television station.

The Supreme Court in the Red Lion decision this past year has urged what has been characterized as the public right of access to the mass media.

Senator Prowse: What were the facts in that case?

Commissioner Johnson: That particular case involved specifically the constitutionality of the fairness doctrine. The Supreme Court ruled that the fairness doctrine was constitutional. The broadcasters had contended that it was not.

But in the course of passing on the constitutionality...

The Chairman: Would you like more of the facts?

Senator Prowse: No. I am going to say that I would like to ask one more question on that.

The Chairman: Yes, certainly.

Senator Prowse: The fairness doctrine is the one that calls for the provision of equal time to dissenting views, is that correct?

Commissioner Johnson: Forgive me, I should have provided some explanation.

Senator Prowse: ... or am I wrong?

Commissioner Johnson: You gentlemen are much more familiar in general than most Americans would be with our practices in this regard, but it is a rather complicated area. There are really three doctrines; the fairness doctrine, the equal opportunity doctrine, and the personal attack doctrine.

The equal opportunity doctrine applies only in political contests, and it provides that if you put on a candidate for one party you then have undertaken the responsibility to provide an equal opportunity for his opponent. That may not involve equal time because it is a function of what time of the day he is put on as well as how many minutes he has and so forth.

The fairness doctrine is all encompassing. There are some instances in which it involves political contests because there are some exceptions to the equal opportunity doctrine such as newscasts. The fairness doctrine would also cover newscast coverage of political candidates. The fairness doctrine provides in general that whenever a station deals with what we call a "controversial issue of public importance" that the station has the obligation to treat that issue fairly, which means to provide an opportunity for all points of view with regard to that issue to be expressed at some time, not necessarily within the same programme.

The personal attack doctrine provides that when you go after an individual or a small group of individuals, some identifiable group, that you have an obligation to let them know, to give them personally an opportunity to reply, if they in some way have been attacked on your station.

This is distinguished from the fairness doctrine which does not impose upon the broadcaster the obligation to give any given individual a right to reply, but only an obligation that the point of view be expressed perhaps by a member of his own staff.

The Chairman: What were the facts in the Red Lion case, do you recall?

Commissioner Johnson: This rose out of MacIntyre's operation in Media, Pennsylvania, in an attack on Fred Cook. The station was contesting that it was unconstitutional to require them to treat this matter fairly or to give him an opportunity to reply to the personal attack or whatever was involved.

Senator Prowse: Who is MacIntyre and Fred Cook?

Commissioner Johnson: MacIntyre is a broadcaster who prepares programmes, and also owns this station, that are of such character as generally to fall within the fairness doctrine and require an opportunity for others to reply—or at least this is the contention that is often made. Fred Cook was an author whom MacIntyre presumably characterized in some way thought by Cook to be unfair.

The Chairman: Senator McElman, you had a question?

Senator McElman: It wasn't a supplementary, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: Well, go ahead.

Senator McElman: Mr. Johnson, in Canada the CRTC when it is considering an application for a new license takes into account—I believe it is required to take into account not just the prospective economic viability of the applicant but the economic viability of the existing broadcaster in that market area, and the decisions as they have been handed down bear this out.

Now, tied with that, if there were not some limit upon groups or chains, as they are called, as to the extent in which they could build up a strength and members in their chain, what would you see as the end run of such a dual situation?

The Chairman: Do you understand the question?

Commissioner Johnson: I am not sure that I do.

The Chairman: Well, Senator McElman will put it again, I think.

Senator McElman: Well, economic viability of licensees—there is a protection of a market area for existing licensees?

Commissioner Johnson: Yes, sir. I believe I understand the basis of your question, but I am not sure exactly what the question is.

Senator McElman: There is developing in this country greater strength in the chains or groups.

Commissioner Johnson: Yes.

Senator McElman: If that continues—if the private broadcasters and radio and television continues to be gobbled up by chains what would you see as the end run of that in a nation of this size?

Commissioner Johnson: It seems to me gain, forgive me, as it may be the lateness of the afternoon, but I am not sure that I understand the relationship between the first part of your question and the second.

Are you asking me what is the ultimate consequence of continued and increasing media concentration? If so, then I don't understand what relationship that has to your doctrine about the competition in the marketplace and the economic viability of an operation.

Did you mean to relate those two in your question?

Senator McElman: Indeed I did.

The Chairman: You don't think they do relate?

Senator Prowse: I don't quite understand them.

Senator McElman: Well, let me put it in the other context. In the United States as I understand it, this isn't a pre-requisite in our licensing?

Commissioner Johnson: That is correct. That is the short answer and the longer answer is much more complicated.

Senator McElman: And the end effect is that a new broadcaster can move into a market area, and if he has dollars, he can compete with the bigests of the chains, he can provide if he will a different type of programming that will cut into the market, he can rise from a non-viable situation through competition, effective hard-nosed competitive programming so that he does become viable.

He can in effect become viable and the other station, even though it has the strength of a chain, can become less viable?

Commissioner Johnson: Yes, that is correct.

Senator McElman: Do you see with the two, which I think I have now tied together, a danger of a system that demands prelicensing consideration of viability? Do you see it holding out prospective broadcasters...

The Chairman: Holding out—you mean shutting out.

Senator McElman: Shutting out, and the chains building to such a strength that they can literally close out competition?

Commissioner Johnson: I would think that a distinct possibility, yes. By contrast, as you have indicated, we tend to be somewhat less concerned about the economic competitive impact of a new station in a community if the frequencies are available.

By and large we have created a system with, as I indicated, 7,500 operating entities which is a rather significant number, a system in which virtually all of the frequencies have been assigned to someone.

One of the prices we pay for that however, it should be noted, to keep the matter in perspective, is that with all this added programming, if it can be called that, I am not confident that the public is getting all that much more in the way of diversity.

Many of these marginal operators do not even have a wire service of any kind in their stations, let alone a new programme.

The Chairman: And yet you still license them?

Commissioner Johnson: Yes, that is another problem. They are the ones that most often fall into problems: painting the antenna towers and keeping the engineers on duty. They are often engaged in over-commercialization practices and their programming is certainly not distinguished and yet on balance I support the Commission on this particular policy because basically I believe in competition and a competitive situation for the reasons you have stated.

It does permit, in addition to all the dreck, it does permit the possibility of someone coming in who will offer a superior service and being able to make his way to the top, and I much prefer competition to protectionism myself, even though I recognize the price that one pays for it.

Senator McElman: Then even with the experience that you have you would still hold to the practice of the FCC rather than that of the CRTC?

Commissioner Johnson: Well again I would qualify it by saying I don't really know the conditions that prevail here and I presume that the CRTC has good reasons for what it is doing, but within the United States, yes, I would certainly continue to support our policy there.

The Chairman: Mr. Fortier?

Mr. Fortier: You were quoted as saying Commissioner Johnson, again from this Face the Nation excerpt:

"Network officials are keeping off the television screens anything they find inconsistent with their corporate profits or personal philosophies."

In reading your paper presented last December I certainly see what you meant by it but I think it would be useful for the members of this Committee if you would expand on this all-inclusive statement.

Commissioner Johnson: Well, I would be happy to.

As you will know from reading the transcript, Mike Wallace on that occasion pursued this question at some length.

Mr. Fortier: Yes, he did.

Commissioner Johnson: In fact, the quote reads as follows—it is on page 82 now of "How to Talk Back to your Television Set": "For at the same time that network officials can"—and I emphasize "can"—"keep off your television screen anything they find inconsistent with their corporate profits or personal philosophies..."

That sentence continues to explain that while they are in a position to do this, the FCC has in fact been "defending their First amendment rights" which is the point that that paragraph goes on to develop.

What the assertion consisted of was not the all-inclusive assertion that network officials were keeping off the air every single thing that they opposed. It was rather the assertion that they had the power to do this should they ever decide to exercise that power, which I then went on to document that they have on numerous occasions done.

This particular piece engendered quite an exchange, as you probably know. Dick Salant of CBS Television News responded with an article in TV Guide entitled "He has exercised his right—to be wrong" in the September 20th, 1969 issue, and I responded in turn with a letter to the editor in the September 27th issue of TV Guide and the Radio and Television News Directors Association piece which I referred to earlier on September 26th, 1969, and anybody wishing to pursue the matter really ought to read Mr. Salant's attack on me and my responses.

As I made clear there, my principal complaint is simply what is not appearing in prime time entertainment programming. It is not just that individual items have been proposed and then censored by management.

Mr. Fortier: It is a stifling of creativity in the TV programming?

Commissioner Johnson: Well, it's more than stifling of creativity, that's another problem. That is why the stuff that is on in prime time that is entertainment isn't any good as entertainment...

Mr. Fortier: Well, that is all part of it.

Commissioner Johnson: ...because the creativity has been stifled. But the corporate censorship point relates to the fact while you are putting on entertainment of whatever quality you are not giving the people information that they need about the affairs of their times that are important to them, and that that too constitutes a form of censorship.

I think it is important in this connection to keep this in its proper perspective. It is reported that Mr. Tweed in New York once offered the New York Times $5 million to kill a particular story. The Times refused the offer, it should be noted parenthetically.

The point is simply that if it was worth $5 million to kill a single story, 50 or 100 years ago, it clearly is worth that much today to buy a television station. It is not necessary to control everything that appears in the news papers. It is only necessary to have the potential to do that on those occasions that may arise, perhaps only maybe two or three times a year.

Senator Prowse: Like an insurance policy?

Commissioner Johnson: Yes, that is right. It is a very cheap insurance policy. The Dominican Republic offered the Mutual Broadcasting System, a radio network in the United States—oh, I don't recall the precise figure but I think it was on the order of a million dollars—to give them a guaranteed number of minutes per month on news programming which they could fill with propaganda from the Dominican Republic.

The point is, you can't put a dollar value on the potential to keep items off or to put them on, and after Dick Salant's proud boast that CBS has never altered its content while he worked there, Variety reported in a long stora series of documentaries which had been very substantially altered by CBS in the course of preparation.

Again, my principal point is that television is failing to do its job; that, for whatever reason, it is keeping material off the air that the American people need to have. Whether they are doing that out of a malicious awareness that they are deliberately depriving the people of the information they need is not really the point. The point is that whatever the motive, the result is the same as if that was what they were doing. There are instances of deliberate withholding.

The story was told to me by one of the leading black announcers in the United States of his first job with a station in the Carolinas. He was handed a stack of 40 records and told that he would play them.

He asked if it would be permissible for him to report five minutes of news on the hour and the owner of the station told him "You are not going to educate the negroes of this community at my expense."

Well, there is a deliberate effort. But when you fill the airways in prime time with nothing but pap, one of the consequences is that the people do not find out anything that they want to know.

Mr. Fortier: You have what I find to be a very excellent quote in your paper on this point which may be reproduced in your book.

You say, and I quote, "To verify this, ask yourself how many controversial programmes ever reach the roughly 100 hours a week of network prime time programming."

Then you go on "How many programmes have you seen that seriously deal with abortion, brutal military weaponry, sympathetic attempts to understand the Black Panthers' world, police brutality toward minority groups, oppression in draft boards in high schools, the Justice Department's attitude toward dissent, a slowdown of the administration's protection of civil rights, conflicts of interests by congressmen, anti-consumer lobbying by large corporations, racism, venereal disease, sexual problems of the unmarried and so on"—that is what you are saying?

Commissioner Johnson: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: Let me ask you the question: In the United States how many such controversial programmes have you seen?

Commissioner Johnson: Well, as one might guess from the selection of that particular list, I think the answer would either be none or next to none.

By and large the prime time programming, and you are familiar with it here, is made up in bulk of series programmes that come on regularly every week with the exception of NBC's "First Tuesday" and CBS's "CBS Reports" and "60 Minutes", entertainment specials, and sort of mindless, so-called documentaries.

The Chairman: I turn now to Senator Prowse, but I would like to mention to the Senators that I would like to adjourn in about ten minutes.

Senator Prowse?

Senator Prowse: I would like to come back to the area that we were in before if I may. I agreed, I think that everybody is agreed, that we are not getting from TV today what is we think we ought to get whether or not we expect too much.

And I think we are agreed also that the reasoning for this is because of the structure of the industry. It is necessary that a broadcaster produce listeners in order that he can sell his advertising time. This is one of the facts of life I believe, isn't it?

Commissioner Johnson: Of course.

Senator Prowse: That we are living with today?

Commissioner Johnson: Certainly.

Senator Prowse: And in the foreseeable future we will probably have to continue to live with?

Commissioner Johnson: Yes.

Senator Prowse: Now, in the face of that situation have you any suggestion at all as to how we may be able to persuade the industry to provide the people with a better type of programming than they are getting?

Commissioner Johnson: I have addressed this problem because it seems to me to need to harness reform to the profit system for your very largely tilting windmills.

One way you can restructure institutions is by establishing something like the public broadcasting corporation, and here the CBC, with whatever additional changes or funding or what-not you may wish to consider.

Because as I understand it the CBC is also receiving advertising revenue...

Senator Prowse: Approximately...

Commissioner Johnson: 40 million...

Senator Prowse: Of a budget of $200 million. About 20 per cent.

The Chairman: Yes, roughly 20 per cent.

Commissioner Johnson: Sometimes that 20 per cent becomes the tail that wags the dog, however.

Senator Prowse: Yes.

Commissioner Johnson: But that of course is a problem, that is something you know more about than I.

The other thing that you can do and which I have been proposing in the States is to change the rules of the game slightly, but for all participants at the same time, so that no one is affected in a way different from his competitors.

I have proposed what I call the one-third time rule because we happen to have three commercial networks.

The one-third time rule would provide that each of the three commercial networks must provide during prime time one-third of its programming that would be something other than the lowest-common-denominator-commercially-laden entertainment fare that we now get.

You can't just ask Frank Stanton of CBS, "Won't you please put out some better programmes." We really can't under the institutional constraints within which he is compelled to function. He has a board of directors, he has shareholders, and he has an obligation to maximize profits. He can engage in tokenism, and he does, and they put out some good programmes, but he can't really do much beyond that unless someone will establish standards.

But if we were to establish the one-third time rule across the board, each of the networks would be equal and I think that there would be many benefits to the industry that would result from this. They would be able to recruit into the industry some of the young people who are now leaving in droves. They would take care of the morale problem they have within their institutions.

Many of the best documentary producers in America are sitting about idle now because they have no work to do,—and this would give them something to do and it would get the American public and government off the backs of the networks. It would make the network executives feed better about themselves—which is not an insignificant manner for them personally I would think in terms of their knowledge of the evil that they are doing in our society.

You might provide for example—let us just take 7.30 to 10.30—because that works out to three hours which means one hour per network per evening, and we put a responsibility on the networks to come up with seven hours of programming a week which was either non-sponsored or institutionally-sponsored.

It could be entertainment, because it must be interesting if people are to watch it...

Senator Prowse: Yes.

Commissioner Johnson: ...but something other than the kind of programming that the commercial sponsorship generally produces: educational, cultural, live drama, public affairs, things of that kind.

This would mean that in any given hour during prime time, because it would be required that this programming be staggered—at any given hour of prime time everyone would have a choice. He would still have a choice of two networks providing him with lowest common denominator entertainment fare, so nobody is telling him what he has to watch. He not only has a choice, but he has a choice of two that are providing that kind of stuff. But he also has a choice of something else, and I think that something like that proposal is going to be absolutely essential for our country.

Now, what form it ultimately takes I couldn't say.

Mr. Fortier: Peter Seeger also has a proposal which comes close to your one-third ratio. I think it would be interesting if you expand upon it briefly.

Commissioner Johnson: Well, he has proposed a system that would almost involve voting on the part of individual viewers—the allocation of their time to various programmes—and which would compete for their time to a particular programme which would be another way of sort of simulating subscription television market-place audience response mechanism.

The Chairman: Senator Prowse?

Senator Prowse: The programmes that we watch and we get—they are what I would probably think are the best of your programmes from the network—they find their way on to ours...

The Chairman: "The Beverly Hillbillies" and "Ed Sullivan"...

Senator Prowse: Well, there is Dr. Welby—there is a number of programmes that come through, but are these produced by the network or are these produced by individual producers?

The point I am getting at is, who produces the programmes? Is it the network, the stations, or does somebody else come up with it then sells them?

Commissioner Johnson: The short answer is that they are produced by the networks. That, however, is so short as to be totally inaccurate except it is a fair response to what you're asking.

Many of the programmes are produced in Hollywood by production companies of one kind or another, but because the networks are virtually the sole purchasers of their product, they in fact exercise virtual dictatorial control over the product from the selection of the writer to the final finished product, the financing of the enterprise and every other aspect of it.

So it is really a legal technicality as to whether the programme was in fact produced by the network or it was in fact produced by some so-called independent party.

Senator Prowse: There really isn't much competition—in a creative production there isn't really too much competition. What you do is that you get a contract with a producer and the stations enter into contracts with the producers...

Commissioner Johnson: Well, the networks...

Senator Prowse: Yes, the networks.

The Chairman: I am going to give Senator McElman the last question.

Senator McElman: Mr. Johnson, let me pose a hypothetical question to you.

If a situation developed in order to find out what the teeth of the FCC are, how Justice would enter a situation, your Department of Justice. If you had a situation in one of the smaller states of your union where a conglomerate effectively controlled a large percentage of the economy of that state, ownership of media and in every important area of that economy—transportation, manufacturing, business, financing and so on, and that conglomerate acquired all of the daily newspapers in that state, better than half or the television broadcast reach-through stations and radio as well, would there be the teeth in the FCC to rectify that situation? Would it feel it should be rectified, first? Would it have the teeth to it? And if it did not, would the Department of Justice move in on such a situation?

Commissioner Johnson: I think the answer to all of your questions is yes.

We have had situations like that with Anacosta copper controlling publishing in Montana and with the Dupont Company's control of publishing in Delaware, and there is no question in my mind that that kind of a situation ought to be removed and that there is ample authority for the FCC or the Justice Department to take action in cases like that.

Senator McElman: Both have enough teeth to do it?

Commissioner Johnson: I think so, yes.

Senator Prowse: Without proving...

The Chairman: I don't want to limit questioning, but Senator Bourque has a question, Senator Sparrow has a question—I will take those two questions and then we really must adjourn in fairness to the witness.

Senator Sparrow: In reference to prime time, the witness stated that TV has altered, referring I believe to American people, the eating habits and sleeping habits and sex habits...

The Chairman: I am not sure that he mentioned sex habits.

Senator Sparrow: Yes, I believe he did.

I was only going to comment that I think probably he has changed our eating habits and our sleeping habits but I am not so sure about the third!

Mr. Fortier: You are not concerned about the first two, are you!

Senator Sparrow: How do you determine prime time? When you refer to prime time—we say we want Canadian content in prime time, and so on—if it is being altered, which comes first, the prime time or the programme as such?

If Ed Sullivan now is prime time at 8 o'clock is it prime time because of the Ed Sullivan show? If he was on at 4 o'clock in the afternoon would that be prime time?

Commissioner Johnson: We define prime time in terms of those hours when most people are watching. Those hours when most people are watching, it turns out, is determined more by the time people have available to watch television than by whatever may happen to be on the set at the time.

Any programme shown between 7 and 11 p.m. is going to get a larger audience than any programme shown between 2 and 5 p.m. That may be an overstatement but not by much.

Certainly the Ed Sullivan show at 8 p.m. is going to get a larger audience than the Ed Sullivan show at 3 p.m. Mason Williams has said, "Television ought to leave you alone during the day when you have work to do." It doesn't, but most people continue to work and they are not watching television.

It is prime because this is the time the advertisers want; it is the time when people are watching and basically what we do is look at a curve showing the growth and diminution of the total audience throughout the afternoon and evening hours and we find that there is a great increase in the audience around 7 to 8 p.m. which holds fairly firm until about 10, 10.30 or 11 o'clock, at which point there seems to be a dropping off.

Senator Sparrow: If you change the programming, will you drastically change those eating and sleeping habits and the time they would in fact watch that programme?

For instance, if you put on educational TV an educational programme at 8 o'clock or in prime time, where a small percentage of people would in fact view it because it is not the kind of entertainment they may be looking for, are you suggesting it could change the total habits of the people, that they in fact would watch entertainment in the afternoon?

Commissioner Johnson: I am not sure I understand your question.

The Chairman: I think what Senator Sparrow is suggesting—that supposing the Ed Sullivan Show was moved to 4 o'clock Sunday afternoon and ran a historical programme on Sunday evening at 8 o'clock I think he is asking: would the audience switch to 4 o'clock and Ed Sullivan?

Senator Prowse: Would that make it prime time in the afternoon?

The Chairman: Yes, I think that is the question.

Commissioner Johnson: Well,—I mean, we are defining it in terms of itself. In my definition, prime time is that time when most people are watching and by historical experience that time when most people are watching is between 7 and 11 p.m.

If through some fluke some extraordinary programme, popular programme, were to be scheduled at 6 o'clock in the morning or 3 o'clock in the afternoon...

Senator Prowse: Like a moon shot!

Commissioner Johnson: ...and suddenly more people were watching at that hour than at any other hour during the day, that presumably would be included as prime time, and the advertisers would want it and the rates would go up and so forth.

Senator Sparrow: If you wanted this particular educational programme you may have to switch it to 8 o'clock and when that became no longer prime time, switch it back to 3 o'clock.

Radio used to be the prime time in the evening now it is prime time in the morning—it was forced into that position, is that correct?

Commissioner Johnson: Yes. Radio's biggest audience now comes in what we call the drive time, since radio in large measure is listened to in the automobile.

Senator Sparrow: Because it was forced off probably by television.

Commissioner Johnson: Well, essentially more people watch television in the evening than listen to the radio.

The Chairman: Senator Bourque has a question.

Senator Bourque: I would like to ask Mr. Johnson. On page 12 of his brief, he says:

"I am not just talking about political and social dissatisfaction with the media. I am not just complaining that those things I would like to see in the media are ignored. I am saying that the media of the United States is failing when, for example, one contrasts all the rich, wonderful diversity of a nation the size of ours with the very little diversity that appears on television."

Does that mean that there is discrimination?

Now, you don't need to answer if it is going to hurt your situation...

Commissioner Johnson: Well, I would be happy to answer anything.

By discrimination do you mean racial discrimination?

Senator Bourque: Well, any kind—religious...

The Chairman: I think he means essentially racial discrimination.

Commissioner Johnson: I would certainly not mean to exclude racial discrimination and that is a subject which I have addressed at great length in a series of speeches that I gave during 1967 and 68.

It was my view and also, I should note, that of the Kerner Commission, that the mass media has simply not been doing the job of employment of blacks, the whole tale of the life of the black community in America, of bringing the information to the white community that it should have been doing, so it is not a subject that I have stayed away from in any manner.

However, in this particular passage I was not really addressing that so much as the totality of television's failure to deal with all of the special needs and interests of the American people.

The black community is one minority group that is not being adequately served by television, but it is no more and no less than all the other minority groups of roughly equivalent size.

I mentioned this afternoon the young people under five constitute almost as many Americans as black Americans. Senior citizens over 65 constitute a group of equivalent size, students in schools constitute a group of almost twice the size, blue collar workers of 7 million.

There is really very little on prime time television that directs itself in a meaningful and productive and constructive way to the day to day lives of people who are watching in ways that they would find compelling and useful and the ways that they would find personally related to their needs and interests.

That is really what I am complaining about, particularly when you compare the diversity of television or the absence of diversity on television with the existence of diversity in the other media. Magazines, theatre, recorded music and so on and so forth which seem to be doing a much better job of giving an accurate portrayal, a more representative portrayal of the United States than television does.

I might just say one word before we break about the impact on television upon the national agenda.

Mr. Fortier and I were talking about this earlier because one of the best examples I think of this relates to corporate censorship problems, the black lung disease issue.

Virtually all the coal miners in America have black lung in one stage of development or another. This comes from going into the mine and breathing coal dust. Your lungs disintegrate as a result of this and you are unable to get to the oxygen you need and you find yourself unemployable by the time you reach your middle years.

The miners really didn't know about black lung disease because nobody had ever told them about it and there was no great desire on the part of coal mining companies or the mass media in the coal mining district to make a big issue out of this.

Indeed, there were instances where programmes were prepared by doctors about black lung which the television stations positively refused to run. I pointed this fact out when talking to the Violence Commission, making the point that while censorship was going to be raised by the industry in opposition to what the Violence Commission was doing that in fact the industry itself had participated in censorship and shortly thereafter there was a sudden rush of interest on the part of television in covering the black lung problem in West Virginia.

About two weeks after they started covering it regularly some 35,000 coal miners in West Virginia came out of the mines for the first time really in the history of that state and organized on their own because this particular instance the union had been in basic agreement with the coal mine operators.

They marched on the state capital and got the first Workmen's Compensation legislation in the history of the state for black lung disease.

Now, what is the point I am making? The point I am making is that when you keep this information out of prime time that produces a result in the society. The result it produces is apathy, lethargy, ignorance and the failure of the society to respond to its problems.

If you point out in prime time television that most American business executives eat and rather grandly by going into a restaurant, ordering all they want to eat, signing a little slip of paper where half of the cost will be paid for by the American people as taxpayers, the other half will be paid for by the American people as consumers, and none of it whatsoever is paid for by the executive, and point out the incongruity in a nation arguing that a policy of this kind is only administratively feasible if it is applied to an elite group of rich but it would of course be impossible to permit the poor to feed themselves by signing a slip of paper requiring the cost to be paid for by others.

If you point that out on prime time television things happen in the United States. You start feeding the hungry.

You point out on prime time television that the American subsidized merchant marine is consuming some 700 million dollars a year in a programme that every independent economic who has ever examined it has concluded that it has absolutely no economic benefit whatsoever to the American people and there will be a response.

If you point out that General Motors is responsible not only for the lion's share of 50,000 unnecessary deaths every year on the highways of the United States but is also responsible for 50 per cent of all the air pollution by tonnage in the entire country and there will be cries for reform. If you keep that information off either because you sent an intra-corporate memorandum saying General Motors is a big advertiser therefore we don't want to mention this or because you don't send the memorandum—you just put on the Beverly Hillbillies—you keep that information off and that produces a result as well.

As I have commented, I think NBC can rightfully take some credit and pride in the fact that the West Virginia legislature enacted that legislation.

I think Rowan and Martin's "Laugh-In" can take some pride in what has happened as a result of the Flying Fickle Finger of Fate Award. They pointed out that the California legislature had authorized used car dealers to turn back speedometers and within a month thereafter that legislation was repealed. They pointed out the school system that had failed to appropriate any money for schools for the next year and shortly thereafter the community came up with the money to keep the school system going.

They can point with pride to these achievements but when they do they must realize that they must also then take responsibility for those things in our society that have not been changed because they have for whatever reason said nothing about it to the American people.

That is the position of this industry in our society in the United States and it is why I believe with President Kennedy—the late President Kennedy—that with great power goes great responsibility, and this is an industry that has failed to live up to that responsibility and it is going to have to pay the price of failing to do so.

The Chairman: Perhaps I could conclude most effectively, Mr. Johnson, by quoting very briefly from the book. In the introduction you say:

"Very few of the American people are performing at more than five per cent of their capacity—their capacity to perceive, to produce, to understand, to create, to relate to others, to experience joy."

Certainly you have demonstrated today that you are indeed one of the 5 per cent. Your reputation preceded you both to the Committee and to our personal meeting last summer.

I have always been and continue to be greatly impressed by your courage and by your progressive, optimistic and enthusiastic approach to some enormous problems.

I said at the beginning that you are one of the busiest people I know. We realize that it is a great imposition to bring you here, which makes us doubly grateful.

It occurs to me that at the end of your introduction you may very well be speaking to this committee when you write in part "What you hold here are the words. They have piled up. In articles, opinions, testimony and speeches. Whether or not men do things remains to be seen. The need is clear—some of the methods are at hand—it's up to you."

Thank you very much for helping us.

Mr. Johnson: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman, for inviting me here.

Whereupon the meeting adjourned.

THE SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE ON MASS MEDIA

EVIDENCE

Ottawa, Wednesday, March 18, 1970

The Special Senate Committee on Mass Media met this day at 10 a.m.

Senator Keith Davey (Chairman) in the Chair.

The Chairman: Honourable Senators, if I may call this session to order. Perhaps before we turn to this morning's brief I could be allowed to read a short self-explanatory announcement.

The fact that Vancouver has been without its daily newspaper service since February 15 is of great interest and concern to the members of this committee.

"Clearly the labour dispute which, to begin with is within provincial jurisdiction, does not fall within the Committee's terms of reference which are ownership and control as well as the impact and influence of the Canadian mass media. Needless to say the Committee has no intention of injecting itself into the collective bargaining process.

"At the same time, however, the Committee is obviously interested in what impact this loss of newspaper service is having on Canada's third largest city. Accordingly we asked Mr. Walter Gray, a former Parliamentary Gallery Bureau Chief for both the Globe and Mail and the Toronto Daily Star, to go to Vancouver and prepare for the Committee, an 'on-the-spot' analysis of the socio-economic effects of the absence of two daily newspapers in greater Vancouver. Mr. Gray spent last week in Vancouver. He will present his report to a special session of this Committee which I have called for 10 o'clock tomorrow morning in room 260 north."

The witnesses this morning and the brief we are going to receive is from the Reader's Digest Association (Canada) Ltd. and also Sélection du Reader's Digest (Canada) Ltée. In welcoming you Mr. Zimmerman and the members of your team, which I will introduce in a moment, I should remind the Senators that this session was originally scheduled, as you may recall, for February 20. At the time you, sir, were hospitalized. We are delighted that you are now able to come — we are sorry you weren't able to come earlier but I am sure nothing has been lost and we are delighted that you are here today.

Mr. Zimmerman, is seated on my immediate right, and I think what I might do Mr. Zimmerman is perhaps let you begin your remarks in a moment or two and introduce the other members of your group rather than me doing it now. The procedure we follow here, sir, is very simple and I am sure you are familiar with it. The brief which you prepared for us was received in advance, indeed in advance of the former date; it was circulated and read and studied by the Senators at that time and probably most of us have re-read it in the last several weeks.

We are going to ask you to make a brief opening oral statement in which you can explain your brief, expand upon it, add to it, say anything else which may or may not be on your mind and then we will turn to our questioning. We will question you on the contents of your written brief, on the contents of your oral statement, and indeed on other matters which you may not raise in either of your briefs. As I have said to many other witnesses, if you wish to refer any of the questions that we ask you to any of your colleagues, please feel free to do so. Welcome, and we are delighted that you are finally here.

Mr. E. P. Zimmerman, President, The Reader's Digest Association (Canada) Ltd.: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Honourable Senators, I would like to say today, and identified by name tags, we have Mr. Andrew J. Conduit who is sitting on my immediate right against the wall next to the chart who is our Vice President and Advertising Director. Mr. J. Kenneth Davey who is sitting just two removed on my right is our Vice-President and Secretary. Mr. Ralph Hancox, the Managing Editor for the English edition of the Reader's Digest is sitting on Senator Davey's left. Mr. Pierre Ranger who is Managing Editor of Sélection du Reader's Digest is on the far end of the rostrum here, and also two of our Canadian Directors—Mr. John L. O'Brien, Q.C., and Mr. Jean Martineau, Q.C.

May I say at the outset that I very much appreciate the thoughts expressed by Senator Davey and for your having postponed our appearance until today. I unfortunately was in hospital, as Senator Davey has referred to, on February 20, the date previously set, but I am glad to say that now I am well and on the way to recovery.

We would like to spend a few minutes reviewing with you some matters which may prove of particular interest to your deliberations, and which will supplement the information you have already received in our written brief.

The Reader's Digest in Canada has a determined Canadian policy which springs from its editorial and business responsibilities as a corporate citizen of Canada. As you will have noted from our brief, three of our directors and all of our employees are Canadian citizens or landed immigrants, and all our employees are pretty well represented by that statement in the sense of citizenship. Thirty per cent of the Digest's common stock in Canada is held by Canadians. The company acts as a Canadian corporation in every way. The company and its employees are active supporters of charity, and participate fully in community endeavours.

We contribute significantly to the Canadian economy since more than 90 cents of every dollar of revenue stays in Canada. Through our influence on other Digest affiliates, the Digest is an exporter for Canada, on balance, in such things as paper, and published material. As a matter of interest, annual paper purchases in Canada by our international editions amount to $840,000 (or some 3,500 tons) and represent 43 per cent of the total Canadian export tonnage of this particular type of paper.

To support our operations, we employ 450 people in Canada and indirectly generate employment for twice that number. Among our skilled employees are 53 editorial, art and production experts, 70 programmers, and computer personnel, and 81 sales and marketing specialists. The company has a continuing editorial and management development policy to develop editorial and business techniques. We have kept our long-term employees abreast of technology so that they, in turn, can train junior staff.

As you are aware, magazine publishing in Canada is highly competitive. It is in vigorous competition for advertising revenue with television, newspaper supplements, and daily newspapers, in that order of importance. In their attempts to meet this competition, magazine publishers have taken two significant steps: the revitalization of the Magazine Advertising Bureau, and the publication of regional advertising editions.

The combined circulations of the members of MAB reach 52 per cent of all Canadians over the age of 15. Every member's circulation is important to this penetration by magazines in Canada. Generally speaking, the advantages of magazine advertising are—a selective audience with high incomes, an attractive environment for advertisers with the added advantages of a committed readership and an enduring message, plus the high persuasion values of the printed word.

Clearly if any substantial part of the magazine audience is lost, the value to an advertiser of magazine penetration declines and advertisers will tend to turn to other media. This is the primary reason that the Digest is valuable to other Canadian magazines. This point should be made particularly clear—it is easily misunderstood. Let me repeat, the total magazine audience is important to advertisers and publishers alike. Magazine publishing in Canada would be significantly weakened if it could not offer the penetration and coverage now available to magazine advertisers.

The Digest carries regional advertising, as do most magazines, and newspaper supplements. Regional advertising editions offer selected markets to national advertisers and markets to advertisers in the areas in which they wish to trade. Regional editions also enable advertisers to test public response to new products. The Digest has 14 advertising editions in addition to its national editions, giving an advertiser choice of: the combined English and French market, the English or French market; combination of metropolitan and regional markets. We have no regional editorial editions since our editorial content is designed to be of universal interest.

The major competition for national advertising revenue in Canada is among media. According to the latest (Elliott Haynes) 1969 figures, national advertising revenue in Canada is shared as follows:

Television 42.7 per cent; newspapers 26.6 per cent; radio 14 per cent; magazines 8.9 per cent; supplements 7.8 per cent.

Over the last nine years: Television's share increased by 75 per cent; radio's share increased by 13.8 per cent; newspapers' share dropped by 21 per cent:—

And I should emphasize the word "dropped".

—supplements' share dropped by 46 per cent;
magazines' share dropped by 40.7 per cent.

These figures emphasize that national advertising competition is primarily by media selection and that competition among the media is much greater than between individual magazines, newspapers, networks or stations. The Magazine Advertising Bureau is strongly supported by major consumer magazines for this reason and in a similar response, The Star Weekly, Weekend, and The Canadian combined together in MagnaMedia. Magazines, newspaper supplements and the Canadian Daily Newspaper Publishers Association are all aware that by actively supporting trade associations they have the best chance of meeting competition from rival media. If the major consumer magazines in Canada enjoyed a proportion of national advertising revenue similar to that of their counterparts in the United States, their advertising revenue would more than double its present figure.

For the remaining few minutes I would like to turn to our editorial content.

The principle followed by Digest editions is one of shared costs—a principle not new to publishing in Canada. By 'sharing costs' Canadian newspapers, in fact, obtain the majority of their syndicated columns, editorial features, comics and most international editorial material. News agency co-operatives, and much radio and television broadcasting in this country operate on a similar basis for sharing their editorial expenses.

In return for the fee which each international Digest edition pays to the parent, editions are free to use articles for which the parent holds a variety of rights. Much of the material used in the Digest is competitively available. Take, for example, "Oxbells and Fires" by Ernest Buckler, a Canadian writer, published by McClelland and Stewart. The Digest has used two selections from this book. The material was available to any magazine publisher in Canada or elsewhere at negotiable market rates. This principle applies to "Western Windows" by Bruce Hutchison, published by Longmans Canada, which also yielded an international Digest selection. Similarly with magazine articles from Canadian periodicals which yield selections for our Canadian and other international editions.

Over the years (As you will see from Appendix III to the main brief) we have paid increasing editorial attention to Canada in the belief that a magazine of circulation must, in some measure, reflect the interests and achievements, not only of its readers, but of the country in which it circulates.

In the last five years, we have published some 100 articles, either about Canada, written by Canadian authors, or reprinted from Canadian sources. Of these, almost half have appeared in a variety of Reader's Digest editions throughout the world. As an example, we have prepared a chart to show the circulation of "Snowmobiles: The Cats that Conquered Winter." Mr. Hancox has just unveiled it and it sits on my right. This is the story of a remarkable French-Canadian enterprise resulting from Joseph-Armand Bombardier's invention. On the same chart are the titles of several other articles about Canada, listing the number of languages in which they were published in the Digest and their approximate circulation world-wide.

This editorial activity in Canada represents part of a continuing program. We are at the moment working with some 15 freelance and other writers, preparing some 40 projects which will eventually yield Canadian articles for us and our other international editions.

Coupled with this, our editorial department reads or processes some 750 pieces of contributor mail each month containing manuscripts, anecdotes and material that readers suggest for our pages.

To maintain an editorial balance in the magazine, the Digest selects from a variety of sources. The February English language issue which accompanied our brief, will give you an idea of how this is done. It includes material from one or another, or about a combination of the following countries: West Germany; Sweden; East Germany; the United States; Canada; France; New Guinea; Great Britain; and Tibet. Interspersed with this material are articles on consumer protection, the art of living, medicine, nature, science, self-help, do-it-yourself, entertainment and humour. This is typical of all our issues and of our international editions.

Selections from books and periodicals around the world are augmented increasingly by material which is specially prepared for the Digest. Some of this is universally used in all editions, some of it relevant to only a few, some developed particularly for one edition—as with our March articles: "The Understanding" and "Canada's Wonderful Wishing Book" which were commissioned from Canadian authors by our Canadian editors. The Digest also maintains a staff of roving editors, one of whom is a Canadian, resident in Canada. He writes mainly, although not exclusively, on Canadian subjects and his articles are available from the central editorial selection to all of our editions.

Additionally, the Canadian editors interest the parent edition in a variety of Canadian subjects with the result that roving editors are encouraged to write about this country's achievements regularly. A list typical of their contributions can be found in Appendix III. The Canadian editions also maintain a research staff and engage freelance writers to prepare adaptations of articles which have been successful in other editions. Such articles fall mainly into the category of consumer reports such as "If You're Thinking of Moving" or general interest articles such as "Try Climbing Your Family Tree" or "Shoplifting: A National Menace."

The editorial policy implicit in this selection has enabled us to obtain a circulation for our two Canadian editions which is guaranteed to advertisers at 1,400,000 copies each month. The loyalty of readers enables us to maintain this circulation without difficulty. In 1969, the proceeds from subscriptions sold, exceeded the cost of obtaining those subscriptions by a multiple of approximately 2.5. The figures provided to the Audit Bureau of Circulation for the six months ending December, 1969, show that 88.7 per cent of our circulation is obtained by mail, 9.8 per cent on the news-stands, and 1.5 per cent through agencies.

This Digest readership provides us with our primary market for further publications. We have recently published three books which were edited, set, printed and bound in Canada. At present being offered to our mailing list are: "Canada, This Land, These People"—in both English and French—a handsomely illustrated anthology of Canadian articles which have appeared in our magazine; (this book has gone to its third printing and sales to date in both languages are in excess of 125,000 copies) and "The Canadians At War: 1939-1945"—the only complete record of Canada's war effort in print today. This three-volume set, three years in preparation, represents a substantial editorial investment to tell the story of Canada at war. Digest editors in Montreal found the story of Canadian achievement and loss in official records, books, broadcasts, magazines, newspapers, regimental and personal diaries, even personal letters. The record was written and compiled from these sources and the volumes were illustrated by 850 photographs and maps to tell a comprehensive story of Canada's commitment. The books were the result of a team made up of three Canadian Digest editors, all war veterans, and our Montreal art department—assisted by one researcher.

Now being distributed is our third major book publishing effort: "My Secrets for Better Cooking" by Madame Jehane Benoit. This three-volume set, again, was written, edited, set, printed and bound in Canada. All these books have had an excellent reception from Canadian reviewers and represent a further extension of our Canadian editorial policies. Honourable Senators may wish to examine some of the reviews dealing with these publications. Copies of the books themselves are also available for you to peruse. These books represent an editorial and art investment of approximately $400,000.

Supplementing these major publications are our continuing series of condensed and special book publications which we offer to our mailing lists. These hard cover books are printed and bound in Canada, with few exceptions. The prime source for purchaser of these books are Digest magazine readers. Our total costs (including the magazines) for setting, printing binding and packaging in Canada during 1969 benefited the Canadian printing industry across the country by $4,653,000. Thus when considering the editorial costs of the Digest in Canada, the committee should bear in mind that the result is a substantial investment in the economy to the direct benefit of the printing and publishing industry in this country. The economy as a whole benefited from Digest operation in Canada in the same year by more than $17 million.

This, honourable Senators, is a short review of our business and publishing activities in Canada. Thank you for your patience and for the privilege of appearing before you. We will be pleased to answer to the best of our ability any questions you may wish to ask."

The Chairman: Thank you very much Mr. Zimmerman. That is a very full and comprehensive statement and certainly augments the written brief. I think you will begin the questioning this morning with Senator Prowse and as I said if you wish to have any of your colleagues answer questions, please feel free to do so. Senator Prowse?

Senator Prowse: The figure for your circulation 88 per cent obtained by mail. Is that direct mail?

Mr. Zimmerman: Yes it is.

Senator Prowse: That is the type of thing that Christopher Young was writing about?

Mr. Zimmerman: I don't know the specific reference to which you make.

The Chairman: Senator Prowse, please let the rest of us in on it, I don't know either.

Senator Smith: I thought the whole world knew about that one!

Senator Prowse: Christopher Young in the Ottawa Journal . . .

The Chairman: If Christopher Young was writing in the Ottawa Journal it was a most unusual article!

Senator Prowse: The Ottawa Citizen, I am sorry, and when it was sent out, I presume, to some others. It is called "One Man's War on the Digest." Here is the original copy. Here is the second one he got in response to it.

Mr. Zimmerman: Yes, I do know it. I was confused with your reference to the Journal. I personally handled that matter, Senator, in the sense . . .

Senator Prowse: Well, that is what I gather . . .

The Chairman: Well, just before you go on, Mr. Zimmerman, I would like to ask if all the Senators are familiar with this because if you are not we should perhaps explain this. Is everybody familiar with this? Well right, please carry on.

Senator Prowse: I figure that anyone in Canada who has a mailing list is familiar with it, but go ahead.

Mr. Zimmerman: I think you are right.

Senator Prowse: Yes.

Mr. Zimmerman: No doubt anyone with a mailing list would be familiar with it.

Senator Prowse: Or anyone who is on a mailing list.

Mr. Zimmerman: Yes. May I also say that anyone who does business with broad consumers is familiar with it. I looked into this matter personally and the circumstances are these. We received an order at Kider's Digest from a previously addressed mail promotion to this individual's home in his name that said they wanted to order the condensed book that was involved in the matter. We did what any supplier would do, we shipped it. In the original promotion package, which was returned to us, the copy said that it was a free book which he could read, hopefully enjoy, and decide whether to enjoy continuing volumes. If he did not wish to have continuing volumes would he inform us. We have no record of ever discontinuing correspondence from the individual.

When we subsequently did what the office said we would do in supplying another volume some three months further along and send a bill with that volume, we received back the free book; not the billed book.

Unfortunately in our system—and we learned something from this complaint, we had put into the system the title of the free book.

Senator Prowse: This is into a computer, is it?

Mr. Zimmerman: Yes it is. Excuse me, may I correct that, please?

Senator Prowse: Yes.

Mr. Zimmerman: The title of the billed one. When we got the title of the free book back, which some others had received in the normal cycle on a purchase rather than a free basis, the computer did not accept the credit for that billed book. At that point we read the story in the Citizen. I immediately responded having been surprised that an editor of a capital paper would devote that much of the space on the editorial page to a personal matter, wrote in and explained the circumstances—and had an acknowledgement back that he is satisfied with the case.

Senator Prowse: I think in fairness it should be said you are not the only people in Canada that use this type of thing.

Mr. Zimmerman: Exactly.

Senator Prowse: The thing I am interested in—when you get 88 per cent from mail . . .

Mr. Zimmerman: On the magazine?

Senator Prowse: On the magazine.

Mr. Zimmerman: That is correct.

Senator Prowse: This would be the experience of other major magazines as well?

Mr. Zimmerman: Quite different.

Senator Prowse: How do they get theirs?

Mr. Zimmerman: From several sources. You will recall that we said 88 per cent—88.7 I believe to be correct—from direct mail, some approximate 10 per cent from what you and I would call news-stand—freely purchased at will copies—and the balance from agencies. The agency is an insignificant factor.

I might deal with the insignificant factor first. The agency sales are most generally retired people who sell to their own friends, mainly their own relatives, and it is a very small percentage of our circulation. We will not sell door-to-door and there is a reason for it. We don't want our reputation beyond our control.

Other publishers, without selecting any one because it is very general in the publishing business, use another additional method which accounts for a range of anywhere from 35 to 50 per cent of their total circulation that we do not use—what we would normally call direct door-to-door selling. The reason we don't use it, as I have said, is because we cannot protect our reputation. We have never used it and we never intend to.

The second point is that it is the most costly method of obtaining circulation. May I give you an example?

Senator Prowse: Yes.

Mr. Zimmerman: This is hypothetical but the figures are not too off in the sense of reasoning. If we mail a new subscriber an offer and they respond, we will renew that subscriber the second time around; maybe a year or two years later at a very high rate of renewal—somewhere in the order of 60 per cent at the low end. Whereas if you sold, from our experience, on a door-to-door basis your renewal factor could be as low as 25 per cent. It doesn't take much of a businessman to see that this is a costly circulation.

There is another point. In the original subscription that you get door-to-door your range of recovery would be from probably 2 per cent to maybe a 10 per cent debit; meaning that you in many cases get less for the subscription than in fact the so-called subscriber paid for it. The high commissions paid to those selling door-to-door accounts for that statement. Whereas in our particular case, on the average, our cost of getting subscriptions is so much lower than the revenue that we obtain for them and I used a multiplier of 2-½. You can see quickly that we don't think from our point of view that this is the most successful way to obtain subscriptions from a financial investment return standpoint.

Senator Prowse: One of the things I had in mind was that it was my recollection that a number of magazines and periodicals in Canada over a period of time...

The Chairman: Excuse me, Senator Prowse. I believe someone would like you to speak louder.

Senator Prowse: I am sorry. —who employed door-to-door salesmen, found that in order not to get themselves into trouble, they had to give the door-to-door salesmen 100 per cent of what it took. In other words, the door-to-door salesman goes out and takes subscriptions and all he has to do is then send in the list of names—he probably sends the list of names in because this keeps him out of trouble. On the other hand, if they have to send in some of the money from time to time, they don't get around to sending in the money. Are you aware of that situation as well?

Mr. Zimmerman: Well, I am probably aware of the technique of this type of thing and the high cost of obtaining that type of circulation, but I really could not comment on personal experience on the method between the salesman and the publisher. We have no experience.

Senator Prowse: What would be your percentage return on your sale on the circulation of your subscription requests?

Mr. Zimmerman: I am sorry Senator, I don't understand.

Senator Prowse: What I mean is this. If you send out an offer to me to buy the Reader's Digest...

Mr. Zimmerman: Yes.

Senator Prowse: You send these out: approximately how many of these would you send out a year...

Mr. Zimmerman: You mean the percentage response, Senator?

Senator Prowse: Yes.

Mr. Zimmerman: If I could ask for your forbearance. We consider that the most private and confidential factor in our total business.

Senator Prowse: All right.

Mr. Zimmerman: I wouldn't mind discussing it in private.

The Chairman: Perhaps the witness would agree to send us his answer to that question in a private note following the hearing?

Mr. Zimmerman: Yes, we can do that for you.

The Chairman: I think your position is perfectly valid but at the same time I think it is a perfectly valid and legitimate question and one which interests us. If you wouldn't mind sending us this information . . .

Mr. Zimmerman: In confidence, we will be pleased to do that.

The Chairman: Fine.

Senator Prowse: The whole purpose of this, Mr. Zimmerman, is not to embarrass anybody and not to be smart. It is because it is pretty obvious that from the information that we have before us—both from people who have appeared before us and from our own researchers it seems that the magazine industry can only stay alive by pursuing a most aggressive circulation policy. I think you will agree this is true.

Mr. Zimmerman: Well, I would have to qualify my agreement.

Senator Prowse: Well, don't let me tell you then, you tell me.

Mr. Zimmerman: The qualification relates to a balance between circulation in numbers, the cost of getting it . . .

Senator Prowse: Yes.

Mr. Zimmerman: And the value of that audience to the advertiser. It isn't a simple equation because it has at least three very fundamental factors in it.

Senator Prowse: But the fact does remain that without a very aggressive policy in seeking circulation, the magazine industry could just not stay alive, could it? You just sat and waited for people to come to you . . .

Mr. Zimmerman: In a general answer again, the answer is yes, but with a significant qualification. Magazines are not sold on numbers in the sense of advertising values. They are sold on audience value that follow those numbers and those that have been chosen—and there are several more in the U.S. than in Canada that going the numbers game way have gone bankrupt.

Senator Prowse: Well, that gets us into another area which I will come to in a moment. This involves probably the type of magazine and its appeal. In other words, there are areas that you feel are valuable for you to have and you want to produce a magazine to reach, which I would presume you want to do because they will enable your advertising people to sell—persuade the people who buy advertising that this is a valuable thing you are offering them—this circulation.

Now, within these areas, do you agree that you could not survive if you did not have an aggressive policy of seeking circulation and the follow-up on it?

Mr. Zimmerman: The answer again hinges on your word "aggressive". We never look on the building of our circulation solely on the basis of numbers. Never. What we do look at with a great deal of management judgment—it comes right to my desk—the final equation—is what do we need in order to improve the cost of getting the circulation and the resultant values to the advertisers. Those two points are the keys. We will not invest substantial dollars for numbers without looking very seriously at the cost of getting them from the profit and loss standpoint including both circulation and advertising revenue.

Senator Prowse: Well, let us see if we can get it. You are trying to tell me something that I am not quite getting, so let's see if we can get it right.

Mr. Zimmerman: I am attempting to help you.

Senator Prowse: You are doing the best you can with the material in front of you.

Mr. Zimmerman: No, it is a very hard equation to answer.

Senator Prowse: Well, I am quite prepared to admit that I am having difficulty. I can follow this. Just to come along and say that I have a circulation of 1,400,000 to an advertiser—this could be giveaways to the unemployed.

Mr. Zimmerman: Exactly.

Senator Prowse: This is what you are saying?

Mr. Zimmerman: Exactly.

Senator Prowse: And that you are not going to waste money on getting circulation from people who are not going to be of any interest to your advertisers?

Mr. Zimmerman: Correct. For two reasons and you can't separate them. The first is the cost of renewing the person who might be of a low income or unemployed is much higher than getting somebody who has the ability to buy, and secondly the increased educational level with the interest to read. The advertiser is interested not only in that audience value and its penetration of that editorial material which takes them through the book in the sense of the ad exposure side but also his ability, having gone through the book, to buy what the advertiser is attempting to market.

Senator Prowse: Well, what we come to then is this: you are interested in a particular segment of the Canadian public as your market?

Mr. Zimmerman: Yes we are.

Senator Prowse: And then within that limitation you feel that any effort you make to get circulation should not only carry their costs but should bring you a profit?

Mr. Zimmerman: Exactly.

Senator Prowse: In other words you are not interested in the giveaway end of it?

Mr. Zimmerman: Exactly. This is the advantage inherent in paid circulation magazines—paid circulation in the sense of traceable payment, not in the sense of supplements that are, let us say, hypothetically paid, and certainly not controlled circulation periodicals in the consumer field, like Home-maker's Digest, if I might give you an example.

Senator Prowse: Yes.

The Chairman: Excuse me, Senator. I believe there are a couple of supplementary questions that the others would like to ask.

Senator Sparrow: Just as a matter of interest in that circulation—you refer in your brief to five editions being printed in Braille. Is that a losing proposition or money-making proposition, or is that a service, and how do you get circulation?

Mr. Zimmerman: It is self-help to the blind. I don't like the word charity. It is a self-help to the blind contribution on the part of Reader's Digest. We give the printing publishing house for the blind the free rights to print our material in Braille and then on what we might call the charity, education and donation side make contribution towards both the printing house for the blind and in Canada's case, the C.N.I.B. We are much interested in helping those who are handicapped by giving it at no cost to them and supplementing their costs by donations.

Senator Sparrow: What would the circulation be in that?

Mr. Zimmerman: I would be glad to give you that answer. Our company doesn't handle directly the circulation. The rights go directly to the printing house for the blind and in turn they produce the material. They are bound to us to not give it except to recognized blind distribution sources, and the CNIB in Canada has the exclusive rights for the Braille edition, for the big print edition and for the recorded edition. We have three parts.

The Chairman: Mr. Fortier?

Mr. Fortier: Yes, Mr. Chairman. Mine is a supplementary to Senator Prowse's line of questioning.

Mr. Zimmerman, in view of your answers who are your readers in Canada?

Mr. Zimmerman: I think they are best described by general wording as the best able to buy audience that we can discover in this country.

Mr. Fortier: Would you care to be a little more specific now?

Mr. Zimmerman: Well, we would have . . .

Mr. Fortier: Are they old, are they young, are the rich, are they of medium income . . .

Mr. Zimmerman: Well, the average age, which should say we haven't studied for some years, would be somewhere around 25 to 26 years—it is below 30. Now, on incomes, we could give you some idea of that. We have a higher percentage of our circulation sold to $8,000 and above incomes than we have below that. If you would like further details, we have them from studies.

Mr. Fortier: If you have a recent study, I think the members of the committee would find it very useful.

Mr. Zimmerman: We would be pleased to submit it.

The Chairman: Senator Smith, is yours a supplementary question?

Senator Smith: Yes, Mr. Chairman, supplementary to the advertising aspect of this thing. I just picked up the February edition of Reader's Digest and in relation to what you have told us about the kind of circulation that you go after, do you mean that you are not interested in low income people, or the old? What classification of people don't suit the kind of market you have for the advertising material that you have in your book?

Mr. Zimmerman: Well, it isn't really—if I could use the word—an absolute sifting device in the sense of preventing low incomes and the old from getting Reader's Digest. It is a surprising thing to us, really, that if you took the depression era through 1930 through 1940, it is interesting to note that our circulation grew at about the same rate it is growing today. The Digest with its positive points of view, in the sense of informing people as to how to overcome their difficulties and to face their problems, has been read as equally in the sense of depression eras as it has been in the more affluent eras. It is a surprising thing to us, really, but it is true. Maybe it is because that as people decrease in income availability and they, of course, are looking for two things: opportunity and some relief from an entertainment and informative point of view and they come back to Reader's Digest because of its very format. If anybody wants a subscription to Reader's Digest they can get it very easily. In fact, part of our format is to make it easier for them to buy it. Every subscription on the news-stand has an offer for them to subscribe, so there are no restrictions. What we were talking about previously was the direct mail deal where we attempted to improve for economic reasons the recovery to us as businessmen from the subscriptions and the attraction to advertisers so we can afford to take on more people in the sense of a sound base for publishing.

The Chairman: Excuse me, Senator Smith. Senator Kinnear, was your supplementary exclusively to that?

Senator Kinnear: No, it was to Senator Sparrow's question.

The Chairman: The Braille issue?

Senator Kinnear: The answer Mr. Zimmerman gave Senator Sparrow.

The Chairman: On the Braille issue?

Senator Kinnear: No, on the big print.

Senator Smith: I will finish this just in a moment.

The Chairman: Yes. I was going to say we will finish with Senator Smith's question and then we will come to you, Senator Kinnear. You are still the questioner Senator Prowse.

Senator Prowse: Well, it is my question but let everyone have a whack at it.

The Chairman: Senator Smith?

Senator Smith: Mr. Zimmerman, what confused me, I think, was this aspect of it and I perhaps misunderstood to some extent what you were saying to us, but I thought that you were trying to convey to us that your procedure towards soliciting or selling the magazine on a subscription basis was to select groups within the country because they are the kind of groups that advertisers will come to Reader's Digest and pay big money to reach. When I just glance through this February edition without any attempt on my part to allocate them, I find Oxo, Murine, Kraft, Insurance, cold cures, margarine, cat food, dog food, an international correspondence school. On the other hand, the ones that I think would require a special kind of magazine would be related to those people who could afford to go to Japan for Expo '70, and the general tourist literature—advertising tours to Spain and Britain, and so on.

Mr. Zimmerman: Maybe I could say what the missing link is between us is this. We must look at reader interest in any periodical on the basis of its educational and literacy level. It does run—the graphs cross at some point relating to income and that educational level that really aids and abets the natural interest on the part of the reader relating to what we are attempting to do. I don't think that we have discriminated in the sense of promotional opportunities in any year at any time. As I said earlier, anyone can buy Reader's Digest who is interested in good reading. They can pick it up at the newsstand and subscribe and they will get it. It does, however, follow that as business people trying to run a healthy operation from a financial point of view—which was back of Senator Prowse's point—that we should as much as we can design to get a higher income, higher educated person in the sense of having a viable business operation.

Senator Smith: Yes, I believe that answers my question. Thank you.

The Chairman: Senator Kinnear, you have a supplementary question?

Senator Kinnear: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Mr. Zimmerman replied to Senator Sparrow that he had a big print edition. I would like to know about the approximate circulation of that and where it goes. I have seen some of the big print, as you call it—books that are used in hospitals for the aged, and another type of book in big print for children. What is yours?

Mr. Zimmerman: Senator, I answered Senator Sparrow about the circulation of our Braille—I also was including—if you don't mind—the big print edition and the records that we also publish monthly.

Senator Kinnear: Yes.

Mr. Zimmerman: And we will give the figures on all three. I could not give them off hand and as you may recall I said these were distributed by CNIB and that my corporation does nothing but foster the arrangement direct to the printing house for the blind and CNIB. We do not keep day-to-day information within the corporation, but it is easily obtainable and we will be pleased to give you the whole three.

The Chairman: Thank you. Senator Prowse, back to you.

Senator Prowse: Your circulation at one million four is holding relatively stable is it?

Mr. Zimmerman: Well, that is true.

Senator Prowse: Or is it increasing slightly?

Mr. Zimmerman: It is increasing slightly. If you look at the makeup of population growth or family growth—families at the moment are growing a little faster, some less than one per cent faster than the population—we exceed this by a low of one per cent and probably a high of three in any one year. So we are growing faster than the family makeup and the population growth. We think it is a healthy way to grow.

Senator Prowse: Now, the magazine operation itself dealing out the books and the records and the, various other things that you have, is said to remain profitable? I think you did have two or three years there following the impact of television when it went down?

Mr. Zimmerman: You are quite right, Senator. We had years when our profits on the magazine were depressed abnormally. Those were the years immediately during and following the Royal Commission on Publications and there was a reason. It is our impression that the advertisers, faced by five years of controversy through the communications vehicles of Canada about whether they should be American or Canadian in their decision-making, very often decided that magazines weren't that significant as a whole and went away from magazines in total, and we suffered. The whole industry suffered. And in fact it was that cruel lesson that started the magazine industry of Canada to say "Why don't we have a co-operative industry association that properly presents the value of magazines to the advertisers who buy the advertising."

Senator Prowse: And that resulted then in the establishment of the Magazine Advertising Bureau?

Mr. Zimmerman: That was one of the reasons.

Senator Prowse: In any event as a result of that—now that it has been functioning your position is now back into the black, or satisfactory, and moving along there?

Mr. Zimmerman: Yes, but I think I should have added one more reason.

Senator Prowse: I don't want to go into financial figures. If you think the answer I am asking ought to be given in private—then please say so.

Mr. Zimmerman: Well, you haven't asked me anything so far.

Senator Prowse: I am trying to get a picture of the general health of the industry.

Mr. Zimmerman: Your question is really relating the value of the Magazine Advertising Bureau?

Senator Prowse: Yes.

The Chairman: I think he is asking really about the success of the Magazine Advertising Bureau.

Senator Prowse: Yes.

Mr. Zimmerman: Well, its growth factor is recorded publicly.

Senator Prowse: Yes.

Mr. Zimmerman: The growth of magazine revenue as a whole. It has been substantially better since the invention of the Magazine Advertising Bureau but you must pick your years. If you pick the years in the decade preceding, it has been substantially better.

Senator Prowse: The chief competitor for advertising is TV and radio as far as you are concerned is it not?

Mr. Zimmerman: Television much more than radio.

Senator Prowse: Yes, that is only increased slightly. And what was the figure you had on television? I tried to get it down as you said it but I missed it.

Mr. Zimmerman: Forty-two per cent as I recall—12.7 per cent, and radio has 14 per cent; those ratios give you an immediate picture.

Senator Prowse: And the increase of television over the last nine years—radio showed an increase of 13.8 per cent and I didn't get the television figure?

Mr. Zimmerman: 75 per cent.

Senator Prowse: So you are in a relatively healthy position although everybody would like to be healthier—would that be a correct way to say it?

Mr. Zimmerman: Yes.

Senator Prowse: Now, let's move in from . . .

The Chairman: Well, before you move into another area, I would like to ask the witness a couple of questions on advertising. You say television is your chief competition. How about other magazines?

Mr. Zimmerman: Well, in the opening remarks I made, I laid emphasis that the decision-making in advertising is between media first and primarily, and secondly within the medium.

The Chairman: Once that decision is made?

Mr. Zimmerman: Well, once that decision is made, it so goes back to my other remarks that I made earlier when I said that if you took the age of 15 and above, that magazine has some 52 per cent of the so-called adult population. Other vehicles such as television and the broad potpourri of newspapers would have a higher percentage than that 52 per cent, but not at the selective audience value that most advertisers want to look at in the sense of real value assessment.

The Chairman: I have only two other questions on advertising and I might as well . . .

Senator Prowse: You go ahead.

The Chairman: Yes, now is probably a good time to ask them. I think you said that of the national advertising revenue in Canada—magazines get 8.9 per cent?

Mr. Zimmerman: That is correct.

The Chairman: Yes, I think that is the figure I wrote down. If we take the 8.9 per cent as 100 per cent, how much of that would the Reader's Digest have? In other words, what is your percentage of that 8.9 per cent—would you have half of all the magazine advertising in Canada?

Mr. Zimmerman: No, nothing like that. I would say somewhere in the order of 20 per cent.

The Chairman: About 20 per cent?

Mr. Zimmerman: Yes. That is of the Magazine Advertising Bureau paid circulation magazines.

The Chairman: The Magazine Advertising Bureau—you have your own sales staff quite apart from them?

Mr. Zimmerman: Right.

The Chairman: They don't really sell advertising?

Mr. Zimmerman: Exactly.

The Chairman: You sell the advertising?

Mr. Zimmerman: Exactly. It's different than Magna-Media.

The Chairman: Yes, I understand that. You have approximately 20 per cent of the total?

Mr. Zimmerman: That is correct, senator.

The Chairman: Do you have any local advertising?

Mr. Zimmerman: Not as such. We have regional advertising.

The Chairman: Are there regional or local advertisers as such?

Mr. Zimmerman: Well, let me say . . .

The Chairman: Well, let me come at my question perhaps a little differently. You have given us the figures of national advertising newspapers 26.6 per cent, down I think you said 21.3 per cent in 9 years; Television 42.7%, up 75%.

Mr. Zimmerman: That is correct.

The Chairman: At the same time I think it is fair to say that of the overall money spent in Canada on advertising, newspapers are still first. That would be correct?

Mr. Zimmerman: Yes.

The Chairman: At about 30 per cent?

Mr. Zimmerman: Yes.

The Chairman: Which means, of course, that the newspapers make up this gap with an enormous amount of local advertising?

Mr. Zimmerman: Yes, but there is a difference, Senator. I think you will recall this from your advertising experience. A newspaper has a local advertising rate . . .

The Chairman: Right.

Mr. Zimmerman: And a national advertising rate, but essentially both ads reach the same audience.

The Chairman: Yes, I quite agree. I am not questioning that even for a moment. The question I am directly coming to is with your regional edition—I think you said there were 14 in Canada . . .

Mr. Zimmerman: That is right.

The Chairman: Fourteen regional editions in Canada—is it your intention to become increasingly competitive with the daily newspaper for local advertising? For example, let us say car dealers in Vancouver, or Toronto, or Montreal?

Mr. Zimmerman: Not specifically, but because we have regional editions we are competitive with anything that has a light section of the regional market. We just don't duplicate the newspaper market. In the Digest case, you cannot buy the Toronto market. You cannot buy the Montreal market separate. You can buy Toronto and Montreal in combination, which we call our metropolitan edition, so we have not reached to a direct competition on regional advertising with a daily newspaper.

The Chairman: Why haven't you?

Mr. Zimmerman: It is a matter of economics and an appeal in the sense of the national advertisers' interest. Most national advertisers are interested in the regional section but in bigger geographics from a national advertising point of view than just Toronto, just Peterborough, just Ottawa. We have not, because of the combination of economics and the general—we might call it—pressure or interest from the advertiser, gone that deep.

The Chairman: What is the smallest of these 14 regional issues?

Mr. Zimmerman: It would be—and I would like to ask Mr. Conduit to check me—it is in the Maritimes—wouldn't it be the Atlantic edition, Mr. Conduit?

Mr. A. J. Conduit, Vice President and Advertising Director, The Reader's Digest Association (Canada Ltd.): The Atlantic edition has 85,000 circulation.

Mr. Zimmerman: Yes, that would be about the lowest.

The Chairman: Thank you. Senator Prowse?

Senator Prowse: This circulation . . .

Senator McElman: A supplementary?

The Chairman: Oh, I am sorry. You are having rough morning, Senator Prowse!

Senator Prowse: Oh, that is fine. It gives me chance to figure out where I am going next.

The Chairman: I have two supplementary question one from Senator McElman and one from Mr. Fortie Senator McElman?

Senator McElman: On the matter of advertising—have just been looking through your two February issues, the French language and the English language editions, and noted your liquor advertising. You have Tia Maria in both editions.

Mr. Zimmerman: Yes.

Senator McElman: You have two or three pages hard liquor advertising in the English language edition.

and none in the French language edition. And yet most of the other advertisements are duplicated. What is the basis for this?

Mr. Fortier: It is well known that French Canadians don't drink as much as English Canadians!

The Chairman: I believe the question was put to the witness, Mr. Fortier!

Mr. Zimmerman: That is a matter of advertising decision and I can only give you an opinion. I don't know what the penetration is for any one of those brands from a retail exposure standpoint, but we both know that the Liquor Control Commission of the provinces has an effect on what is listed and from my experience, it is generally dictated by the movement of the brand—not unlike what happens with any brands in the grocery store; so where there is not an exposure to this consumer or we might say an acceptance of significance, I would think the advertiser looking at a regional edition, from the point of view of maximizing his attraction of the market.

Senator McElman: There is not a policy that in selection there won't be hard liquor advertising?

Mr. Zimmerman: No, the policies for both editions are identical in the sense of good taste and our standards for taste. In addition to that we respect the provincial codes.

Senator McElman: Still on the advertising—what is your current policy with respect to tobacco advertising and do you envisage any change in that?

Mr. Zimmerman: Well, I will take the latter and the former—we envisage no change whatsoever. The reason is simple to comprehend. We could not respect ourselves by having for decades campaigned against the danger of smoking and taking revenue that propagates smoking. It was a straight moral responsibility decision and we have led the industry both editorially and in advertising policy for decades.

Senator McElman: You are advertising tobacco.

Mr. Zimmerman: But not cigarettes. The reason there being that cigarettes have been the one where the evidence has been most conclusive and the one that we attacked from a responsible publisher's standpoint consistently through the years.

Senator McElman: But you would still accept pipe chewing tobacco?

Mr. Zimmerman: Yes, we would.

The Chairman: The only ads I have ever seen for chewing tobacco were in the Sporting News and I didn't think you read that, Senator McElman!

Mr. Zimmerman: Without intent, I made the statement earlier that we do not take a single city in Canada for circulation. It has just been pointed out to me that I overlooked the Montreal French-English combination. We don't take it in a single language, but we do take it in a combined language area.

The Chairman: Senator Sparrow?

Senator Sparrow: You suggested that your percentage of the advertising revenue of the magazine advertising was 20 per cent. Was that the figure you used?

Mr. Zimmerman: Yes.

Senator Sparrow: What is the breakdown between the French and English language editions?

Mr. Zimmerman: I can give you a rough estimate of that one. It is about 20 per cent of the 20 per cent, so there we have it.

Senator Sparrow: On the direct relation to circulation?

Mr. Zimmerman: Yes. On a percentage point factor it is about four of the some 20 per cent and it wouldn't be more than five.

Senator Sparrow: Mr. Chairman, you can correct me but I will try this as a supplementary as well. On your net earnings shown on page 11 of your brief, what does that income represent as a percentage of investment as well as a percentage of your gross income including the figure of 1969?

Mr. Zimmerman: Well, we are talking about the financial admission we made?

Senator Sparrow: Yes.

Mr. Zimmerman: And it is page 11?

Senator Sparrow: Yes.

The Chairman: Yes, I believe he is talking about page 11 of your brief. I think that is a supplementary question that we can deal with at this point, but I would only say to the witness that if he feels that is the kind of a question he would prefer to answer privately, he may by all means do so. Would you like to have this question again?

Mr. Zimmerman: I heard his question.

The Chairman: Fine.

Mr. Zimmerman: I would ask your indulgence here—I would not want to make a statement at this point but we would be pleased to answer that privately. I might remind you, however, that in the publishing business there is quite a difference. The invested funds, we might call them capital investment in the public business, as a ratio of the sales revenue is generally lower than the industry as a whole, but the risk is substantially higher. The risk coming in to having to create products on a printing press in substantial quantity and to promote these by direct mail, then hope the response is there. This gets back to an earlier question about what the response is—so the difference in the publishing industry is generally a higher return on the sales dollar and a higher return on the invested capital because of the substantial risk that is there, and you will find that where risk increases in any business that this follows. It is a different business than most other businesses in the sense of the question you have asked, and we will supply those figures to you privately.

The Chairman: Mr. Fortier?

Mr. Fortier: If I may try another one, Mr. Zimmerman. While attempting to remain within the confines of your written brief—it is also on this matter of net earnings since December 31, 1960 which appear to have, to say the least, fluctuated considerably and which, as you have underlined earlier, indicated a general decrease since the O'Leary period. Could you tell the members of the committee how much of that decrease is due to a lessening in the profitability of interests other than your two magazines?

Mr. Zimmerman: You would have to pick your year because we have been diversifying more actively from 1964 than in advance of 1960 into what you might call the other interests. If I could put it this way: our first major diversification was just in advance of 1950 when we found that magazine material had a substantial interest when specially selected in hard bound books of an anthology type. The next step in the evolution was our condensed book business where we recognized that we in the magazine talked about non-fiction material and we were not hitting—if we can use that word commercially—a market for fiction reading and we thought that since our audience responded better for renewals than most other magazines—they liked reading in other words and they liked our type of reading—that we should look for the best fiction and since we found that condensing non-fiction material had quite an attraction why wouldn't we get the first rights to condensing the best fiction and running it on a cyclical basis as well.

In 1952 we started into that business and we are very successful at it.

Coming forward into the area that we are now talking about, 1960 forward—well, 1959 to be exact—we went into the record packages and we carried on, of course, the other business and then got into special books that were non-magazine—not unlike the book that I referred to earlier—"Canada, This Land, These People", "Canadians At War", Madame Benoit's book on cookery, and things of that nature.

Now, quite necessarily in the publishing business when you get into such things as I referred to on the more specialized book—non-magazine material an essentially non-fiction material, excluding the condensed book—you are into a high initial cost investment to produce these books. It took us some three years on "Canadians at War" to produce the book and I would doubt if there has ever been an book produced in this country that took as much capital. The end result of this is that we in fact expensed the internal cost throughout that period and it did affect our operation. There are other reasons. At the same time we were involved in the recognition that the technology of servicing Canadians required a computer and we spent some substantial sums in studying what system, what computer, and in turn invested in dual system—manual and computer—I think it was the year '64 where we were carrying a double dose of expense while we converted.

These three things that I have mentioned, including advertising as a fourth, were those matters that you speak of that affected our operations.

Mr. Fortier: Would this account for the fact that the first full fiscal year since you offered 30 per cent of your shares to the Canadian public, your net earnings are lower, but not by much, than your net earnings were in the first year after the O'Leary Report was published?

Mr. Zimmerman: There is a coincidence there.

Mr. Fortier: They have gone through a circle.

Mr. Zimmerman: This is a coincidence. I left one thing out that would be of interest to you. One of the most significant above and beyond the other four that mentioned respecting our operations was the cost of postage. Never did any nation in the world in the publishing business ever have such little notice and such high increases as we encountered in 1968. Now, getting back to your other question—would you mind just rephrasing that for me?

Mr. Fortier: Well, by 1969 you had your diversification program completed, at least as finished in 1964?

Mr. Zimmerman: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: And I see that in the first complete fiscal year since you went public in Canada, your net earnings were $209,159?

Mr. Zimmerman: Right.

Mr. Fortier: And I look up the scale and I see that in 1962 your net earnings were $269,000 and some odd dollars . . .

Mr. Zimmerman: Right.

Mr. Fortier: And I wonder how this has come about. Bear in mind the answer that you have given, but I also bear in mind that you have diversified as you were planning to.

Mr. Zimmerman: Well, the year in which you speak of which was the year following the issue of our stock, we had a postal strike which upset our ability in a key mailing period for most of a month and a half. It was a one or two or 21 or 23 days strike, but we had to stop in advance of it and we had to wait for the mail services to pick up in order to enter the mail. On top of that we ran into the most severe return of product and the most severe return of bills on other matters which substantially affected our business. At the same time that year, we were doing what we call the second phase of our computer conversion. We had done the magazine some two years earlier and we were then in the midst of the other two-thirds of our business activities converting to a computer, running a double system, unscrambling the computer operations—those to things are the most significant.

Mr. Fortier: One last question.

Mr. Zimmerman: Incidentally, they were unforeseen as to their definiteness at the time we went public.

Mr. Fortier: Well, that is the risk of going public.

Mr. Zimmerman: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: Or of remaining private, for that matter.

Mr. Zimmerman: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: You have spoken very eloquently on your policy of diversification. I wonder if you have in any way been hamstrung by any Canadian Statute or regulation in your acts of diversification?

Mr. Zimmerman: The answer to that is yes.

Mr. Fortier: Could you be more specific?

Mr. Zimmerman: Elaborate?

Mr. Fortier: Yes. It has often been said that Time and Reader's Digest were discriminated in favour of—forgive the Englishism—by being excluded from the application of section 12A of the Income Tax Act.

Mr. Zimmerman: There are two matters, both of them legislative in nature. There is the matter of the electronic communication and the ownership requirement. It would be quite natural for any publisher to want to extend the software side of his business into that communications industry . . .

Mr. Fortier: And 20 per cent or less is of no interest to you?

Mr. Zimmerman: I wouldn't say it is of no interest, it is of significantly less interest. Unless we have multiples of that 20 or 25 per cent it really wouldn't be of substantial interest. And as you know and I know, because of ruling there is a limit to the number as well as to the ownership. We are hamstrung on that matter.

The second one is what you would call section 12A of the Income Tax Act of 1965. There we are limited to the type and class of magazine that we published before. We have been concerned because at one time—and the example I might give you was Hostess produced by Maclean-Hunter. Initially, this was really an extension of Chatelaine's audience to people who didn't buy Chatelaine. With section 12A in front of us, it would have been literally impossible for us to meet that competition. We consider ourselves substantially restricted in both of those areas.

The Chairman: I am not sure I understand your last point.

Mr. Zimmerman: Perhaps I might ask John O'Brien to answer this.

Mr. John L. O'Brien, Q.C., Director, The Reader's Digest Association (Canada) Ltd.: We are limited to publishing . . .

The Chairman: Well, I understand that but I don't understand the Hostess reference.

Mr. Zimmerman: Oh, excuse me. Let me explain that part of it and then Mr. O'Brien might want to comment. Chatelaine had both a French and English edition. It brought out a controlled circulation periodical that I would describe as an adjunct—it did not go to the Chatelaine readership as such—it went to an additional selected audience which took them, as I recall, to a total exposure for an ad in both periodicals it was something of the order of $1.8 million or $2 million. We could not have enjoyed that experiment. Now, the magazine has since ceased to publish but that does not mean the idea is not viable.

The Chairman: Am I to understand that this would have been real competition for the Digest?

Mr. Zimmerman: Yes. We considered it competition.

The Chairman: Why did it fold?

Mr. Zimmerman: It probably hinges on your word 'readable' meaning size and significance. It never grew to a significance that disturbed us greatly, but we saw in our cracked, crystal ball, the sign of the potential attraction may be for extending audiences above and beyond the paid circulation and tied to a paid circulation vehicle.

Mr. Fortier: And then Mr. Kierans came along and helped you!

Mr. Zimmerman: That is a good point.

The Chairman: Well, if you were allowed to expand, would you have met this kind of competition with a new kind of publication assuming Hostess had survived?

Mr. Zimmerman: We would have at least experimented with it.

The Chairman: Does Reader's Digest have other publications in the United States?

Mr. Zimmerman: No it does not.

Mr. Fortier: Another question which flows from that one, Mr. Chairman. Does Reader's Digest have any electronic media interest in other countries?

Mr. Zimmerman: To my knowledge it owns no electronic medium.

Mr. Fortier: And prior to April, 1969, when the foreign ownership directive was handed down from the Cabinet to the CRTC, you had not done anything towards acquiring any interests?

Mr. Zimmerman: You are correct.

The Chairman: I am going to ask one supplementary question, then I am going to suggest we adjourn for a few minutes, then when we come back I will start with you, Senator Prowse. I am impressed to realize, as I just did a few minutes ago, that the witness is sitting here with his leg in a cast propped up on some kind of a rig here and that makes us doubly grateful. I had realized that. Perhaps I should have. I just wanted to ask one supplementary question, and it is a question which relates to the discussion we had here on the magazine industry.

Canadian magazines with no international interest came to us and said—if I can interpret their position I am sure you read it in the press—that it would be a terrible thing to remove the exemption as presently enjoyed by Time and the Reader's Digest because of the Canadian magazine industry, we would disappear. I put the question to the Time magazine people and they now put the same question to you. Do you share the rather gloomy forecast of the Canadian homegrown magazines that should the exemption ever be removed which you enjoy and which Time enjoys, that it would spell the beginning of the end of the native Canadian magazine industry?

Mr. Zimmerman: I will answer for myself rather than any comments for Time. The Canadian magazine industry, in my opinion, would be substantially unaffected. I think within a decade they would cease to be of a significance to the advertiser in this country.

The Chairman: Well, that leads to probably other questions and supplementaries so I think perhaps I will, as I suggested, adjourn for five minutes. It is now about 11.25, so could we try and come back at about 11.35 and I will start with you, Senator Prowse.

— A short recess.

The Chairman: I would like to call the session back to order, please. I think we can perhaps resume the questioning with Senator Prowse.

Senator Prowse: I have one more question regarding the matter of advertising in regards to the regions. I am not clear in my mind, Mr. Zimmerman—do you go into the regions for the purpose of meeting competition from other media, for the purpose of meeting competition from other print groups like magazine and newspapers, or is it for some other reason?

Mr. Zimmerman: We go into the regions to attract advertisers—the markets they wish to advertise in. That is as simply as I could put it.

Senator Prowse: Does this create new markets then to pry extra advertising revenue out of advertisers?

Mr. Zimmerman: I would think that it extends our advertising opportunities for revenue. Probably this factor will give you a better focus on it. I will ask Mr. Conduit to check me on this, but we have as a percentage of our whole national revenue, as I recall it, some 9 per cent or 9½ per cent roughly . . .

Mr. Conduit: It is roughly 12.

Mr. Zimmerman: Closer to 12?

Mr. Conduit: Yes.

Mr. Zimmerman: Some 12 per cent of our total revenue today in those regions. Now, the question remains, if we didn't have that, would we have some of that 12 per cent back in the national advertising area? I would think some of it but not a large proportion; maybe you could say a third of it, but it is more third than two-thirds. That probably gives you the best feel of it.

Senator Prowse: So really it just extends your ability to sell advertising and it is not really competition with other magazines or newspapers, or is it?

Mr. Zimmerman: I wouldn't want to say it was not competition with other magazines, because essentially we all started doing it at the same time. We are competitors in some cases with other magazines, but we are not as directly competitive with newspapers for good reason. Newspapers in every major city in Canada would have a higher circulation penetration than Reader's Digest. Now, the advertiser looks at this numbers, yes, but he also looks at the meaningfulness of those numbers in our section of the market and it doesn't take him head-on in any city. We don't have the exact audience as he has. As I mentioned we have a metropolitan, edition and only in Montreal, where we have the twin language edition although there is no twin language combination that I know of in that market. So they would have bigger numbers, they would have less selected audience values in income, education, and things of this nature.

Now, the major attraction, it seems to me, is to provide the advertiser with two things that he could not get through other media. The first one I would put as test marketing opportunities—so he can find out in a limited market—let us say Ontario—what is going to happen without him expending on a new product in inventory and a promotional and advertising cost of the whole nation. He can get into a national advertising medium—magazines—and test whether he should go further, by simply marketing in the area and confining his advertising to national magazines' regional editions or we might say city newspapers, and radio. We have about the same balance in effect on consumer attraction in buying, whereas he could not have had it before.

You know, this leads to a question—when newspapers choose to say that we in fact are attempting to compete actively with newspapers. This—and I might say it with a smile—is a chicken and egg story. What came first? Newspapers went into the national advertising field through weekend supplements with really the start of Weekend in 1951-52. Of course, magazines did not start in any degree in regional editions until well on into the early sixties, so they were there essentially a decade before. When I read what you and I might describe as points of view from people who are in other competitive media, I smile when a newspaper tries to establish the fact that magazines in some strange way are attacking their revenue when, in effect, the significance of regional advertising revenue is literally peanuts compared to the total national advertising revenue generated by weekend that a decade before. It seems to be a nebulous type of thing.

Senator Prowse: In other words, the purpose of the regional edition is to enable you to provide advertisers with additional service?

Mr. Zimmerman: Competitive convenience.

Senator Prowse: Well, we will move into another area now. When you decided to go public, you made 30 per cent of the stock of Reader's Digest available to the public; is that correct?

Mr. Zimmerman: There were two steps, Senator. The year before, we made some roughly 8 per cent available over a period of five years to the senior executives of the company, simply to take those executives who contributed most relative to their positions and favour them with a stock option plan. At the time we went public they purchased maybe 25 per cent as a maximum of the available stock because of its date due combinations.

Senator Prowse: Yes.

Mr. Zimmerman: Then we issued some 25 per cent of our stock through the normal dealer financial investment house structure to Canadians and we did everything we could to restrict it in the sense of Canadian control. We were most concerned of falling into a trap because there is no legislative control of ownership of stock.

Senator Prowse: Yes.

Mr. Zimmerman: We decided we might well offer in the only country in the world in which we were going public Reader's Digest stock which is world-wide known and by putting it through the Canadian stock exchanges still have ownership in India, Africa, the U.S., and whatnot, because of its international connotations in the field. We worked every method we could conceive to the distributing network to restrict the number of shares that any person could buy and to insist that they be Canadian citizens.

Senator Prowse: Is this in your articles or the by-laws of your company?

Mr. Zimmerman: No, we couldn't do it. There was just no method of making that stick—I mean a legal stick. What we did do rather was spread it widely across Canada. That is simply to say that on the average our dealers were instructed to not give any one person or purchaser more than a hundred shares as a maximum, so that gave little parcels spread right across the country. The second thing we did do was to select a dealer structure so that they were spread across the country where we could get broad distribution, and the third thing that we did—and laid considerable emphasis on this, then checked it in the sense of the transfer and registration side to see that in fact they did not sell this to anyone but Canadian citizens.

The fourth thing we did which caused considerable concern to employees around the world of Reader's Digest was have our Executive Vice President write a policy letter that was literally on the bulletin board of every Digest edition in the world that it was in management's interest not, through any mechanism, to purchase a share of the Canadian company's stock. I can assure you that they would have bought it all if they could have got their hands on it.

Mr. Fortier: How have you kept abreast of the ownership, though?

Mr. Zimmerman: Registration. We look at ours—well, there are methods and methods, I will quite agree with you. However, as far as we can tell, it has been a very good plan and very well executed. We could only trace—one grand-father that I know in Canada that gave some grand-children in the U.S. some shares, and they were so insignificant it would be less, as I recall it, than one per cent.

Mr. Fortier: I am wondering if Mr. O'Brien could expand and tell us how effective in the end this could really be in preventing American citizen "X" from purchasing shares on the Canadian stock exchange?

Mr. John L. O'Brien, Q.C., Director, The Reader's Digest Association (Canada) Ltd.: I don't think if there was a concerted drive by anyone to pick up the shares—I don't think it would be effective at all excepting to the extent that with a wide distribution in an area and among people who are not traders in the stock market, they probably don't dispose of their shares quite as readily. It would be very hard to judge by experience because, as you know, the first year was not a good financial year for the companies, so there wasn't the demand in financial circles for the shares.

Mr. Fortier: It has been a practical solution?

Mr. Zimmerman: That is right.

Senator Prowse: Is it in order to have people maintain their holdings, that you have followed a policy of fairly regular dividends regardless of what your earnings sheet showed?

Mr. Zimmerman: I think it was respect for the investment more than any other thing. We didn't anticipate at the time of the issue that we would drop maybe, well—to something less than $300,000 after tax earnings.

Senator Prowse: Yes.

Mr. Zimmerman: When in the previous year we had been in the area of $600,000 to $700,000. We did not anticipate this. I think we would have postponed the issue if we had anticipated it. Having seen this and done long-term projections on the potentials for the stock, our directors decided that in the interest of our shareholders it would be in our interest to carry on a consistent dividend at least in the first year.

Senator Prowse: Why did you pick the figure of 30 per cent?

Mr. Zimmerman: There was no magic in it. We were—in advance of Mr. Robert Winters' guidelines of corporate citizenship—attempting ourselves to determine what good corporate citizenship meant. We had been doing this long before by appointment in the Digest . . .

The Chairman: What year was that?

Mr. Zimmerman: May 1960. So I have had a decade. Now, in the terminate of what we assessed those guidelines should be, we carried out policies in Canada which we believed carried out, in full, the responsibility for good corporate citizenship. At the time of my employment, when I was talking to the owner of Reader's Digest, he asked me how I felt about the progress in this area. This was his first question. Let us recall that his wife was born in Canada . . .

Senator Prowse: Yes.

Mr. Zimmerman: And I replied that I thought they had done a very good job and he said "Is there anything else that you would advise us to do?" And I said "Yes, go public. We are in the communications business—or you are" and he said "That is an interesting suggestion and I will take it under favourable consideration." I said "Well, that answers one of my questions before I become involved with Reader's Digest—I would not look favourably on the employment unless you did." And he said "I have answered you."

When he appeared in Canada as one of the dignitaries at our building opening ceremony—I think it was in the year 1961—some year or year and a half following that conversation he, without any pre-knowledge on my part, announced it himself and he said, and I will paraphrase him. We have had the intention of being the finest corporate citizen of this country of any foreign affiliate, and he mentioned to many things we had done and then said that we had also been concerned that we have not been able to find the way to retain share control in Canadian hands in absolute terms and challenged our lawyers to try and find that way. They couldn't. That has previously been explained and I pleaded with him but really didn't need to. He said to me "Well, Paul, do you think we can find another formula that will in effect do this?" He became satisfied that we could find something that was reasonably good and in addition just in advance of our issue of that stock we had read the Winters' guidelines, were favourably impressed with them, met them and acceded to them with the exception of one; the one was the public stock offering which we were then planning.

Senator Prowse: Did you have any difficulty in this stock offering of establishing a price for the stock?

Mr. Zimmerman: Yes.

Senator Prowse: Did that reflect back . . .

Mr. Zimmerman: Well, to answer it truthfully and fairly, we did have considerable difficulty, probably more than a normal corporation doing the like thing. The reasons—some of the reasons have been brought to light by the questioning of Mr. Fortier. We had an up and down operating profit picture from '60 forward. We had been in front of a Royal Commission which had heard testimony for most of the year and then rendered its opinion. The Government of Canada hadn't rendered an opinion for four and a half or five years. During that period, surely we would have been dishonest to ever mislead a Canadian that they had a right to any continuing asset value in the corporation. We would never have done it. So it was an evolution of the combination of what comes next from the Government based on the experience we had in the past and what our operating profits were, and what good value would be to a Canadian with the attempt to get less for that stock than we believed it was truly worth.

Senator Prowse: You have a building in Montreal?

Mr. Zimmerman: Yes we do.

Senator Prowse: What other assets, and could you put a value on what might be described as the fixed assets that you have in Canada?

Mr. Zimmerman: I think we have disclosed that information in the early financial figures that were available, but let me paraphrase it.

Senator Prowse: Well, could you give me a rough figure?

Mr. Zimmerman: Well, let me put it this way. In the physical assets—before we put a value on them—we have a printing press located at Ronalds-Federated Ltd. on Park Avenue in Montreal. The reason it is there is a simple one to understand. Originally, when we looked in both Toronto and Montreal for the printing technology required to print our publication, we found the printing technology pretty well equal between the cities, but we couldn't find printing equipment that would print the quality that we wanted in that book. We then decided that we would be prepared to put the capital up and literally put the physical, mechanical equipment in somebody else's brick and mortar and write a printing production contract that was favourable to them, and we believe favourable to us. At that time the Ronalds-Federated principle had more to attract us than anyone else in Canada, and had the technological ability, and so we made the decision to locate it in Montreal.

Now, the second thing is carry that same philosophy through to anyone who was a supplier to the Digest—you see, the basic difference between the Reader's Digest and other publishers is that we don't compete with the graphic arts industry. All of our dollars are spent with the small and medium size printers going across this country. Many publishers have a publishing plant for publishing a newspaper, and sometimes a magazine, and then a number of them also have a printing plant and it is a natural evolution. I am not critical of this at all. But, they in effect compete with printing as well as remaining publishers. Reader's Digest does not. We own no brick and mortar in this country relating to manufacturing and we only provide the printing equipment when the resource capital at the printer level is not available.

Additionally, we have some 35 to 40 highly skilled technicians in our production department that guide these people to the latest technology. That equipment is never serviced without our o.k. and to our standards, and with our people guiding them, and the production quality and the production cost is analysed in depth to aid and abet the printer's survival.

We extended that into our plate-making with Meco Ltd. in Montreal. We own some equipment in the Meco plant for making our own special plates and when that isn't in use 100 per cent for the Digest, they are allowed to use it at no cost to them for supplying anybody else with curved plates. Also we have extended this into the bindery and plate-making and also the base equipment.

The gross investment and fixed assets and machinery is $3,500,000.

Senator Prowse: And that would include these presses that you have provided other printers with?

Mr. Zimmerman: Yes.

Senator Prowse: Do I understand you correctly? What you do—if a printer—if you think he has the ability—the fellow you want to do business with and he doesn't have presently the type of equipment necessary to provide what you require, you will . . .

Mr. Zimmerman: We will help him.

Senator Prowse: By what—loans, or by straight putting machinery in there, or what?

Mr. Zimmerman: No. Not certainly in my time we have not been involved—only in one case there was any loan or any loan concept and that was not for equipment—that was for services. We advanced one service supplier and I would rather not disclose who it was.

Senator Prowse: Yes, I understand that.

Mr. Zimmerman: We advanced some limited capital. If I recall it was $200,000 on a pay-back basis, over a few years and it has since been paid back. He got into a business he couldn't have been in otherwise and we did that because of both our interest in him—in his ability and ourself relating to services we needed and we didn't want to provide ourselves.

We manufacture nothing in this country. Absolutely nothing. The load is totally on the small and medium sized printers of the country. We have gone further. I have personally travelled the country to try to get an interest in provinces—a spread more related to the income of the Digest. I can recall an interview on a travel trip I had with the Canadian Manufacturers Association to Nova Scotia, and I talked to the—asked to recall it—the Minister of Industries for Nova Scotia who was pleading to a group of us and asking what we could do to help towards the better improvement of the economy and he particularly centered on me. He said he felt that the printing presses in Nova Scotia may be under-taxed if we could only get the Upper Canada loan concept, and I replied that we were desperately interested in this for selfish reasons but for very honourable ones, and we would like to benefit as evenly as we can the incomes we had spread across the country. And he said "Well, how will we go at it?" And I said "Well, the easiest way for us to go at it is for me to send to you, or one of your delegates, the type and class of promotion piece and/or product that we produce that is most likely to assist your needs, and then you send the specifications out and encourage people to contact us." We did that some eight years ago and, incidentally, it was almost out of that conversation that we invited the printing company—I forget the name—that was then managed by Michael Wardell. They were in the printing business as well as the newspaper and magazine business, and I remember saying to an editor—Doug Howe, who was an Atlantic province person and knew Mr. Wardell—"Why don't you drop him a note as an editor and tell him I have been literally interested in studying our load—could he or his facilities be interested in it?" We had an exchange of correspondence on the matter . . .

Senator Prowse: Well, these people don't print the magazine as well, do they?

Mr. Zimmerman: Well, they do in the case of Donalds-Federated Ltd.

Senator Prowse: They do?

Mr. Zimmerman: That is on our part.

Senator Prowse: That is in Montreal?

Mr. Zimmerman: Yes, in Montreal. We give them the paper and they print it.

Senator Prowse: Are all of these Digests printed in Montreal?

Mr. Zimmerman: Yes they are.

Senator Prowse: And the work you are talking about going to the other printer is the different type of work?

Mr. Zimmerman: Different products, material, packaging, and things of this nature, and also the promotion material. We are very large mail promotion people in this country.

Senator Prowse: Is there any . . .

The Chairman: I was just going to suggest that we perhaps turn to editorial matters . . .

Senator Prowse: I was about to change.

The Chairman: Fine.

Senator Sparrow: I would like to ask a supplementary?

The Chairman: On this printing aspect?

Senator Sparrow: Not on that particular aspect. Is there any effort being made or any plan for further Canadian ownership of the Digest?

Mr. Zimmerman: There are no plans currently under consideration that I am aware of, and I would be aware of any. I think this is a question of how successful we are in satisfying shareholder return on existing shares and we have great faith in that. This would not be the time to attract an additional proportion of our stock into Canadian hands in view of the results of my company in the most recent years.

However, in the longer term there is nothing of substance to prevent it, and I am sure, particularly with the members of our board who are Canadian, that we will continue to bring it up, so there is nothing binding one way or the other except the return to shareholders on the existing issue and the interest we have in extending as far as we can go the Canadian point of view through our operations from top to bottom.

The Chairman: Senator Prowse?

Senator Prowse: Now, on the editorial end of it, how much do you buy directly from Canadian writers? I know the magazine chiefly buys rights and reprints.

Mr. Zimmerman: Yes.

Senator Prowse: Is there a rough percentage of it that is new material that you use in the magazine and how much of it is acquired material?

Mr. Zimmerman: Well, we are presumably talking here about material we are not re-publishing but new material from Canadian writers literally contracted with or arranged with between our editor and the Canadian writer.

Senator Prowse: Yes.

Mr. Zimmerman: I would like to turn that question over to Ralph Hancox.

Mr. Ralph Hancox, Managing Editor, The Reader's Digest: Well, I think that Mr. Zimmerman said in his opening remarks that we are now working with some 50 Canadian writers on a variety of projects. To pull a figure out of a hat, I think, would be very misleading because our operation is a long term one and often may take up to a year to develop. I think also in that appendix that you have in front of you, there is a list of Canadian authors which is reasonably representative of the sort of contact we make and the material we publish from Canadian writers. I am sort of reluctant to put a percentage figure on it because it is an overlapping thing. We have now—say—10 pieces under immediate consideration, 30 under middle term, and some 40 to 45 under long term—continually paying authors, and we give a guarantee when the first manuscript is accepted and then we complete the fee when the manuscript is published. At the same time—for example, in the February issue if you look at the top first article—"The Day the Police Went on Strike" was an article by Gerald Clark who is the editor of the Montreal Star. He wrote it for the New York Times magazine but he benefited directly from the Canadian publication because he was paid for the reprint rights to it.

Senator Prowse: When you get reprint rights, do you buy it from the publication or from the writer?

Mr. Hancox: We have a formula, normally, which depends on the distribution of the rights we acquire and we say to the publisher "If you hold the rights to this article we would like to publish it, and our fee for doing so is 'X' dollars." This depends on whether we want the Canadian rights or U.S. and world rights which is split 60 per cent to the author and 40 per cent to the publisher, and then the author and the publisher agree and the cheque is mailed out. Some publishers say "Well, that is fine, but our split is 75 per cent to the author and 25 per cent for the publication"—there again, depending on their arrangement with the author. So both, in fact, benefit.

Senator Prowse: Now, I notice when I look through . . .

Mr. Zimmerman: I think there is an interesting point here and I would like to give you a short summary. There is no limiting percentage. What he is looking for is material largely of universal interest—certainly with a Canadian interest above and beyond the universal interest—that meets our standards and we work very hard trying to find more, and more, and there are no limits.

The Chairman: Senator Sparrow?

Senator Sparrow: You make reference to drawing material from a pool—an international pool. Would you buy editorial content direct from the parent company?

Mr. Zimmerman: Yes.

Senator Sparrow: A high percentage?

Mr. Zimmerman: It is part of our fee.

Senator Sparrow: Pardon me?

Mr. Zimmerman: It is part of our fee. When we say "direct from the parent company" it hinges on the fact of what Mr. Hancox referred to as the pool. He submits to the pool—each international editor submits to the pool and the pool emanates from articles that they have spotted in other periodicals and good ideas which they have honed which they may delegate either to be a freelance writer that they think is especially qualified on the subject, or to one of our several roving editors who would be especially qualified.

Senator Sparrow: Would you receive a price preference by dealing with the parent company than you would by dealing with a publisher or an author in Canada as an example?

Mr. Zimmerman: I don't really think so. It is a case where the total editorial costs are in one way or another dispersed as equitably as one can over the whole of the Digest world. You might refer to it as more of an out-of-pocket cost where if that was marketable to an arm's length transaction, you would not take your out-of-pocket costs—you would mark it up, but the question is whether you could mark it up. The Digest carries editorial material that is not normally of interest to other magazines.

Senator Sparrow: Do you have any special arrangements with the Department of National Revenue as far as the purchasing of editorial content from your parent company is concerned?

Mr. Zimmerman: We would say that from our extensions—meaning the tax standards—we have never been questioned. Meaning that we know of no arrangement at all.

The Chairman: Mr. Fortier?

Mr. Fortier: On what basis, Mr. Zimmerman, is the fee to the motherhouse, the parent, calculated?

Mr. Zimmerman: It is basically a parent company assessment of the cost of what has been prepared and dispersed across the corporate structure of the affiliates of the Digest including the parent company on the basis of revenue.

Mr. Fortier: On the basis of revenue to the parent corporation?

Mr. Zimmerman: No.

Mr. Fortier: Or to the . . .

Mr. Zimmerman: On the basis of the proportion of revenue which the affiliates hold to the whole revenue, the consolidated revenue.

Mr. Fortier: So that the Canadian edition would have a set percentage fixed at the beginning of a certain year?

Mr. Zimmerman: Yes, that is correct.

Mr. Fortier: For a one year period?

Mr. Zimmerman: It is a continuing thing. It could be opened at a point.

Mr. Fortier: Has it fluctuated so far as the Canadian edition is concerned?

Mr. Zimmerman: Not substantially, no.

Mr. Fortier: Would you care to tell us what this portion of the Canadian cost to the international operation would be?

Mr. Zimmerman: Mr. Fortier, we really have answered that question privately to you in our financial statements. We have stated what that formula is and I believe it is even in our brief.

Mr. Fortier: It is not in the brief.

The Chairman: Well, Mr. Fortier, we have the information. The witness is correct.

Mr. Fortier: Well, we have the information, but if you don't care to answer . . .

Mr. Zimmerman: I wouldn't like to make it public.

Mr. O'Brien: It is in our annual report.

Mr. Zimmerman: Excuse me, our able legal counsel has informed me that it was in our original perspective that it has been made public. I had forgotten that, and I am sorry for the oversight. It reads this way—as a table headed by gross revenues in U.S. dollar equivalents. That is up to $2 million worth of Canadian company net revenue we would pay a 3 per cent royalty. On $2 million and $1 up to $5 million, 2-½ per cent. On $5 million and $1 to $10 million, 2 per cent. On $10 million and $1 up to $20 million, 1-½ per cent, and in excess of $20 million, 1 per cent. So it is a graded scale.

Our revenue now, as of 1969, was between $17 million and $20 million.

Mr. Fortier: So I can figure out what fee was paid?

Mr. Zimmerman: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: Has the scale changed since 1967?

Mr. Zimmerman: Well, it changed in advance of our going public for a very sound reason. We wanted to have a publishing agreement that was of substantial value to the investing shareholder in Canada and we requested from the Canadian point of view a re-assessment. At that point they took a look at it, studied it for some months, and they came out with a different formula but its respect in costs on the Canadian companies was not dissimilar from the costs previously. There is no significance to the difference at all as far as Canada is concerned except on the basis of percentage of revenue.

Mr. Fortier: Is this formula of universal application or is it regional?

Mr. Zimmerman: It is of universal application.

Mr. Fortier: With all affiliates?

Mr. Zimmerman: Yes, with all affiliates.

Mr. Fortier: There is no edition which is treated differently than another?

Mr. Zimmerman: No.

The Chairman: Perhaps at this point I could ask—I am sorry, do you have further questions Mr. Fortier?

Mr. Fortier: I have a few more questions.

The Chairman: Well, please go ahead.

Mr. Fortier: Is there any compulsion from Pleasantville for the Canadian edition to use a particular article from the pool? In other words, when the world-wide rights are purchased, are the regional editions compelled to publish the article in question?

Mr. Zimmerman: The answer is no. They are not compelled. [Translation]

Mr. Fortier: Is it good policy to publish the article in question?

Mr. Zimmerman: No, I don't think so. It is an affiliate editor responsibility and two of them are here who are very capable of speaking for themselves. I have never found any compulsion or any pressure, and I am sure it would have come to my desk as well as to theirs. I might qualify that to be very fair on the subject. There is certainly a compulsion to avoid taking advertising on the cigarette subject which does not relate to editorial opinion.

Mr. Fortier: Yes. Well, what I am also curious about—let us take an article such as "The Day the Police Went on Strike" which you have already referred to. This was condensed from the New York Times magazine. The arrangements which you made with the New York Times magazine—did it precede the publication of the article in New York or did it follow it?

Mr. Zimmerman: I will ask my editors to confirm or deny my statement, but my statement is that we followed publication. Is that correct?

Mr. Hancox: Yes. We had no knowledge that it was going to be in the New York Times magazine. As a matter of fact, I saw it and said it was a very good piece and called Pleasantville and said "Why don't you take a look at this," and this is what happened.

Mr. Fortier: You didn't make a deal in advance?

Mr. Hancox: No.

Mr. Fortier: I think the members of the committee would like to know—were you looking for an article on the October 7 riot?

Mr. Hancox: No.

Mr. Fortier: I mean, did you favour to solicit one from any source?

Mr. Hancox: No. I mean, how does editorial selection go? I mean, you keep abreast of current events, you watch current magazines and publications for matters bearing on these things and consider it. If there is nothing available, then you consider the idea of developing it.

Me Fortier: Mr. Ranger, did that article appear in "Selection"?

Mr. Pierre Ranger, Editor in Chief, Selection, Reader's Digest (Canada) Limited: Yes, it appeared simultaneously.

Me Fortier: The same month?

Mr. Ranger: Yes, the same month.

Me Fortier: I noticed that most if not all the articles which were published in both the French and English editions can be summed up somewhat as follows: first it is published in the English edition and then in the French edition or in both simultaneously. I did not see a single one which had been published first in the French edition and then in the English edition.

Mr. Ranger: There are some but they are Canadian articles because I feel that we are an international magazine. We almost always simultaneously publish articles of more or less international interest which are Canadian. However, it often happens that, in the pool you mentioned, the American pool, those articles which appear in the parent edition, also appear in the various other editions. Often we publish an article in the French-Canadian edition before the English Canadian editions—at times even a few months before hand. I would like to give an example: we often publish articles of general interest, for example, an article on Versailles, or on Germany when, at certain times, we require additional material for the test. This means we may have to publish the article in the French edition at an earlier date than in the English edition. And this is done quite often.

Me Fortier: I admit that what I saw was in appendix 3. I did not see a one.

Mr. Ranger: If you check the dates, you will see that in some cases the appendix mentions things of purely Canadian interest. If there are things of international interest, there is no appendix to cover that. You would see that there are several. At times there are even American articles but that rarely occurs. However, Ralph may not find those articles interesting while I do find them interesting and publish them before him. Even later he may not use them. I would say that the main reason why Sélection du Reader's Digest is somewhat late is that on occasion the translation problem arises. We prefer that it be excellent French rather than trying to publish it simultaneously. We are not a "news magazine".

Mr. Hancox: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: Will those same translation problems not occur for the English edition in the normal course of events?

Mr. Fortier: It doesn't mean that the Canadian English edition is in all points identical to the American edition?

Mr. Ranger: Yes, to a certain extent but in a less significant way.

Mr. Zimmerman: It does not mean that, you are correct.

Mr. Fortier: Is the pool more English than French?

The Chairman: I wonder if I might ask Mr. Zimmerman whether Reader's Digest is a Canadian magazine?

Mr. Ranger: Yes, but it is not exclusively English. For about the past ten years we have had quite a few things not only in French but also in German. It must be admitted that the Digest's main emphasis is English but not to the exclusion of others, far from it.

Mr. Zimmerman: Well, I had the same question proposed at the Royal Commission on Publications and the answer certainly hasn't changed. We have never claimed to be a Canadian magazine. We have always maintained it is a magazine of universal interest—an international magazine.

[English]

Mr. Fortier: Maybe I should direct this question to Mr. Hancox. As I read or as I look at your February issue, I see on the masthead page the English magazine is published simultaneously each month in Canada and the United States. There is no such reference to simultaneous publication in Sélection. What is the meaning of published simultaneously each month in Canada and the United States?

The Chairman: You would not then say it is an American magazine?

Mr. Hancox: Well, as you may be aware, the United States is a signatory to the one copyright convention and Canada is a signatory to another, and this simultaneous publication is a copyright protection to those articles of the countries of both agreements.

Mr. Zimmerman: No, I would not say it is an American magazine. I would say that it is truly the only international magazine of substance in the world. That chart portrays it from the standpoint of the multilanguage side as well as the circulation.

Mr. Fortier: I am curious . . .

The Chairman: I would like to ask you a couple of questions about the chart if I might. First of all, there are as I understand it 20 editions of Reader's Digest, one of which is the Canadian edition. Is that correct?

Mr. Zimmerman: Well, I think you are . . .

Mr. Hancox: I am not an expert on copyright.

The Chairman: Am I low?

Mr. Fortier: Well, I don't find it in the French élection.

Mr. Hancox: It is in fact 29.

Mr. Hancox: Well, you see, once the copyright has been obtained for publication, then of course the article is protected.

The Chairman: Well, I apologize. Twenty-nine editions.

Mr. Fortier: Unless the article appears first in élection?

Mr. Hancox: That includes five Braille issues.

Mr. Hancox: Yes, and in which case that copyright will have been perhaps copyrighted in another country first.

The Chairman: Yes. Well, of the 24 non-Braille editions—what is the Canadian batting average in terms of getting Canadian articles into international editions? Some of these articles have 23 million readers. Do these other 24 publications similarly try to get their native articles into the international publication?

Mr. Fortier: That is the only meaning of it?

Mr. Zimmerman: Well, to answer your first question, more than 50 per cent of what we publish in Canada from what you and I might call written by Canadian or about Canada will appear in the majority of the international editions.

The Chairman: Well, what are some of the other editions? Are there South American editions?

Mr. Zimmerman: Yes.

The Chairman: Well, how do the South American publishers and editors do comparatively in getting their material in the magazine?

Mr. Zimmerman: Well, I have never studied that in absolute terms, but I would think not as well as Canada for a couple of good reasons.

The Chairman: Well, that was my next question. What are those reasons?

Mr. Zimmerman: Well, the fact that North American pool of editorial material is substantially greater from the writer graphic arts standpoint than any continent in the free world, says itself that the ability is there. The literacy level of the population and the economy is there. So these are primarily the reasons why we would have an advantage. There is another one. The fact that we live next door to the biggest power in the world and have a history of influencing it and getting along with it is probably another reason. The founder's wife is a Canadian, but how much we can put on that one, I don't know. Certainly, that is another interest.

The Chairman: Would there be another reason? I put it to you not at all, please believe me Mr. Zimmerman, to be unpleasant, but I think at this kind of a session we have to ask these kind of questions—wouldn't it be partially enlightened self-interest?

Mr. Zimmerman: Yes.

The Chairman: You said at the beginning that you have a determined Canadian policy as I recall.

Mr. Zimmerman: Yes.

The Chairman: Well, to the extent that it would be enlightened self-interest and in putting that to you I am not questioning your own Canadianism at all, and I am sure you appreciate that, but shouldn't we then at the same time as we have been critical, or some people in the magazine industry have been critical of Senator O'Leary's report for the depressing effect it had on magazine revenues—didn't it perhaps do something towards creating a greater sense of the need for Canadian policies on the part of companies like yours?

Mr. Zimmerman: Unquestionably. I think he contributed a number of things, that being one of them, or his committee did.

Mr. Hancox: Well, I think it also has to be said that the decision on the publication of an article is an editorial one. If it doesn't measure up then it doesn't go in the book, no matter where it comes from.

The Chairman: Well, I wanted to ask you just a couple of things on the chart which you unveiled. I would be curious to know—"A Canadian's Letter to the American People." Who was the Canadian who wrote that?

Mr. Hancox: Bruce Hutchinson.

The Chairman: Presumably, you know, there are all kinds of Canadians who could write a letter to the American people and I am sure Mr. Hutchinson wrote quite a different letter than the one Walter Gordon might have written.

Senator Prowse: And a better one possibly as well!

The Chairman: Well, that is a matter of judgment, Senator Prowse. You and I may disagree on that. You have this awful responsibility as editor or as editors of determining what the Canadian point of view is? I quite agree some one has to, but in terms of your publication, this is a pretty somber responsibility, isn't it?

Mr. Hancox: Well, no. We don't have the responsibility of determining what the Canadian viewpoint is. Our responsibility is to the Canadian magazine. We suggest material to our international pool and their decision on whether they want it in that pool, of course, is theirs, not ours.

The Chairman: Well, I take that point. I am not ever going to speak to you on the fact that "Hockey: Marvellous Methuselah" is American! I won't even mention that fact.

Mr. Zimmerman: May I remind you that you are overlooking many other Canadians that we have written about including Bobby Hull!

The Chairman: Well, he is on the list. I was going to ask you a question but it would be unfair . . .

Senator Prowse: I don't know how you got off that one!

The Chairman: Well, let me put it to you. I believe it will be a tough question for you to answer. If we were interested in the amount of Canadian material that was published in the international edition of Time, would it be fair to say that the Reader's Digest comparative figures are rather more impressive?

Mr. Zimmerman: Well, I wouldn't want to speak in absolute terms on that matter because Time is a different magazine. Time is a news magazine. In my opinion Canada needs a news magazine.

The Chairman: Apart from Time?

Mr. Zimmerman: Apart and including Time. I think competition in the news magazine field is essential and it is my belief that Canada could use a good news magazine written for and managed by Canadians.

Mr. Fortier: They said Homemaker's Digest was a good magazine as well, Mr. Zimmerman.

Mr. Zimmerman: I am not speaking, Mr. Fortier, of Homemaker's Digest. I appreciate your humour.

The Chairman: That is more than most of us do!

Mr. Zimmerman: He seems to have it both in the English and French tongue. I would not want to comment on Time in the sense of its magazine contribution to Canada, other than to say that I think it is a good magazine and it fills a need. I have also said that I think there is a place for a good Canadian-owned and managed news magazine.

The Chairman: Mr. Ranger says there is one in French—Sept-Jours.

Mr. Zimmerman: I was thinking from the English point of view.

The Chairman: I appreciate that.

Mr. Zimmerman: The second point I would like to make is that the difference between magazines like Reader's Digest and some other international magazines is this: we are a general magazine, we carry a lot of informative information written in depth about a particular subject, much broader coverage and type than of course you carry in news magazines. Additionally, we publish in some 14 languages and have, as Senator Davey point out, excluding the Braille editions, some 24 editions around the world with a total audience exposure of over 100 million people. There just isn't anything that compares with it and its ability to propagate Canada, or any other subject of universal appeal.

The Chairman: I think you have dealt with that adequately and perhaps I can turn to your editor of the English magazine. I read in the brief at page 5. "All Digest articles . . . have the common thread of universal interest", and so on. And then you say:

"It is the task of the Canadian editors to contribute to and select from this pool for their monthly editions . . ."

And we have discussed this, I think, and to "develop articles with a Canadian focus." Well, let us not talk about developing articles—let us talk for a moment about adapting articles. My specific question to you is: How do you adapt articles with a Canadian focus?

Mr. Hancox: Well, that simply isn't the question. It depends on the article first of all. And, for example, one adaptation which was mentioned earlier in Mr. Zimmerman's remarks—"The National Menace of Shoplifting". There was an article in the United States on this subject in the parent edition and we looked at it and it was obviously one which we couldn't use in Canada because it had no relevance to us. The figures were different, the examples were different, and the locations were different, and so we opened a research file on it.

We started inquiring from various department stores, protection agencies, and so on, about this problem of shoplifting and it became evident after we gathered a file that it was a good story to be told and one which ought to be told, and so we went to a Canadian writer and said "Here is a file on shoplifting, here is the original article—is there a parallel in Canada, and if there is not, you tell us." At that point he submits an outline and the outline either confirms or denies, and he is paid for the outline. In other words, he doesn't colour the story to get the business—he puts together a final article on shoplifting in Canada and it is published in the books. There are other examples . . .

The Chairman: Use your current February edition . . .

Mr. Hancox: Well, I have a list of adaptations here, as a matter of fact. There are some things in which Canada and the United States are jointly interested in. For example, if you take the business of consumer credit—if you were dealing with credit cards. A large number of people carry around in their pocket American Express credit card or Diner's Club cards, Chargex cards, Nova Scotia cards, et cetera. Now, it would be pointless for us, dealing only with the Canadian experience, to tell people how to use or how to handle their credit card without saying something about the United States because a number of the credit card companies are in the United States. So in that case we research our own credit situation here and take the American article and adapt it so it is particularly relevant to Canadian readers.

Another example would be a story on genealogy—tracing your family tree.

The Chairman: What kind of articles would need no adaptation?

Mr. Hancox: Well, every article that we publish is read to see—well, for example, a story about Versailles wouldn't need any adaptation. A story about the Prado museum in Madrid wouldn't need adaptation.

The Chairman: Well, looking at your March issue—"Is There a Substitute for God"—that wouldn't need any adaptation?

Mr. Hancox: No.

Mr. P. Ranger: Those are our best articles.

The Chairman: Of mini skirts and panty-hose . . .

Mr. Hancox: It may need adaptation in India, but not in Canada.

The Chairman: No, but is there a formula in each issue for a percentage of Canadian articles or a percentage of adapted articles?

Mr. Hancox: No. The thing is done on editorial balance. That is to say there is an on-going program of available material. You select your table for the magazine to give the maximum possible readership interest in any given edition. You don't say we are going to have three from Germany, four from Sweden, five from somewhere else. The idea is to give a completely balanced table.

The Chairman: Mr. Hancox, in the final analysis are you responsible to an editor at Pleasantville or are you responsible to your publisher?

Mr. Hancox: Well, the Canadian company pays our salary, but our responsibility is to—since we are part of an international team and since the United States in any case holds the copyright—and it is easy enough to destroy a copyright—then they reserve the right to look over what we are going to do.

The Chairman: Who makes the final decision about what will go in the magazine, you or an editor in Pleasantville?

Mr. Hancox: We do. If we don't want something in the magazine, it doesn't go.

The Chairman: Mr. Fortier?

Mr. Fortier: If they don't want something in the magazine, does it go?

Mr. Hancox: Well, you see, everybody has contributed to the pool, so in a sense that . . .

Senator Prowse: If it is in the pool, you use it?

Mr. Hancox: Yes, if it is in the pool, you use it.

Mr. Ranger: Can I express my view on this?

The Chairman: By all means.

Mr. Ranger: There is a certain amount of give and take . . .

The Chairman: Would you prefer to speak in French?

Mr. Ranger: No. Since the question was put in English, I will answer it in English.

The Chairman: Fine.

Mr. Ranger: There is a certain amount of give and take but not on the question of whether such and such an article will be in, or isn't, but for reason of balance and for reasons of interest I will present a table and this is my subject. Naturally, an article on Canada—on French Canada, and on France—let us say that I have a tendency to include that in preference to all other things being equal than other things, but the main thing is to have a balanced issue in the number of pages that you have, and for that reason we do submit a table, but the discussion is on how interesting it will be.

Mr. Fortier: To whom do you submit that?

Mr. Ranger: There is an international editor—Mr. Adrian Berwick . . .

Mr. Fortier: He is the international editor?

Mr. Ranger: He is the head of the international editing branch; he is the one who is mainly responsible for editorial relations with the international editions.

Mr. Fortier: And you prepare the table?

Mr. Ranger: I prepare the table.

Mr. Fortier: And then you don't submit it to Mr. Zimmerman but rather to the international editor?

Mr. Ranger: I don't submit it to Mr. Zimmerman—I submit it to Adrian Berwick's office.

Mr. Fortier: Who works in Pleasantville?

Mr. Ranger: Yes.

Mr. Hancox: Well, Mr. Zimmerman would normally get a copy?

Mr. Ranger: He gets a copy, but it is submitted to Mr. Berwick.

Mr. Fortier: And that is a table which includes the titles which you would like to publish in any given month?

Mr. Ranger: That is right.

Mr. Fortier: And then what happens? Could you follow it through?

Mr. Ranger: It is generally approved as it is and after a few years I am beginning to know my onions, but once in a while they will say "You have too much duplication there, or you have a conflict of titles and it is a little similar—we suggest that you replace it." I generally send a list of alternates and usually from my experience they will say we suggest you use this one.

Mr. Fortier: Have they ever killed the publication of an article which you have submitted for reasons other than too much weight on education, or too much weight on . . .

Mr. Ranger: No. There may be the killing in the case, for example, of an article that is outdated. They will say—we found that—for example, there was one recently in the English Canadian edition called "Am I a Wife or a Widow?" and they found out that she was a widow . . .

Senator Prowse: They solved that one!

Mr. Fortier: And then your table is approved in Pleasantville?

Mr. Ranger: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: And that is the end of any censorship or approval or disapproval that you may be looking for?

Mr. Ranger: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: You are then on your own?

Mr. Ranger: I am on my own, but I am sure though that I send a copy after to Pleasantville and they read it.

Mr. Fortier: In this respect is the French edition treated the same way as the English edition?

Mr. Ranger: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: Are the two Canadian editions treated the same way as all other regional editions?

Mr. Hancox: All other international editions.

Mr. Fortier: So they must all be approved in Pleasantville?

Mr. Hancox: Yes. The tables are looked over for the reasons Mr. Ranger gave.

Mr. Fortier: Yes.

The Chairman: Who is the roving editor?

Mr. Hancox: David MacDonald.

The Chairman: Oh, I have seen articles by him.

I will say to the Senators—I have only two other questions but perhaps some of the senators will have questions. Senator Sparrow?

Senator Sparrow: Under the circulation of the French edition of 280,000—do you have a provincial breakdown on that circulation?

Mr. Ranger: I don't have it with me. The best figures are from ABC and I know them pretty well.

Mr. Hancox: Well, I think Mr. Davey would have them.

Mr. Zimmerman: Well, this would break down, I think, from an interest point of view from your standpoint to what the spread is in Canada, what it is in the U.S., what it might be in what we might call the marketing area of the Digest—the Canadian edition of the Digest also covers the West Indies—so there are really three of significance there. I can call these to you from a Canadian point of view quickly.

Newfoundland, French, 107 copies; Nova Scotia, 237; Prince Edward Island, 13; New Brunswick, 2,800; Quebec, 247,644; Ontario 7,817; Manitoba, 765; Saskatchewan, 445; Alberta, 786; British Columbia, 596; Yukon and Northwest Territories, 41. Total, all other foreign, 15,859.

Mr. Ranger: That 15,000 is mostly in the United States.

Senator Sparrow: Do you do anything to encourage the readership of the French edition in the other parts of Canada? Anything specific?

Mr. Ranger: I can't answer that.

Senator Sparrow: The reason I ask that is that you refer in your original remarks under questioning that in no way do you restrict anyone applying for a subscription, and you said there was a form in every magazine, and in the two that are in front of me there in fact isn't. Now, unless they have been removed . . .

Mr. Zimmerman: Excuse me, Senator, I was referring to the newsstand copy and you most probably have a subscriber's copy. We wouldn't ask a subscriber who is already subscribing to subscribe to another copy unless they did so voluntarily.

Senator Sparrow: So they go out separately than the newsstand copies?

Mr. Zimmerman: That is right.

Senator Sparrow: In that subscription form is there a preference given to the reader anywhere in Canada that he could receive that edition in French or English?

Mr. Zimmerman: No I wouldn't think so. What we do there—it is a matter of finding the market in the tongue in which it is preferred, which in itself is a difficult thing in Canada, because if you dealt with the Province of Quebec, for example, there are a number of French-speaking people who would probably buy Reader's Digest because they want to improve their English and conversely there are English-speaking people in the province who would buy it because they want to improve their French, and some buy it both ways so they can compare, because over any two or three issues you have a number of articles that are the same, and so from a language standpoint this might interest them. We make no restrictions whatsoever; we rather look for those communities where there is a predominance of French or English tongue present and try to promote them for subscribers in the best economic way we can.

Senator Sparrow: Do you have a mail-out for subscriptions for the Province of Saskatchewan in French?

Mr. Zimmerman: We would pick that up in the sense of testing whether they are interested. We would make sample mailings to see if it was worth while, and we have done this rather frequently and it proved to be worth while, meaning that the cost of getting the subscriptions from that community in a special language sense was worth a minimum loss and hopefully at a breakeven or better.

Senator Sparrow: Of the 445 subscriptions in Saskatchewan, how would they be obtained?

Mr. Zimmerman: Most of those would have come because we publish in the masthead in the front of the magazine the multi-language combination for Reader's Digest, and so every reader of the English edition and every reader of the French edition would know we publish in other languages. The ethnic groups of Canada in some cases have preferred something above and beyond the English and French versions. We have subscribers that we have transferred to our German edition and we have subscribers that we have transferred to our Italian edition, and so on around the world, even in Asia, and if they request it in any language which they prefer it will be serviced.

Mr. Fortier: Could I subscribe as a Canadian to your American edition?

Mr. Zimmerman: Yes. I am smiling because it is a Canadian point of view and I didn't want to distort the answer. You would really have to ask twice, but if it was the other way you would only have to ask once! We might try to have you ask three times—it is a little difficult, but you would get it.

The Chairman: Are there other questions? Senator Prowse, I believe you have a couple.

Senator Prowse: The thing I am interested in—I read through your list of things here and I saw David MacDonald turn up. He is a roving reporter, is he not?

Mr. Zimmerman: Yes.

Senator Prowse: What about June Calwood?

Mr. Hancox: Well, June Calwood—that would be, I suspect, from another magazine—yes, Maclean's.

Senator Prowse: What I am interested in is chiefly this. Are you able to provide a market for aspiring Canadian writers?

Mr. Hancox: Yes. Our adaptation program, for example, is one in which we work with—if somebody suggests that they would like to write for the Digest, which is not the easiest thing in the world to do because it is a long editorial process, we assess what work they have done in the past and then if they look promising we suggest an adaptation of the kind that I was describing to Senator Davey earlier. We take them through this process and, for example, Janice Tyrwhitt marked down there and Janice began with us doing adaptations and now she is writing special articles, and Linnine Locke similarly, and Robert Collins, and we are now working with a variety of writers on this program.

Mr. Zimmerman: Well, Senator, we go deeper than that. That, of course, is what puts dollars and cents in the pay envelopes of the income of the professional writer today.

Senator Prowse: Yes.

Mr. Zimmerman: We go much deeper than that as responsible corporate citizens. We have carried for years the program of bursaries to the burgeoning writer—the fellow that has a smell and an interest, or the lady that has the smell and the interest—there is no discrimination between male and female in that sense because all we are looking for is their ability. And so at Laval we cover a bursary of substance and we have maintained it for years. Carleton has a good school of journalism and we do the same thing. At the University of Western Ontario, we do it. We do it with the University of Montreal. We go deeper still. We go to Ryerson Institute that isn't a degree-giving journalism school, but it has turned out some cracker-jacks. Above and beyond that we carried for years the Canadian Nieman fellowship. Ralph Hancox represents one of the people who was, first, successful in getting the bursary—and he competed for the right to obtain it—and, then in graduating. To send a qualified graduate journalist for a year's study at Harvard University in a professional graduate journalism program might involve a cost of $10,000 to $18,000 to the Canadian company. I think this indicates the interest we have in writers.

Senator Prowse: Thank you very much.

The Chairman: I have only two questions, if I may, and you may ask the last question, Mr. Fortier, but I would like to adjourn in five minutes. I think this is a question you will expect because I am sure you have answered it many, many times. From time to time I have heard people criticize the whole philosophy of literary condensation because, for example, the style is lost. Would you comment on that?

Mr. Zimmerman: Gladly, and one of our editors might want to express his point of view. This has been a discourse of what I would call the sophisticate who we have found has not studied our product. If you take the writers for our magazines, or the writers for our books and ask them that cold, hard question—and we have repeated verbal testimony of this—I have asked them as a curious businessman "Is it better, is it worse, what's missing"—all of the loaded questions. I get consistently back one answer, "I didn't realize how little I said in my original. It is a clear, more lucid product and I am proud to have my name on it." Out of professional writers, probably numbering 100—that has consistently come back to me. I think it is unfortunate that the disparaging reference is made because it is a matter of using good language mechanics very carefully and very responsibly.

Senator Prowse: In other words, the writers are happy?

Mr. Zimmerman: Very much so. One other thing I might throw in at this stage in answering that question is that we are also very happy because in the case of our condensed books, which is a good example, this gives them income far and above in many cases what they would get from the original rights. The fact that we have such a substantial audience in Canada and in other nations for books that are condensed is a whole new income level to them and they literally fight and work to get their fiction accepted because of the tremendous income that follows it through the multi-language profit publication of our condensed books.

Mr. Ranger: Usually a condensation of a book, either in a magazine or in our condensed books increases the sale of the original.

Mr. Zimmerman: Yes.

The Chairman: Has any attempt been made to condense some of the great English literature?

Mr. Zimmerman: Yes.

The Chairman: By Reader's Digest?

Mr. Hancox: It is interesting that some of the world's best writers—if you consider Charles Dickens—I like him very much, I enjoy him . . .

The Chairman: Yes.

Mr. Hancox: Charles Dickens was paid by the word and also delivered weekly instalment through the newspapers.

Mr. Zimmerman: Well, I might add something here. From talking to our editors in a broad sense—meaning the editors in Pleasantville on books, magazines, my editors, our book editors—when I say “my” I don’t mean that in a captive sense—our editors. When I talk to them I find in asking them questions about the condensing mechanism that they reply this way: there are articles and books we cannot condense. They are so concisely written that we wouldn’t insult ourselves, let alone the author. We do condense on those articles, or on those books that our professional talent developed in over 40 years of publishing says can be more informative and less tiring, you might say, by some condensation, but it does not apply to every article or every book.

The Chairman: My last question, Mr. Zimmerman, is how is the philosophy—your editorial philosophy evolving? You say in the brief at page 7:

“ . . . man responds more readily, and more creatively, to optimism than he does to despair.” Is the Digest changing its philosophy in the light of the permissive society? In the light of the enormous problems we have today?

Mr. Zimmerman: No, it is not. I can answer it in a more illuminating way by saying that we have even had advertisements which have indicated that the Digest is a “go go” magazine—the common reference—and these advertisements . . .

The Chairman: I have one of them in front of me. “There is nothing square about the Digest. Controversial and contemporary subjects are part of every issue. “The pill and the teenage girl”—“But mom, everybody smokes ‘pot’”—“This stranger my son” does this indicate a change in direction?

Mr. Zimmerman: No it does not. What it is indicating is exactly what was aimed by—I think it was Senator Prowse—what we do with material or what material we don’t accept because of the old lady in tennis shoes concept, or something of this nature. Quite frankly, it is a case where we are updating ourselves with current information and we add a pill. It is responsible citizenship as clear as I can see it reminding the reader of the responsibility he has in any article that lends itself to that kind of concept and most of them do. Whether it is the pill, or whether it is short skirts, or whatever, the intention is to inform them in today’s connotation with information that will lead them and challenge them rather than discourage them.

The Chairman: Senator Prowse?

Senator Prowse: If you had an article that comes out and then there is dissent about it—let’s take the type of thing where you express a point of view—what arrangements do you have to provide for dissent in your magazine—dissent from the point of view that has been carried in, say, one of these issues? Suppose a reader takes exception to an article where they think you haven’t covered it thoroughly or fully, or that you haven’t given the other point of view.

Mr. Zimmerman: I would presume that you might be making the comparison between Letters to the Editor in the newspaper versus maybe the Digest—is that it?

Senator Prowse: Yes. This is about the best they do and it is a thing that we are concerned with, and that is getting a variety of opinions on the same subject in the same magazine so that they get in front of the same reader. This is a problem with which I am concerned, at least, and . . .

Mr. Hancox: Well, for example, we attempt in publishing a point of view, to assure ourselves from all standpoints—we are not normally a magazine of opinion . . .

Senator Prowse: No.

Mr. Hancox: . . . to assure ourselves that this is a balanced viewpoint. Now, the question of readers' replies is not possible because, for example, we prepare our magazine so far in advance that by the time the reply appeared everybody would have forgotten what the article was about, so we attempt first off to get a balanced viewpoint.

Also, we consider that the Digest is one in a whole spectrum of public information which people receive from newspapers, from radio, from television, from other magazines, from technical journals, and so on, and that if, for example, a viewpoint is not being covered in that spectrum we may well take a look at it. But if it is generally in the spectrum, we look for things that are worth printing because our motto is that it is of enduring interest because you can pick up the Digest a year from today and read it and it will be more interesting as a magazine than any of our contemporaries.

Mr. Ranger: If I may add also, there are certain subjects on which we try to show opposing views but we wouldn't be able to give space, for example, to Dr. Jim Leary to promote smoking LSD.

Mr. Fortier: What if your readers wanted it?

Mr. Ranger: Well, I think this is one . . .

Senator Prowse: They would have to go to Dr. Leary!

Mr. Ranger: Well, this is something where I think the publisher needs to lead. I myself would not comply with their request.

Mr. Zimmerman: On that very question I think that if there was a common thread of broad interest on a controversial point of view—let us use drugs as the example—we would certainly in the information flow about a drug or drugs cite the popular point of view and attempt to inform the reader in balance as to how he can handle it. So it isn't a case of ducking, it is a case of informing and making sure that the responsibility for the reader to make a clean decision is inherently in the information flow.

Mr. Fortier: Well, there is no subject which is taboo as far as Reader's Digest is concerned?

Mr. Zimmerman: Exactly.

The Chairman: Thank you. Well, I am leery about allowing any more questions because it is one o'clock. So may I, Mr. Zimmerman, thank you for the very forthright way in which you answered our questions today. You have been very frank and we are terribly grateful, and I must say that since the committee's inception that the Reader's Digest has been one of the publication in the country which has been most anxious to assist us and help us in supplying the information we requested and we are grateful. Obviously that spirit still pertains and we are grateful. I won't thank the other members of your team individually, but I would say in expressing our collective appreciation you will realize it is to your collective team. We are again mindful of your incapacity and we hope for your speedy recovery.

May I say again to the Senators that we are having a special session on the socio-economic effects of the temporary disappearance of the newspapers from Vancouver tomorrow morning at ten O'clock and in answer to a question I had from one of the press people, it is an open hearing and is open to the public.

The meeting is adjourned.

Thank you very much.

The committee adjourned.

SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE ON MASS MEDIA EVIDENCE

Ottawa, Thursday, March 19th, 1970.

The Special Senate Committee on Mass Media met this day at 10 a.m.

Senator Keith Davey (Chairman) in the Chair.

The Chairman: Honourable Senators, if I may call this session to order.

By way of introduction perhaps I could read a self-explanatory letter which is dated March the 6th, Ottawa, addressed to Whom it May Concern.

"This will introduce Mr. Walter Gray, Vice-President of Hopkins-Hedlin Limited, economics and communications consultants, who has been retained to undertake a research project in Vancouver for the Special Senate Committee on Mass Media. Mr. Gray is a journalist of wide experience who has been bureau chief in the Parliamentary Press Gallery in Ottawa for both the Toronto Star and the Toronto Globe and Mail. Mr. Gray's assignment is to report to the Committee on the economic, social and other effects on the community of the cessation of daily newspaper publication in Vancouver. This subject comes within the terms of reference of the Committee, which include a directive to study 'the influence and impact of the mass media on the Canadian public.'

I should make it clear that Mr. Gray will not be inquiring into the relations between newspapers and their employees, nor into the reasons for the interruption in publication. The Committee has no brief to examine the issues in the dispute, but only the effects on the community. The Committee will be grateful for any assistance you are able to give Mr. Gray in the course of his study. Yours truly."

and it is signed by myself.

Mr. Gray spent last week in Vancouver and prepared his report for us on the weekend and the early part of this week. I think perhaps the simplest way would be if you were to read the study, Mr. Gray, and then perhaps following that we can ask you some questions.

Mr. Walter A. Gray, Vice-President, Hopkins, Hedlin Limited: Thank you very much Senator Davey.

On February 15, 1970, Pacific Press Limited, producers of The Sun and The Province, suspended production of the two daily newspapers.

The Sun (circulation 255,410), an evening paper, and The Province (circulation 113,123), a morning paper, in combination had a daily readership that extended well beyond the boundaries of Greater Vancouver. The two papers circulated throughout the lower British Columbia mainland, Vancouver Island and the B.C. interior. In some communities where local daily papers are published, the Sun and the Province, either individually or combined, have had larger circulations.

Not all of Greater Vancouver has been deprived of a local daily newspaper in this dispute; the New Westminster Columbian, with a circulation of approximately 30,000, before the two Vancouver papers shut down, continues to be circulated in the municipalities of New Westminster, Burnaby, Surrey and Coquitlam. With this exception, then, Canada's third largest city, population 980,000 has been without its major local daily newspapers since February 15.

On March 8, 1970, at the request of the chairman of the Special Senate Committee on Mass Media, Hopkins, Hedlin Limited, represented by Walter A. Gray, vice-president, began an intensive study of the socio-economic effects of the newspaper dispute.

This report is the result of personal interviews, telephone surveys, and observations, also, a questionnaire was used in a casual, unstructured sampling of 125 residents of Greater Vancouver. Three main conclusions are reached:

1. Despite the increased efforts of other media the majority of residents of Greater Vancouver who normally use the newspaper as their major source of news and information appear dissatisfied with both the quality and quantity of news and information they are now receiving.

2. The absence of the daily local newspaper as the source of advertised news and information is directly affecting most sectors of the economic and social life of the community.

3. The absence of the two daily newspapers is producing a direct economic benefit to most, if not all, other forms of media within the community, and beyond.

II. Effect on the people

There can be no doubt that the absence of the daily local newspaper is both an annoyance and an inconvenience to thousands of residents of Greater Vancouver, beginning at the breakfast table and continuing throughout the day to one final look at the last segment of television news at night.

The daily examination of advertisements for bargains, the crossword puzzle, the horoscope, the weather report, the careful digest of news on world and local events, sports, films, theatre, community activities and television schedules, and the intellectual joust with editorial writers and columnists—all these familiar, comfortable reading habits have been eliminated from the daily ritual. Now, there is the frustration of adjusting the daily routine to radio and television news programming schedules, or unfamiliar out-of-town or weekly papers, of trying to retain news and information that is not written out in black and white.

It is safe to say, as a result of the research undertaken in this study, that the suspension of production of the daily newspapers is a most unpopular event in the Greater Vancouver community.

(a) Employment

An important indicator of the necessity of the newspaper in daily life came from the regional office of the Department of Manpower and Immigration. While statistical data had not yet been completed at the time of research the office said there were some definite indications that the employment picture in Greater Vancouver had been affected by the shutdown:

1. A greater number of employers, who normally advertised job opportunities in the newspapers, had registered with the Manpower offices in recent weeks.

2. An increased number of qualified and competent professional workers who normally would have sought employment through newspaper advertisements, have contacted Manpower Services for assistance in securing a job.

Most affected, according to the Department, have been the fractional, or day-to-day workers and structural workers who are finding it takes much longer now to find jobs.

(b) Legal

At the time of research the Legal Department of the City of Vancouver was studying the ramifications of the newspaper shutdown as they related to legal notices. Under the Vancouver Charter the city is required to run notices of public hearings on re-zoning applications in two consecutive issues of the daily newspaper within the municipality.

However, under the provincial Interpretation Act, if there is no daily newspaper in the municipality, the city may publish notices in a paper in the nearest municipality—in Vancouver's case, the New Westminster Columbian or the Victoria Colonist. The City does intend to advertise in the tri-weekly Express and other local weeklies should such notices be required.

City Council has already amended the by-laws under the Charter to allow the municipality to advertise local improvement notices in the Express and local weeklies, in the absence of the daily newspaper.

Tender calls are being published, as usual, in the Journal of Commerce, as well as being posted on a notice board in the City Hall and circulated on a vendors' list.

Officials of the Provincial Court anticipated some problems in relation to the publication of divorce petitions, land registry and estate notices, should the shutdown be further prolonged.

(c) Vital Statistics

The absence of birth, marriage and death notices has been revealed in this research as one of the great frustrations of the shutdown. One radio station (CKWX) and one television station (CHAN) are as a public service accepting death and funeral notices from funeral directors free of charge for broadcast.

Only the barest details are broadcast: name, place and time of funeral service and interment.

The absence of printed death notices has had varying effects on the Vancouver florist industry. On the one hand, the absence of the "please omit flowers" line from the notice has meant that more wreaths, sprays and bouquets are being ordered. On the other, according to one florist, those persons who normally would have ordered a more expensive wreath or spray upon learning of the death and time of funeral, are now ordering less expensive bouquets sent to the home of the deceased's relatives some days later.

Funeral directors indicated that the time between the death and the funeral service has generally grown longer while relatives contact other members of the family and friends.

(d) Entertainment

Business at the Greater Vancouver movie houses, theatres and nightclubs which depend heavily on newspaper advertisements to attract customers, has suffered from the shutdown. The Playhouse Theatre Company estimates its seats sales have been reduced by 20-25 per cent since February 15. Vancouver's only professional theatre, Playhouse Theatre has 7,500 subscribers, but it relies on casual ticket buyers to make up the difference in overhead costs. The 20-25 per cent reduction in sales of seats in the 647-seat Queen Elizabeth Theatre which the company rents from the City of Vancouver, represents between $3,000-$4,000.

Film chains, such as the 18-theatre Odeon and the 20-theatre Famous Players, reported a general drop in business of from 5 per cent to 20 per cent, depending mainly on the particular film. Films requiring extensive promotion which have done well in other communities have failed at the box-office.

In the absence of daily newspaper advertising and listings, the film theatres have installed automatic telephone announcements giving the title of the film, the cast and the running times at the various theatres.

II. Effect on the Economy

(a) Retail

The absence of the two daily newspapers as undoubtedly had a direct effect on the business life of Greater Vancouver. However, in almost every instance, those members of the business community reached in this study were reluctant to blame any economic downturn totally on the absence of the newspapers.

It was invariably linked to general economic conditions across Canada and the uncertainty of the British Columbia economy, particularly in the forest industry and tug operations.

Eaton's, which operates five retail outlets in Greater Vancouver, adds yet another factor: the firm celebrated its 100th anniversary in 1969 and it fully expected some decrease in sales relative to the high level reached last year as a result of special promotion and sales. In all instances—Eaton's, Simpson-Sears, Woodward's and the Bay—declined to reveal their sales figures.

According to the latest DBS weekly report on merchandising, department store sales in British Columbia in January had increased 13.4 per cent. Total retail sales in British Columbia in 1969 were $3.04 billion, of which one-half were in the Greater Vancouver and lower mainland areas. An Eaton's spokesman admitted some sales difficulty in luxury items and suggested sales in February and early March generally might have dropped off by 5.0 per cent—which, according to the reaction of other retailers and knowledgeable Vancouver businessmen, was a very modest figure.

A spokesman for the Bay agreed that the firm's business was definitely affected by the strike, but in comparison with last year, total sales were up. He credited the unusually early Spring which has affected normal February and March buying habits.

The Bay has undergone some staff adjustments. Casual employees which normally would have been hired for late winter and spring sales have not been brought in. The salaried staff has not been affected.

All major department stores have transferred their newspaper advertising expenditures to other media, moving into radio, television and the weekly press. Woodward's was the first to take out a full page in the Vancouver Express.

All four major firms have gone into flyer advertising in a big way: Woodward's (circulation 300,000); Eaton's (250,000); the Bay (300,000); Simpson-Sears (290,000).

Normally, the department stores print flyers periodically, in connection with special promotions and sales. These would be distributed throughout Greater Vancouver primarily by the Sun and Province. Since the shutdown the stores have contracted out to private firms for printing and weekly distribution door-to-door.

With other retail firms getting into the flyer business as well, the result has been—depending on the reliability of door-to-door distribution—a veritable plague of flyers thumping against the doorsteps of Greater Vancouver.

The flyer revolution has had a direct bearing on retail sales patterns. Under normal circumstances, the department stores would advertise in the two papers through the week, carefully spacing its promotions. But in the flyer they are forced to compress a week's advertising into one publication, delivered Tuesday or Wednesday.

The result is that on the one hand, the householder, so inundated with advertising and promotion material, from a variety of firms at one time is overwhelmed by the volume and therefore frustrated in determining careful selection. On the other hand, the department stores have found that Mondays and Tuesdays are quieter shopping days than previously. One tactic now being used to stimulate buying is to drop the opening date of a sale and to publish only the closing date.

Unlike the department stores, food outlets have not resorted to such a heavier degree on advertising campaigns in other media, on the assumption that people always have to eat and must shop anyway.

Smaller retailers who have relied almost exclusively on the two newspapers for advertising, such as furniture stores, drug stores, appliances and jewellers, have apparently suffered. One operator of a four-store jewellery chain claimed a 10 per cent loss of business. The operator of a seven-store furniture and appliances chain who spent $200,000 a year on newspaper advertising, claimed a 40 per cent loss of business.

This operator has asked his staff to take their summer holidays now. He has stopped hiring casual help.

The Retail Merchants Association reported that to date March has been a great bargain month, as evidenced by the number of sales and reduced prices in furniture, clothing, etc. Vancouver automobile prices are down 20 per cent off the list price on 1970 models.

Vancouver new car dealers, who rely heavily on newspaper display advertising, as well as radio and television, tend not to blame the decrease in sales entirely on the shutdown, but rather more on general buyer resistance felt across Canada due to the tight money situation.

The state of the used car business depends upon who is doing the talking. One dealer, who spends $2,000 a month on advertising, says the shutdown had directly affected his used car business. Another dealer, who spends 60 per cent of his advertising budget in newspapers, spent $2,000 more in the last month in other media than he would normally, and business was holding up. Saturday, March 7, for example, was the biggest Saturday he had experienced in the last two years—and he could offer no particular reason. His used car sales in February totalled $530,000, an increase of 10 per cent over last year and for the first week in March totalled $165,000.

(b) Real Estate

The absence of real estate advertisements in the daily papers, and the difficulty of readers locating alternate sources of information, has apparently created considerable confusion and hardship among house buyers and sellers and apartment owners and occupants.

Real estate sales in Greater Vancouver in February totalled $14,791,981, an increase of more than $2,000,000 in the same month last year.

But with the disappearance of newspaper advertisements the Vancouver Real Estate Board estimates telephone inquiries to agents have decreased by 50 per cent.

The Board does point out that its Multiple Listing Service is sent out daily to 2,700 persons and information on real estate transactions is being circulated widely. Since the shutdown the Board had started issuing an information sheet listing open houses available for inspection on weekends.

A particular hardship has been placed on persons forced to make a quick sale of their house. Under normal circumstances the agent would advertise the sale four or five times a week in the daily paper.

The Greater Vancouver Apartment Owners Association acknowledges a hardship on persons seeking apartment accommodation. Coupled with the absence of advertisements is the fact that Greater Vancouver has an apartment vacancy rate of only 0.8 per cent, down from 1.0 per cent a year ago. A vacancy rate of 3-4 per cent is considered healthy.

It will be weeks, if not months after the Sun and the Province re-appear before any accurate assessment of the effects of the shutdown can be made. The contradiction of opinions received, the reluctance to separate the effects of the shutdown from the general economic climate, make it extremely difficult, if not impossible to present a true picture of the economic ramifications of the suspension of publication.

It would appear safe to suggest, however, that the current experience in Greater Vancouver, is quite similar to those which have occurred in other communities in recent years, such as Detroit and New York, judging from research reports that have subsequently been prepared following similar absences of the daily newspaper in the community.

The Bureau of Advertising of the American Newspaper Publishers Association, in a summary report of the effects of the New York City newspaper strike, which lasted from December 8, 1962 to March 30, 1963, presented these facts, which may be of some relevance in any post-shutdown research of the Vancouver situation:

"According to the National Retail Merchants' Association, retail store sales in Manhattan Barely held their own at the height of the Christmas buying season and by January 14, a 'creeping paralysis' set in and continued right through to the end of the strike..

"Estimates of other business losses range from 15-20 per cent for florists, 40 per cent for used-car sales, and from 50-60 per cent in real estate. Attendance dropped sharply at theatres, motion pictures, sports events, art galleries, and museums. Free-lance photographers lost some 50 per cent of their income; employment agencies lost from $1 million to $2 million a month. . .

"Recovery progress was slow even though the city's papers employed a wide variety of promotion and hard-sell to recoup circulation and lineage lost during the shutdown. ABC circulation statements for the six-month period April 1—September 30, 1963, showed circulation losses of from 3 to 22 per cent when compared to the same period in 1962. According to Editor and Publisher, 5-4-63, the three major factors in the circulation decline were:

- (1) A sharp drop in sales of early street editions of morning papers;
- (2) The doubling of price (from 5¢ to 10¢) by the standard-sized A.M. papers;
- (3) Thousands of commuters "discovered their hometown papers and lost the habit of buying New York papers going to and from work."

IV. The Response of Other Media

(a) Television

With the availability of nine television channels through cable television, Greater Vancouver is probably the most highly-competitive television market in Canada.

In this competitive situation, KVOS Bellingham, with 90 per cent of its advertising directed to its Canadian audience, and enjoying one of the most successful first quarters in its history, on February 15, found itself in the position of having to refuse potential Vancouver advertisers who sought alternate advertising space when the Sun and the Province ceased publication.

During the last Vancouver newspaper dispute two years ago KVOS offered both papers a half-hour slot to present their columnists on the air, but because of increased heavy CBS network commitments (82 per cent of air time) such accommodation was not available in the present situation.

KVOS does provide a five-minute broadcast of Canadian news at 7.25 p.m. nightly, but because of network commitments beginning at 7.30 p.m. the station has been unable to extend the newscast.

CHAN-TV, operating under the CRTC regulations which permit only 12 advertising minutes per hour, at February 15, had already sold all its advertising prime time. With the disappearance of the newspapers, the station quickly sold all other time—the less desirable daytime slots.

The major retail department stores and real estate firms which previously advertised primarily in the newspapers, quickly became CHAN clients.

Before the newspaper dispute, CHAN included in its hour-long news program at the dinner hour an in-depth feature. This feature has since been cut back to increase the number of news items, including segments of national news taken from a feed received from CFTO Toronto's World Beat program. Added to the program are nightly television listings and on-camera interviews with theatre patrons who are asked to comment on current films.

In addition, the usual 15-minute regional and local news summary following the 11 p.m. CTV network news has been extended 15 minutes to provide more news and information.

CHAN with a 20-man news room, and a crew in Victoria, the provincial capital, has made an effort to build up its local weekend news coverage. It has hired one Sun reporter and is planning to hire a second.

The station took a strong editorial stand on the March 11 municipal referendum for a $29.6 million five-year development plan for the City of Vancouver.

Before the shutdown, both the Sun and the Province gave strong editorial support to the project. With their disappearance Vancouver Mayor Tom Campbell publicly expressed his concern over the absence of newspaper support and its effect on the outcome of the referendum.

CHAN provided alternative support by despatching camera crews to photograph young Italian, Chinese and Japanese-speaking boys and girls knocking on doors in the east-end urging residents in their native tongue to get out and vote. Of the 32 per cent of the 121,771 eligible voters who turned out, 62.67 per cent, or just over the required 60 per cent voted in favour. The majority of support for the five-year plan came from the east end.

CHAN has also introduced a new program, Information Centre, to broadcast public service announcements, including obituaries.

The CBC station, CBUT, has sold all its advertising slots, recording a 20-25 per cent increase in sales, due mainly to the demands of the major retail department stores.

Both CBUT television and radio have extended their news coverage, with CBUT-TV expanding from 12-14 minutes to 25 minutes daily. It is now including stock market reports in its news coverage.

(b) Radio

Vancouver radio stations, like television, are increasingly being pressed by advertisers for time slots, but as in television, the radio medium, with one or two exceptions, was already enjoying a buoyant first quarter usually a quiet period for radio.

Station CKWX, for example, quickly filled in the few remaining gaps of its 1,500-minutes-per-week allowable advertising time. It extended its five-minute newscasts to 7-10 minutes and introduced newscasts every half hour in its 6.30-8 p.m. broadcast period. As a community service it began introducing death and funeral notices, at an average of two or three per hour. The station accepts such notices only from funeral directors, not from relatives or friends.

The station also offered to carry birth notices but at the time of writing there was no public response.

In the evening, station personality Don Porter reads the popular comic strips from the two daily Seattle papers.

Unlike CKWX, Vancouver's most-listened to station, CKNW, is not accepting obituaries for broadcast. Basically a news and talk station, with a news staff of 16-18, CKNW has made no additional effort to provide news, and all advertising time was booked before the two papers ceased publication.

CHQM, a "good-music" station, which normally restricts its advertising content to only two-thirds the allowable, lifted its self-imposed restrictions after February 15, and all available advertising time is sold.

The station hired four or five newspaper reporters affected by the shutdown and extended its five and ten-minute newscasts by five minutes.

CKLG, a youth-oriented station, found itself branching into such new news coverage as ski reports, theatre and entertainment and public service announcements. Major retail and food stores have become advertisers on CKLG.

Only CJOR reported less-than capacity advertising (90 per cent), but indicated that sales were up 25-30 per cent. As with the other stations, CJOR has lengthened its newscasts, by including, among other items, more business and market news.

A notable exception to the expansion in radio news broadcasting is CKVN, which, in the third week of the shutdown, abandoned its 12-hours-in-24 news programming introduced a year ago, after losing a reported $500,000 on the experiment. As a result 13 members of the news staff were laid off work.

(c) Out-of-town Papers

Out-of-town newspapers are attempting to fill some of the void created by the absence of daily local newspapers in the Greater Vancouver area. The New Westminster Columbian, which has traditionally found the Sun and the Province major competitors in its own circulation area, has increased its daily run from 30,000 to 45,000. It has increased in size from an average of 22 to 40 pages to handle the increased volume of advertising, mainly classified advertising. It has increased its news presentation from an average of 1,300 1,400 column inches to 2,000 column inches.

The Columbian, which previously limited itself to coverage of local news, (about 80 per cent), now publishes more national and international news. It has taken on additional personnel in the editorial department and added 40 more men in the composing room to handle the advertising volume, which has doubled.

The Columbian has, since the shutdown began, picked up a printing bonanza in the form of flyers being distributed weekly by Simpsons-Sears (press run 290,000) and Woodward's (300,000).

The Times and Daily Colonist, published by Victoria Press Limited prior to the shutdown made no attempt to compete in Vancouver (about 80 Colonists and a few Times sold on news stands). Since the shutdown 1,000 issues combined are being sold daily in the city.

However, the most significant effect the shutdown has had on the Victoria papers has been in the increased circulation up-island, in such areas as Nanaimo. The Colonist estimates its circulation has increased by 2,000-3,000 in this region which was previously served, not only by a local paper, but by the Sun and the Province.

It is worth noting at this point that during the shutdown, the British Columbia Legislature has been in session, and the absence of the Sun and the Province has removed two of the most outspoken critics of the British Columbia government from the scene.

The Seattle Times and the Seattle Post-Intelligencer, both with limited circulation in Vancouver before the shutdown have made impressive efforts to serve the city.

The Evening Times, which previously shipped 100 copies for sale (15¢) at news stands, is now shipping 3,200-4,300 daily and 7,500 Sunday copies.

Vancouver readers receive the first edition, published at 10.20 a.m. and shipped the 145 miles by special truck for distribution to news stands by 3 p.m. A reporter and photographer have been stationed in Vancouver to gather news for publication in the "Canada" edition.

The March 11, edition, for example, featured a front page feature and accompanying photograph, entitled "Vancouver's Future is Looking Up."

Inside articles discussed the newspaper dispute, and a scheduled Vancouver-Seattle hockey game. Reports on the Toronto and Montreal stock markets were also carried.

The Post-Intelligencer, which previously had sales of about 500 in Vancouver is now distributing 6,500 copies, at 15¢ each. Its "Canada Special" is a replate of the first two pages of the first edition published at 11.30 p.m.

The March 11, issue featured two front page articles, "White House Sets Quota on Canada Oil", and "Underground Papers Charge Harassment"—an account of a sitting of the special Senate Committee on Mass Media.

Page 2 featured five Canadian national and Pacific region items and brief reports on Vancouver, Montreal and Toronto stocks.

Before the shutdown The Globe and Mail, which maintains a permanent one-man bureau in Vancouver, had a daily circulation of 300 (sold on news stands at 25¢ and 30¢ on Saturday). Immediately after the disappearance of the Sun and the Province its circulation climbed to 1,900, but with the appearance of the Vancouver Express, the employees' tri-weekly paper (see below), its circulation dropped down to 1,200. The Globe and Mail, together with its five-day per week business section, the Report on Business arrives in Vancouver by air freight at 5.30 a.m., and is distributed to news stands and to the central post office and the bus depot for distribution in other areas of the province.

The Canadian Press and United Press International bureaux are located in the Pacific Press Limited building. As members of CP the Sun and the Province are obliged to provide the co-operative agency with news for circulation to other members. Since they ceased publication the CP news bureau has been relying on its own news-gathering resources and on radio and television for news. The bureau was already monitoring CKNW, but since the shutdown, it is monitoring other radio and television stations.

The CP bureau staff consists of 14 editors working three shifts, plus three editors on Broadcast News and two editors in Victoria. Since the shutdown the Bureau has hired one more man.

Since the shutdown the Bureau is sending out less relatively unimportant news items and increasing its coverage of the B.C. Legislature. Normally, CP covers major news events, such as the stopover of the Queen en route to the South Pacific, the dismissal of Joe Crozier as general manager and coach of Vancouver Canucks hockey club, and the March 1 mid-air collision of an Air Canada Viscount and light aircraft. Where news photographs appear desirable, CP staffers are taking their own pictures.

CP assigned a staffer to cover Opposition Leader Robert Stanfield's visit to Kamloops. Under normal circumstances it would have relied on the local paper, plus back-up coverage by the Sun and Province.

(d) Weekly Press

In normal circumstances, Greater Vancouver is also served by 17 weekly newspapers and the bi-weekly Richmond Review, as well as the underground newspaper, the Georgia Straight and the university press. Since the shutdown, all these publications are apparently benefitting by the absence of the Sun and the Province. It was not possible, during the limited time for research for this report to obtain information from each of these publications, but available information at least suggests that they are making more money as a result of increased circulation and advertising.

For example, the (North Vancouver) Citizen, with a circulation of 23,000, normally publishes 36 pages every Wednesday, selling at 15 cents per copy.

Since the disappearance of the two Vancouver dailies, the Citizen has expanded to 48 pages and has increased its circulation to 30,000. Laterally, the Citizen, in order to meet the tremendous demand for advertising space, is now publishing a 24-page issue on Friday, which it is distributing free of charge.

With the disappearance of the two papers—and the attendant unemployment of 1,100 employees of Pacific Press Limited—the Citizen entered into an arrangement with a group of idle classified advertising salesmen to produce a weekly Classified News which is distributed free-of-charge on local Vancouver news stands. It has a weekly press run of 150,000. Classified News consisted initially of 16 pages of classified ads, but, as of March 11, was being increased to 22 pages.

Classified News advertising rates are $6.25 per column inch. (The classified rate in the Citizen is $2.00 per column inch.)

In addition, the Citizen is publishing weekly flyers for Eaton's (16 pages, 300,000 press run) and the Bay (20 pages, 500,000 press run next edition). The department store flyers are in addition to the regular flyers printed by the Citizen for other chains, such as supermarkets.

To handle this increase business, the Citizen has added two more members to the staff of 10 on advertising, as well as two editorial staff members. The payroll of the printing shop has been doubled in the last month.

Prior to the shutdown, the Citizen published only North Vancouver news; now it is adding news of Greater Vancouver interest.

Adjoining the Citizen circulation area is the Lions Gate Times, serving West Vancouver. Prior to the shutdown the Times' circulation averaged 9,000-10,000. As of March 10, it had increased to 17,500.

Normally a publication of 18-22 pages, the Times has subsequently increased to 30 pages, primarily due to the influx of real estate and automobile advertising.

The Times has added staff to handle advertising and composing room requirements. It has found itself hard-pressed to handle the requests for public service and community notices.

The Courier, covering the Kerrisdale district of the city proper, has not increased in circulation (5,000 paid) but is apparently giving subscribers more for their money. It has increased its usual 16-page size to 24, 32 and 36 tabloid pages. The increase has been due primarily to real estate and national advertising. Advertising revenues generally have doubled.

The bi-monthly Vancouver East News, which had intended on going weekly in April, has advanced this schedule to accommodate the demand for advertising space. The News distributed free of charge to 18,000 residences and businesses in Vancouver East and North Burnaby prior to the shutdown of the Vancouver dailies, has since increased its number of broadsheet pages from 6 to 10. The volume of classified advertisements has tripled and it is now publishing full-page advertisements from retail stores.

A similar "throw-away" publication, the Highland Echo (circulation 5,600) serving the eastern Grandview area, has increased its size from 8 to 12 pages. Advertising revenues have increased 60 per cent.

The Burnaby Examiner, a 16-page tabloid prior to the shutdown, is now publishing 24-32 pages, and circulation has increased from 10,000 to 15,000.

On the other hand, the Coquitlam Herald whose circulation area is on the outer fringes of Vancouver, has experienced little demand for advertising. Circulation has increased by only 10 per cent.

The bi-weekly Richmond Review, with a pre-shutdown circulation of 14,000 has picked up comparatively few subscriptions (1,000), but it has increased in size from 18-20 pages to 24-32 pages, due primarily to the demand for classified advertising. In addition, the Review is carrying ads from retail department stores.

The Review has not altered its editorial content, publishing only community news.

The ethnic press is also experiencing a reaction from the dispute. The Jewish Western Bulletin, for example, with a circulation of 2,000, concentrates its editorial coverage primarily on local, national and international news of particular interest to the Jewish community. Yet, due to the demand from advertisers, particularly in real estate, the Bulletin has increased the number of tabloid pages from 12 to 16.

The underground press has also been affected by the absence of the Sun and Province. The Georgia Straight which, before the shutdown, had a press run of 11,000, increased its output to 22,000 for the first edition after the Sun and the Province ceased publication. This particular issue carried a lampoon of the Sun—a mock-up of the Sun front page, which bore the banner headline "Alcohol Crazed Oldster Leaps from Bridge". The circulation has since dropped to 16,000.

(e) The Vancouver Express

On February 16, the day following the decision by Pacific Press Limited to suspend publication of the Sun and the Province, employees met to consider the feasibility of producing an employee newspaper. It was agreed to proceed, and the first issue, a 12-page issue, with a press run of 103,000, was published the following Saturday, February 1.

The Express has subsequently appeared three times weekly, on Tuesday, Thursday and Saturday, being published by Pugstem Publications Limited. Pugstem (a name derived from initials of the unions involved in the dispute—Printing Pressmen's Union, American Newspaper Guild, Stereotypers' and Electrotypers' Union, International Typographical Union, and the Mailers Union) was originally incorporated two years ago during the last Vancouver newspaper dispute, and as the employees had a readily accessible legal vehicle through which to initiate the project. The newspaper, printed in two editions, and averaging 20 pages per issue, is printed by Broadway Printers.

It is distributed to news stands and to street news vendors, and sold for 15c per copy, with 5c being retained by the vendor, 4c by the news stand.

The Express is produced by employees of the Sun and the Province. They collect no salary. ANG members who form the editorial staff, on a rotating basis, receive from the union strike fund a basic $35 a week for a single person and up to a maximum of $65 per week for a married man with dependents.

Following publication of the March 10 issue the Express gave all Pacific Press employees a $10.00 bonus.

Prior to the shutdown, employees of Pacific Press Limited were contributing an estimated $200,000 a week through their payroll into the Vancouver economy.

The editorial offices of the Express are located in the West Broadway union strike headquarters, formerly the Vancouver Indian Centre.

The Express is charging advertisers $5.00 a column inch for advertisements. It has no classified ad section, but advertisements which under normal circumstances in the usual daily newspaper would appear as classified, are appearing as small box ads. It demands cash for all advertisements.

Local and national advertisers which at first appeared reluctant to advertise in the Express for fear of being accused of taking sides in the industrial dispute (the Express stoutly maintains its neutrality in the issue), are now placing advertisements, including full-page ads, in the issue.

The Express attempts to give all-round news coverage through its own staffing, contributions from anonymous writers, and by re-writing regional, national and international news from other publications. The Express has approached The Canadian Press regarding interim service, and CP has indicated that such service would under Article 3, Section 7 of The CP By-laws require the permission of all CP members within a 50-mile radius of Vancouver as well as the Executive Committee. The Express would also be required to deposit with the co-operative agency $6,000 as an expression of good faith.

Originally, it was intended that the Express would cease publication once the dispute was settled. However, since then there has been some discussion among those associated with the publication, and its supporters, on the possibility of the Express becoming a third Vancouver daily newspaper. At the time of writing no decisions had apparently been reached.

(f) Television Guide

One interesting reaction to the newspaper shutdown has been felt by the Television Guide. The U.S.-controlled Guide is published regionally throughout Canada, and is circulated primarily in supermarkets and drugstores.

As is the case of all regional issues, the feature material is produced in the United States and shipped to the regions where it is combined with local television listings in one publication. TV Guide must compete with daily listings and weekly supplements published by local daily newspapers, such as the Sun and Province. Since the shutdown, while TV Guide has been relieved of its competition by the Vancouver daily newspapers, it has found new competition in local weeklies, department store flyers and television stations themselves.

Nevertheless, TV Guide which prior to the shutdown had a circulation in Greater Vancouver, the lower mainland and Vancouver Island of 153,000, has since increased its circulation to 256,000, an increase of 60%. On sales at 15c. per copy, this means that gross sales are up from $22,950 per week to $38,400 per week.

V. The People React

As part of this study the researcher undertook a casual, unstructured sampling of 125 citizens of Greater Vancouver in an effort to get some "feel" of the effect of the shutdown on the individual. Some 66 male and 59 female residents responded to the questionnaire and represented working professional men and women, housewives, retired persons and students. The survey is not presented as a definitive study of a carefully-selected and well-balanced cross-section of the community; rather, it is but a sampling of public opinion.

The results of the questionnaire:

It might be useful, here to again look at the summary report of the Bureau of Advertising, A.N.P.A. on the effects of the New York City newspaper strike for a summation of public reaction to the absence of the newspapers:

"At the start of the strike, the broadcast media appeared deceptively successful as substitutes for newspapers. More than nine out of ten thought the information they were getting from radio and TV was excellent or satisfactory. But as time went on, readers discovered that despite the expanded news coverage, the quality of news was not up to the newspaper standard, the information they were getting barely skimmed the surface, and that the newspaper's personal factors could never be transferred. At the end of the blackout more than two-thirds of those surveyed had become disenchanted with the broadcast media's coverage of news.

Public Reaction to TV and Radio News

	Start	Mid-Point	End
Excellent .....	83%	41%	16%
Satisfactory ...	11%	37%	16%
Poor .....	6%	22%	68%

"People missed the newspapers with varying degrees of intensity and for many reasons. Those who missed the papers most in the very first week of the shutdown intensified those feelings in the third month; those who missed them least re-inforced that indifference with the passage of time.

"Among the Newspaper Loyal (people who originally said they would give up radio and TV before newspapers) 87.5 per cent said they missed the papers "extremely" or a "good deal" in the first week of the strike, and 92.7 per cent of this group said they missed the papers "extremely" or a "good deal" in the third month.

"Those who came to prize the papers more as they were forced to do without them focused their interest most strongly on personalities, excitement, explanation, service and on the newspaper as a rewarding experience in itself. Almost nine out of ten people who said they would give up newspapers second, when asked to choose between newspapers, radio, and TV, felt that the substitute sources were inadequate.

"The influence of newspaper advertising and its importance beyond actual buying and selling was also dramatically revealed.

"Immediately or after two weeks of the strike, 62 per cent of shoppers missed the clothing ads; 45 per cent missed food advertisements. In the ninth week, 39 per cent missed advertising most. This was followed by local news, sports, editorials, financial news, obituaries, and crosswords in that order.

"A substantial proportion of respondents (28 per cent) said they had actually put off buying something because there were no newspaper ads to guide them, and among those who missed the papers more than they originally anticipated, as many as 40 per cent said they had postponed purchases because of lack of newspaper advertising.

"In the Spring issue of Columbia Journalism Review, April 1, 1963, Clayton Knowles and Richard P. Hunt, reporters on the New York Times, examined the effect of the blackout on public policy and the functions of government, and concluded as follows:

"...The strike showed how and why the press is part of the lifestream of a democratic society, dependent as it is upon a free and continuous exchange between government and the governed. The strike cost the publishers and their employees dearly, and business throughout the city was hurt. The economic price could be reckoned and paid, but the cost to the public welfare and the public policy was truly incalculable."

It would clearly be imprudent to attempt to apply the findings of the New York study to the situation in Vancouver today, even in the most general way. The New York study was carefully structured and based on detailed data collected over a number of weeks. Our study of the Vancouver situation was out of necessity much less thorough, and the community has been without its major daily newspapers for a relatively short time, compared to the nearly four months' absence in New York.

But even on the basis of our relatively subjective research, there is no doubt that the absence of the two major daily newspapers having a profound impact on the social and economic life of Greater Vancouver—impact that is almost certain to become more onerous each day that the newspapers fail to appear.

The Chairman: Thank you very much, Mr. Gray. I think Senators I think we will perhaps turn to the questioning but before we do I think I should welcome to this session this morning, in particular, Senator Nichol who, of course, is from Vancouver. I hope that Senator Nichol will feel free to participate in the questioning. Indeed he may have other observations and comments and we may perhaps want to ask him some questions because I am sure he can throw some additional light on the situation.

Perhaps I could ask the first question, Mr. Gray. At page 14 and at page 37 you quote at length from the summary report of the Bureau of Advertising of the A.N.P.A. I am not a particularly cynical person but wouldn't you think that the Bureau of Advertising of the A.N.P.A. might possibly have a special interest in presenting that kind of a report which would reflect most favourably on the news?

Mr. Walter Gray: I would acknowledge the possibility of getting a more biased report from the Bureau of Advertising but I was, in the course of our research, looking for some comparative studies and this was the only one that was of recent vintage.

The Chairman: I recall an article, which I referred to in my original speech in the Senate proposing this committee, which I think was important; it was a wrap-up on the newspaper strike in Detroit and it contained many observations which ran counter to the ones in New York. However we are not here to talk about Detroit or New York—we want to talk about Vancouver.

Senator Smith: At this very point here, Mr. Chairman, I think it would be useful to point out that the quotation from the report made by the New York Advertising Bureau of the A.N.P.A. referred to information obtained from the National Retail Merchants' Association. Those who have copies before them will realize that this wasn't any information stretched with any prejudice but it was a report they got from another national association concerned with retail marketing and I think it perhaps is more relevant than it could otherwise be.

The Chairman: Yes, I take your point, Senator Smith. I wonder if the National Association of Broadcasters would have written the same report? I am not quarrelling with either you or Mr. Gray because I think those are valid observations but I think we should be at least aware of the possibility of bias and I take your point and I am grateful to you for raising it.

Senator Nichol: Senator Davey, thank you for your kind words.

I would like to compliment Mr. Walter Gray because it is a very good report. I have been in Vancouver a great deal in the last month. I can't prove that it is accurate because I haven't done any research but it has very, very accurate feel to it and very accurate ring to it.

If I could refer to one thing in it on page 38, the figures you have given us to public reaction initially in Vancouver. I think that these figures which were taken in New York could be used for Vancouver. Initially people felt that they were going to get the news from radio and television and that they were going to read the out-of-town papers just when they felt like it. There was almost a feeling of relief that they weren't going to have to struggle through all this stuff but it very quickly changed.

Recently, I have heard a lot of comments from people saying we thought they are in the process of replacing the print media but the electronic media simply are not doing it. They don't put it in those terms but that is what they are saying. They didn't realize just how deep a part of their lives the daily newspapers were until they were withdrawn and it took them a while to realize it. So I wouldn't be surprised if this type of figure which is shown on page 38 were repeated in Vancouver.

I think it should be very encouraging to those people who are the print media who have been told over and over again that they are a dying race because I think what happened here proves that radio and television simply can't fill the gap.

Another thing, Mr. Gray said, I think, it certainly would be imprudent to attempt to apply the findings of New York to the situation in Vancouver even in the most general way. I would say that you are being overly prudent in making that reminder. I have been amazed myself having been there to find what a psychological and intellectual vacuum there is. I am not saying that just because Mr. Ian MacDonald is sitting over there.

The Chairman: I don't want to be the devil's advocate here. I am sure both you and Mr. Gray know a great deal more about this than I do but let me just make a point. On page 18—the referendum—32 per cent of the people turned out to vote. That is a higher percentage—well, it is approximately the same give or take a percentage point or two—but it is approximately the same percentage as the number of people who voted in the municipal elections in Toronto last December, (I think to people who read the Toronto papers will know) an election which received unprecedented pre-election day campaign build-up in all three Toronto papers. With that enormous build-up 32 per cent or 33 per cent of the people voted. Here is Vancouver without any newspapers with a municipal referendum with the same number of people voting. Now, doesn't that say something in the opposite direction?

Mr. Gray: Well, I would say from my own casual observations that I think a great deal of the success of the passage of the referendum was due to the organization that was out on the streets. For instance, on the Sunday in Stanley Park there was a band and a troupe of young workers armed with placards handing out leaflets on the referendum and to me this was an example of what a direct campaign could do and probably had some bearing on the outcome. If these people had not been organized and gone out on the streets and knocked on the doors what would have happened to the referendum? One could speculate that it may not have passed.

Senator McElman: A point that should be made there is that the 32 per cent has no relevance unless we know what the average turnout would be?

The Chairman: Well, perhaps Senator Nichol would know?

Senator Nichol: I don't know, Senator, and that is the point that I am making. I don't think we can compare the turnout in Toronto with the turnout in Vancouver. I don't know—maybe somebody else does—what the average turnout on a thing like this would be, I don't know. It seems low to me.

The Chairman: It seems low?

Senator Nichol: Yes.

Senator Prowse: I would say that on municipal votes that this is a fairly high turnout and if it was a special vote called for a special purpose without having a mayoralty contest or anything, I think it would be a particularly high vote.

Senator Nichol: Well, I really don't know.

The Chairman: I would like to ask a supplementary political question. It may be unfair to put this one to Mr. Gray and if it is, you may answer it, Senator Nichol.

This Committee, to date at least, has not had a partisan view and I don't intend to introduce any partisan observations but I have received reports that the provincial government has during the absence of the daily papers in Vancouver put through some highly controversial legislation in this period.

Is that a fair observation?

Senator Nichol: I don't think so. I think that Government has put through quite a bit of highly controversial legislation.

The Chairman: Nothing special during this period though?

Senator Nichol: I don't think so particularly. That there are people who have opposed the Prime Minister of British Columbia over a period of time has been a fact, but although most of the dailies, year in and year out, have been against him, it hasn't made the slightest bit of difference as far as the voters are concerned.

The Chairman: I was thinking specifically of the Landlord and Tenant Act? Would that have gone through at this time anyway?

Senator Nichol: Yes, I think so. I don't think there is anything sinister to be drawn from this. Perhaps that wasn't your suggestion but I don't think there is anything sinister about this.

The Chairman: Well, I wasn't thinking of anything sinister.

Senator Nichol: The session was running and he put up what he had to put up and think a large majority of it went through. I think it would have gone through whether the papers were publishing or not.

The Chairman: Senator McElman?

Senator McElman: I think this item on page 18 is one of the significant parts of the report. Can we arrange to get some base figure of similar votes taken in different years?

The Chairman: I am sure we can.

Senator McElman: I think we should have that.

Senator Prowse: I am sure DBS would have that.

The Chairman: I am sure we can get that information.

Senator McElman: Another question I would like to put to Mr. Gray—he refers on page 32 to the application for CP services and the reasons that it hasn't become available. You referred to Article 3, Section 7 of the CP By-laws. Are these applicable by-laws only in the case of a shutdown?

Mr. Gray: No.

Senator McElman: They are not?

Mr. Gray: No. Any person or organization can apply for interim service.

Senator McElman: I see.

Mr. Gray: This is my understanding. I do not know the exact legal definition but the explanation I received from Canadian Press was that interim service was available to any legitimate organization that wished to apply for it.

Senator Prowse: Did you get any indication as to whether the members which I take it would be the two daily newspapers in particular were prepared to grant their approval or disapproval?

Mr. Gray: No.

Senator Prowse: So we don't know whether the CP service is going to be available or not yet?

Mr. Gray: No.

The Chairman: Has the Express considered going daily?

Mr. Gray: They were talking of it when I was there but they had made no decision.

The Chairman: I guess the closest daily newspaper to the scene is the Columbian?

Mr. Gray: Right.

The Chairman: And the Columbian, you said at page 21, has increased its press run from 30,000 to 45,000 and its pages from 22 to 40. I have two questions. One, is it circulating its paper in a different way—is it circulating its paper more broadly in the Vancouver city area. Secondly, could the Columbian sell even more papers and more advertising and if so, why doesn't it?

Mr. Gray: The answer to the first question as I recall it from the publisher is no. They have confined their circulation to their circulation area. I am not clear on whether there is some legal requirement but you cannot buy the Columbian in downtown Vancouver.

The Chairman: Not even during the strike?

Mr. Gray: No.

Senator Nichol: I was going to ask Mr. Gray a question—it was my impression that the Columbian has been sold in the east end of Burnaby and Vancouver but I don't recall seeing a copy of the Columbian anywhere in the main part of Vancouver during the strike.

Mr. Gray: No.

Senator Nichol: On the news-stands where you would perhaps see the Globe and Mail and the Seattle Post-Intelligencer and these other papers.

Senator Smith: Could I ask why that situation exists?

Mr. Gray: I can't answer that specifically, Senator, but I would presume that it is either a policy decision on the part of the publisher or some requirement regarding circulation area. I can't answer that. It is probably, I would suggest, the decision of the publisher to confine his circulation.

Senator Prowse: You stay out of my backyard and I will stay out of yours?

Mr. Gray: Exactly. As I indicated, of course, The Sun and the Province are circulated in the Columbian circulation area and in some cases I assume they had a larger circulation along certain areas of New Westminster than the Columbian.

Senator Smith: The point I had in mind I might say was I was wondering whether there was any control over the news-stand sales of a paper like that because of the policy of the operators of the news-stand. We had some evidence that we don't get Maclean's on the top of a pile of magazines on our Canadian news-stands because that decision is made down in the United States.

Mr. Gray: Well, I just couldn't answer that.

Senator Prowse: The limitations—going from 30 to 45,000—my feeling would be that these papers would be printed on a press of limited size.

The Chairman: I was just going to suggest that, Senator—a physical capacity.

Senator Prowse: Yes, a physical capacity.

Mr. Gray: Well, that is the main reason or main factor in all these operations. They would love to be able to do more but they just have not got the physical capacity.

Senator Prowse: Their presses would be limited size presses?

Mr. Gray: Yess. The Express for instance, it is my understanding that it is printed at two different presses for two different printing houses simply because the one commercial printer hadn't the capacity to do the whole job.

Senator Nichol: May I ask Mr. Gray another question?

The Chairman: Certainly.

Senator Nichol: Putting aside the details in the report for the moment the question that is on my mind and maybe you can answer or comment on is this. A place like Vancouver and I suppose the same could be said of Toronto, or any large city, or growing megalopolis—I had a feeling that it is held together to a large extent by the daily press. And I have had the feeling in Vancouver in the last month because people are reading the Seattle papers and the Toronto papers and Victoria papers and weeklies that the sense of this megalopolis—the psychological sense—begins to deteriorate very quickly and people become very suburban in their thinking. The structure seems to break down.

Now, that is my impression and I wonder if you have thought about that?

Mr. Gray: Well, by this unstructured questionnaire and from my own conversation and observations I was struck by the fact that the other media, TV and radio, in their effort to provide news, seemed to be giving overwhelming amount of local news whereas the people I talked to and who answered the questionnaires indicated that they were really more interested in knowing what was going on in the outside world. There were some exceptions, of course, but there was a sense of frustration of not knowing what was going on—not only what was going on around you in your own community but what was going on outside the world despite the increased efforts of the two media to provide them with this information.

From my own experience it was so difficult to retain the information that you received.

The Chairman: Does that contribute to the point that Senator Nichol was making?

Senator Nichol: I feel that whatever structure there is is sort of disintegrating a little bit. Nobody quite knows what is going on.

The Chairman: The Georgia Straight doesn't do it for you?

Senator Nichol: It does it for me! The comment I heard all the time is "I used to like to take the paper home and read it when I felt like it but instead of that I have to remember to turn the radio on or I have to sit up till 1 o'clock to watch the news". I heard this all the time when I was there.

The Chairman: What kind of job do you think the electronic media has done?

Senator Nichol: No, this is the point. I think they have done a terrific job. I was putting on a series of small seminars on environment at a cathedral downtown at noon. We had a series of good speakers for five weeks and we just ran right out of gas because we had no newspapers to bring the people into the thing. But the radio stations were very helpful to us without any charge. They put announcements on five or six times a day trying to get the people in. I think the radio and television stations have done a tremendous job and not only in the sense of their own economic well-being either.

I think they really have moved in but that doesn't alter the fact that there is a big vacuum. There is a noticeable vacuum and I think the same would be true the other way. I think if you shut down the radio and television stations you would find that there was a pretty big vacuum as well. They are not doing the same job which is my suggestion.

The Chairman: One statistic in your survey—and I quite appreciate that it was a casual study and the inhibitions which you have expressed and so on—but I was interested in question 6 on this very point that people apparently think...

Senator Nichol: What page?

The Chairman: At page 36 just near the bottom. This would indicate that people think that radio is doing a better job than television on the news.

Mr. Gray: Well, I wouldn't stand by that statement.

The Chairman: Well, would you stand by the statement if I told you that every survey of this kind that I have ever seen says that they will go to radio before they would go to television. That is a question which has been asked hypothetically and it has been asked in all kinds of situations...

Senator Prowse: Print news.

The Chairman: Yes, print news, but people in most surveys, and I think you could find many say that they would go to radio ahead of television. Now, this tends to—and I agree that you wouldn't stand by it—but it tends to confirm that.

Senator Prowse: Well, I am a little reluctant to draw a conclusion as to what people actually feel comparatively to which medium they would rather get it from. I think the situation is this. You ask me where I get the news and I would tell you that I turn on the 8 o'clock radio in the morning and then when I am driving my car I get the news broadcasts from the car, and if I happen to be home between 6 and 7, which I seldom am, then I watch the TV news then but I usually try to catch the late TV news. The one supplies me with my running keep-up on the news and the other gives me wrap-ups to go to bed with at night and then in the day I grab a newspaper from time to time.

The Chairman: Gives you what?

Senator Prowse: Gives you a wrap-up on the news so you can go to bed knowing what's going on in the world, that's all.

The Chairman: I think Mr. Spears that you had a question?

Senator Prowse: I don't wrap-up the tube!

Mr. Borden Spears: Well, I had sort of a double-barrelled question but to some extent Senator Nichol has already dealt with it but I would like to hear what Mr. Gray has to say. As I say, this question is really in two parts about the quantity and the quality of the electronic media. You have dealt with it to some extent in your report, Mr. Gray, but overall is it your impression that the radio stations and TV stations have greatly expanded the amount of news coverage?

Mr. Gray: Undoubtedly.

Mr. Spears: Greatly extended it?

Mr. Gray: Undoubtedly.

Mr. Spears: So then the second part of my question arises from what Allan Fotheringham said in a CBC broadcast a week or so ago about the attempt to fill the gap by radio and television. He said that to him, it exposed the weakness, particularly of the radio stations covering the news because it became apparent that what they were doing was ripping and reading.

Mr. Gray: Was what?

Mr. Spears: That what the radio stations were doing, was giving the people a great deal more of the wire foreign news and international news because the radio stations were simply incapable of covering the local scene and exposed the fact that the radio stations had been leaning on the newspapers for their local coverage.

Now, you must have been listening and watching while you were there. Do you say that that is a fair assumption?

Mr. Gray: I would say that was true but I would also suggest that one way in which they have expanded, and it was admitted to me by one or two of the station operators, was that what they were doing is simply reading a second or third paragraph of a story that normally they may read only the first paragraph. This is how they have expanded. They are just providing a little more detail than normal, but again relying heavily on the wire services.

Mr. Spears: Just to re-inforce what you are saying, and I realize I am asking for a very subjective answer, but from your own viewing and listening would you say that the comprehensiveness of local news coverage on radio and television is considerably less or noticeably less than that provided by the newspapers?

Mr. Gray: I would say considerably less. I am sorry I am going to retract that, Mr. Spears, because not seeing the situation before I was out there it is hard for me to compare. I would say that from my experience as a journalist that you get a much broader picture of community news through the newspaper and that you get that greater detail and extra bit of information that is not normally provided by the radio and television stations.

The Chairman: Well, you have made the point of not being out there but Senator

Nichol being there all the time I think he could comment on that.

Senator Nichol: I think what you are really talking about here is a mathematical problem, and it is the amount of material that is in a newspaper. No matter how fast you speak, you simply can't put it all in on radio or T.V. So we are not really criticizing the techniques that are used in the print or electronic media because the fact is you simply cannot take a newspaper and read all night. You can cover it. People are selective and they like to have their newspaper at home so they can read what they want to read, read it again the next day and so it goes. They are just different things, and I think it is difficult really to answer it.

The Chairman: Does that answer your question, Mr. Spears?

Mr. Spears: Except that you have one station doing 12 hours a day reporting on news and so on...

Senator Nichol: Twelve hours a day?

Mr. Spears: You could cover a lot of news in 12 hours a day.

The Chairman: According to Mr. Gray's report...

Mr. Gray: CKVN—news and talk.

Senator Nichol: Oh, talk?

The Chairman: Yes.

Senator Nichol: Well, that is different. Who is that, Pat Burns?

Mr. Gray: No, no. That was CKVN. Pat Burns is CJOR. May I just interject, Mr. Spears, I did note on page 17 that CHAN had this regular in-depth feature as a nightly feature and they have cut back on its size to introduce more items of community news in their daily reports. This is an example of how the news coverage is being expanded.

The Chairman: Senator McElman?

Senator McElman: I would just like to go back to page 32 again, Mr. Chairman. We have had conflicting testimony before this Committee on several instances where applicants for CP wire service had run into obstacles that prevented them from getting it. We have had counter-testimony from CP that nobody has ever been turned down...

The Chairman: Excuse me, Senator McElman, but a couple of the people at the back have asked me to ask you to speak a little more loudly.

Senator McElman: We have had contra-evidence from CP that nobody has ever been turned down. Could we arrange to keep abreast of this situation both with CP and with the Express so that we know at the end of it—just exactly what took place?

The Chairman: A good suggestion.

Senator McElman: And going back to this discussion that we have just been having, I think Mr. Gray's paper, and a piece in this morning's Globe and Mail by Douglas Sagi, who is a reporter from Vancouver apparently, points out that the advertisers—mind you it would be selective advertisers, not the food chains and so on—but they went very quickly to radio and television and hit capacity—that is the time allowable by CRTC regulations—that they hit capacity and saturated it. Then they spilled over into weeklies and printed flyers and all that sort of thing. Both Lovick and O'Brien, the two principal advertising agencies on the coast claim to have higher billings during February—since the slow down—and this perhaps would reflect the higher rate in radio and television. They also point out that when you are using a dozen weeklies to reach the same audience that you do with dailies, the rate gets up beyond what you have been paying.

I do think, and Mr. Gray you can correct me if I am wrong, that it does indicate that the flow of advertising went very quickly to radio and television?

Mr. Gray: That is so.

Senator McElman: To an immediate saturation, is that correct?

Mr. Gray: Yes, that apparently took place.

The Chairman: You mentioned Lovick and O'Brien and maybe we should remind ourselves that they would be placing national advertising primarily. Most of the local advertising is placed directly which doesn't do anything to your point, but it is just something that we should have on the record.

Mr. Gray: Yes, I did not go into that. I didn't go into any details on the question of advertising but did talk to one or two firms there and this has certainly affected their national advertising campaigns. They have had to re-direct advertising, as you indicated, into other areas.

The weeklies, for instance, are getting a much greater percentage of national advertising than they would have previously and I believe one firm indicated that they had to hold back, or they are holding back, on national advertising programmes until the dispute is settled.

The Chairman: The point I am making is that the overwhelming majority of national advertising appearing in the media in Vancouver is placed out of Toronto. Conversely the majority of advertising which is being placed by these Vancouver advertising agencies is being placed in other parts of Canada because it is national advertising, and by and large what we have been talking about in the paper is the flow of local advertising.

Senator Prowse: I am interested—on page 26 you refer to the fact that the North Vancouver Citizen is now publishing what I take is a newly developed thing, Classified News with a circulation of 150,000.

Now, there is that, then you also refer to the fact—it doesn't matter where—but you refer to the fact that the big department stores are going to flyers. I am wondering if a thing like Classified News—a thing that just carries the classified ads, that if this goes on for any length of time I am wondering if there is a possibility this would become a permanent institution that might very severely cut into the classified section of the papers?

Is this thing being successful?

Mr. Gray: Well, it certainly is available.

The Chairman: It sounds it.

Mr. Gray: It certainly is available around the city and it is providing employment for the classified advertising salesmen who were thrown out of work, but as to the continuing success of it I wouldn't like to speculate.

I don't know—it would require a major decision on the part of the Citizen as to whether they want to. They are really up-tight now in terms of a physical plant. Do they want to go ahead and maintain this increased staff they have and all the attendant overheads as well—I would think that they wouldn't.

Senator Nichol: I would think that it would be very uneconomical. You have additional distribution costs and the regular papers would be doing it anyway and putting the papers in the houses and I think it would last about 30 minutes after the strike was settled.

Senator Prowse: Well, that is something I was wondering about. The other thing is about flyers. We had a strike in Edmonton, back in 1947 or '48, and during that time the department stores started to get flyers out because the papers were putting out a very limited paper during the period and it took quite a long time. I am not sure that they ever did completely get back the flyer business. They may have it now but it was a matter of years. Once it got off on its own they set up their own organization to handle it. Did you hear any discussion about that possibility?

Mr. Gray: No, I just heard the other side. The poor housewife was being seiged with these things.

Senator Prowse: They get annoyed because they are getting so many?

Mr. Gray: They get annoyed and it is not a very reliable form of distribution either because they have hired a great deal of casual labour or workers to distribute this. Some housewives I talked to weren't getting any in their districts. One assumes that they are publishing these things in the hundreds of thousands but how many of them are thrown into the ditch or into the wastepaper basket without ever being distributed.

Senator Prowse: Or just dumped in a corridor.

Mr. Gray: Yes. There is really no control of them. I don't think the department stores would like to rely on this form.

The Chairman: I wonder if you know perhaps, Senator Nichol knows, if I am not mistaken there is a regional edition—a regional Lower Mainland, perhaps even a Vancouver edition of Time Magazine. Has Time done anything in the area of increasing its coverage of Canadian news in the Vancouver market?

Mr. Gray: Well, they are just now starting to publish that regional edition of Time.

The Chairman: You mean "printed"?

Mr. Gray: Yes, it is being printed in Vancouver but I see no evidence of any extra Canadian news.

The Chairman: But as I understand it the local advertiser in Vancouver could buy the Vancouver market only. I am wondering if they have done anything in the news area?

Senator Nichol: I have no idea but my guess, and it would be just a guess, is that the answer would be "no" because it is a national news magazine and I don't think they are intending...

The Chairman: Well, the point of my question is not to whether or not they give more news on what is happening in Vancouver but do they give more news on what is happening in Canada?

Senator Nichol: I have no idea.

Mr. Gray: You just have to count the pages and they just have the usual four pages in this week's issue.

The Chairman: Are there other questions the Senators may have?

Senator McElman: I was wondering in particular with respect to radio advertising where the saturation was quickly reached within the confines of CRTC regulations. We have heard so much about the radio time other than advertising being filled so much with music and so on. Do you know if there have been any applications to the CRTC to relax its ratio of advertising to total time in this special situation to provide advertiser service. Do you know if there has been such an application?

Mr. Gray: To the best of my knowledge no, there was no reference made to any kind of application by the owners of the stations that I have talked to.

The Chairman: There will probably be one this afternoon when they hear of your suggestion.

Mr. Gray: Well, I was interested to note for instance that KVOS is restricted to only 10 minutes of advertising as opposed to 12 in Canada.

The Chairman: Are there other questions the Senators have? If not, I don't want to prolong the session. If there are no other questions then perhaps I may say on behalf of the Committee I could first of all thank Senator Nichol for coming and giving us the benefits of his comments and advice.

Mr. Gray, we are grateful to you and if I may say, at page 10 your phrase "a veritable plague of flyers thumping against the doorsteps of Greater Vancouver" is what I would describe as vintage Walter Gray.

Mr. Gray: Well, I am glad to know I haven't lost my touch.

The Chairman: It may be that the Committee will want to take a subsequent look at this situation and perhaps if the dispute is prolonged perhaps again later on or as you have suggested to me privately in writing, it might be useful to conduct some sort of a study immediately following the end of the dispute.

If I may, Senators, just very briefly and then we will adjourn, put before you the schedule for next week.

There will be an in-camera session at 10 a.m. on Tuesday at 140 Wellington Street. The first public session is at 2.30 on Tuesday afternoon with Selkirk Holdings Limited and at 4 o'clock on Tuesday afternoon, Moffat Broadcasting Limited. At 8 o'clock on Tuesday night, Mr. Ben Bagdikian who is presently a special writer with the Washington Post. He is generally regarded as the best known writer and critic of the press in the United States. He is a very frequent contributor on press subjects, as you may know, to Harper's, the Columbia Journalism Review. He has been active in establishing community press councils in a number of American cities. He has held several university teaching posts and has held editorial positions for example at the Saturday Evening Post. Mr. Bagdikian is the witness on Tuesday night at 8 o'clock.

And then on Wednesday, March the 25th, the final session of the Committee before the Easter break at 10 a.m. we have CFPL Broadcasting from London. At 11.15 CHSJ Broadcasting from Saint John, New Brunswick. And then the final session at 2.30 in the afternoon, March the 25th, the witness will be Mr. Pierre Berton.

This session is adjourned. Thank you.

The Committee adjourned to Tuesday March 24, 1970, at 2.30 p.m.

SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE ON MASS MEDIA

EVIDENCE

Ottawa, Tuesday, March 24, 1970.

The Special Senate Committee on Mass Media met this day at 2.30 p.m.

Senator Keith Davey (Chairman) in the Chair.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, if I may call the session to order. Before we turn to the brief from Selkirk Holdings Limited, I have a short statement to read.

"The Senate Committee on Mass Media has no intention of entering into a controversy with the Canadian Association of Broadcasters. Honourable senators will recall the Canadian Association of Broadcasting presentation of Friday, March 13. The committee was, and remains, interested in any expression of views from this important organization.

It might therefore be well to have on our record the following press release which is self-explanatory and which was issued by the Canadian Association of Broadcasters last Friday. The Canadian Association of Broadcasters, March 20, 1970. Commissioner Nicholas Johnson appeared on Tuesday, March 17, before our Senate Committee on Mass Media. Although an invitation to do so was issued by that committee, we will take up with it the desirability of inviting non-Canadian witnesses. At the risk of creating international ill-feeling, we nonetheless find it incredible that Commissioner Johnson did not confine his remarks to matters lying wholly within his jurisdiction, but became involved in Canadian conditions of a controversial nature thereby necessarily taking a stand on one side of issues current in this country.

We take no exception to Commissioner Johnson expressing on a Canadian platform his opinions about American broadcasting, however denigrating these might be. However, we think it is rude and offensive when he uses that platform to take a partisan stance on Canadian broadcasting concerning which he cannot have and does not have any inside knowledge. This caused unnecessary and avoidable damage to Canadian-U.S. relations and it is offensive to a substantial body of opinions in this country. We wish to formally register a protest at the course of action taken and suggest when high officers of the U.S. government are invited to appear before public bodies in this country they refrain from becoming involved in purely Canadian issues. The Canadian Association of Broadcasters also finds it disturbing that a Canadian body of public inquiry finds it necessary to provide a forum for witnesses from the United States when dealing with totally Canadian matters. Moreover, the views of Commissioner Johnson were predictable because of his long record of hostility to the media generally and broadcasting particularly in the U.S.

We hope that the committee will give consideration to the matter of fairness and balance and therefore accept evidence from an American who is neutral."

That is the end of the press release and I simply would like to add these observations.

In fairness, it might be useful to point out that Commissioner Johnson in his testimony before our committee, clearly indicated that as an American, he was really in no position to pass judgment on broadcasting in Canada.

His views were of sufficient interest to the CAB's member network, the Canadian Television Network—CTV—that they devoted nearly ten minutes of Sunday night's prime time "W5" program to an interview which was filmed with Commissioner Johnson when he was in Ottawa.

While we respect the CAB's concern about Canadian problems, it should also be noted for the record that two of the three major speakers at the 1969 annual meeting were from the United States, the other was from Britain. The key note speaker at the 1970 CAB annual meeting (which was recently postponed) was to have been Julian Goodman, the President of NBC, New York.

Perhaps I might also refer to the CBC television program, "Weekend", which this past Sunday evening carried an interview between Doug Collins, and Vancouver freelance broadcaster, Jack Webster. Mr. Webster said that in spite of repeated efforts, he had been unable to talk to me. For the record, I was interviewed by Mr. Webster on CKNW Vancouver for about ten minutes last Thursday morning—more than 72 hours prior to the time the Sunday night interview appeared—but obviously after it was filmed.

The Committee's interest in the continuing loss of newspaper service in Vancouver is a matter of record.

Having said those things, Mr. President, we turn to the brief we are receiving this afternoon from Selkirk Holdings Limited. Seated with me and indeed beside me on my immediate right is Mr. J Stuart MacKay who is the President of Selkirk Holdings Limited. Mr. MacKay has brought with him a number of members of the Selkirk Holdings Limited organization and rather than attempt to introduce all of these people, I am going to ask you to do that.

Perhaps before I do, Mr. MacKay, I should say that the brief we requested was forwarded to the committee in compliance with our guidelines more than three weeks in advance. It has been circulated to the senators and presumably it has been read and studied by them.

We now turn to you for about 15 minutes of oral comment. You can expand upon the brief, explain it, amplify it, take away from it, or add other points. Following that the Senators would like to question you on the contents of your brief on the oral statement, and indeed on other matters which may not be touched upon in either your oral statement or your brief. When we come to that point in the hearings—and you have been here before so you will know this—if there are any questions you wish to refer to any of your colleagues, please do.

Welcome, and it might be a useful beginning if you would introduce your team.

Mr. J. Stuart MacKay, President, Selkirk Holdings Limited: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman. This is an informal meeting, as some told me, and I would just like to say "hear, hear" to your comments about Mr. Johnson. I am not an advocate for Ed Sullivan, but anyone, who has any knowledge of the Ed Sullivan program, knows that perhaps he has done more than any other single American entrepreneur in exposing Canadian talent, not only to Canadians through the program which we carry, but also to citizens in the United States.

Perhaps I should first introduce my team, as we say. On my immediate right is Mr. Norman Botterill, Vice-President of Selkirk Holdings Limited. On the chairman's left is Mr. Frank Nash, Vice-President, Finance, of Selkirk Holdings Limited. Mr. Bill Hutton, who is the News Director for radio station CKWX in Vancouver. On Mr. Botterill's right is Mr. Ross McCreath who is Vice-President of Selkirk Holdings Limited and the General Manager of All-Canada Radio and Television Limited, one of our companies—Mr. Victor Reed who is the director of our cablevision activities, Mr. David Penn, who is President of Channel 2, CHCT-TV, Calgary. Mr. Bill Spears a Vice-President of Selkirk Holdings Limited.

They are here because in many respects Selkirk provides the blood and they provide the brains. If we get into some real questioning I am quite sure they will be able to come up with some real answers.

Let me say at the outset that as owners and operators of a variety of radio and television stations and cable vision companies, we have a very real interest in being here today—to try to be of any help we can in assessing the roles of private and public broadcasting, and where it fits into the total communications structure of our country.

I believe Selkirk Holdings Limited reflects as well as any company the story of the growth of broadcasting in Canada—starting from small beginnings that can be traced back to about 50 years when broadcasting first commenced in Canada, and indeed in the world.

Our submission to you, I hope, captures some of the basic philosophy, and something of our role as entrepreneurs in the continuing expansion of our industry, keeping pace with technological developments and general growth of our nation.

We think of ourselves as being something in the order of pioneers—and this is particularly true today—for no sooner do we develop some skills in radio, and then in television when cablevision arrives on the scene with its particular set of challenges, to be followed very shortly thereafter by educational television and then by satellite transmission—each concerned with questions of ownership financial capability, Canadian content, and the resources of manpower and all dealing in the final analysis, with the structure and the means of best serving the interests of the only the public and private sector of broadcasting, but our country.

In examining the role of a broadcaster today: he has to live in the very real world of the present, but at the same time, in light of the "nature of the rapid technological growth" that is so much a part of electronic communications. An increasingly important part of his life is spent living in the future.

I realize that the Committee will undoubtedly have questions to put to me and my associates regarding Canadian content and ownership—and that is certainly the present. However, with the permission of the committee, I wonder if I might touch a little on the future—for it occurs to me that some of the points of interest might answer some of the questions that you have in mind.

By 1980, broadcasting in Canada will, to many of us, represent something more of a scene written by George Orwell, than perhaps broadcasting as we know it today. Prediction is still an imprecise science, however, the present state of our technology signals dramatic developments in the way we will live, in the way we work, and the way we spend our leisure time ten years from now.

Here are some possibilities:

1. Communication teamed with the computer could become the number one employer of the people in our country.
2. By 1980 we may have as many as six or seven, publicly subsidized radio and television systems serving Canada.
3. By 1980 every television household will have at least one colour set.
4. Viewers will have the opportunity to tape programs directly off the air.
5. We forecast that within the next ten years more capital could be expended in electronic communication than has been spent since the broadcasting industry came into being some 50 years ago.
6. As a result of satellite transmission, news presentations will be available of a completely global nature.

Before the opportunities of the seventies can be attained however, changes will undoubtedly have to be made in the Broadcasting Act, changes that may affect the rules under which the CRTC operates, and the roles of both the private and public sector.

In such a period we must avoid becoming enmeshed in the tyranny of the small decision to the detriment of neglecting the broader issues affecting Canada. Here, I refer not only to such matters as multi-ownership, the economics of modern communications and Canadian content, but to questions of pollution, education, politics, the family, our environment and Canada's relationship with the United States—these are some of the issues, I suggest, the answers to which could bring about changes in the present methods of conducting the business of broadcasting.

Of recent date and particularly over the past two or three years, there has been a fair amount of criticism levelled at not only the private but the public sector of our broadcasting system. The Canadian Radio-Television Commission's role is becoming increasingly complex with the expansion of both the public and private sector, the introduction of cable and soon to be revealed educational television and satellite communication. As Chairman Juneau has suggested, the Commission is empowered to operate within the framework or terms of the present Broadcasting Act.

The Senate committee, however, does not have to confine itself to such terms and, as a result, I feel it has an opportunity to make a major contribution—one which could benefit both the Canadian public and our broadcasting system.

Another area of importance, we believe, concerns the taking of a leadership role by the Government in the matter of maintaining public encouragement of our broadcasting media. As a member of the broadcasting industry and the employee of a public company, the subject of public confidence in Canada's electronic media continues as a matter of prime concern as it represents a key to the present and the future growth of Canada's communications contracts. I realize that the public and private sectors must earn such public confidence and this is particularly so in the case of public companies. With the substantial capital commitments to be made just ahead, the need to encourage the full use of the resources of the private sector in order to keep pace with the future development of our industry.

During the seventies, it will become increasingly important that private enterprise maintain its place beside that of the public sector in terms of investment, expansion and capability. Should this not be the case then the Canadian broadcasting division of public and private responsibility will change with private ownership and participation subsequently lagging behind. Recently a considerable amount has been said about the value of Canadian content of programs to our broadcasting system. The nature of the Canadian system and its ownership equally represent one of the significant values that has helped Canada to reach the possibility of world leadership in broadcast communications. It may well be that the approach to communications developed in Canada represents one of our country's most valuable natural resources.

As emphasized in our formal report to the Committee, Canada has created a broadcasting structure that stands today as a capable, vital communications complex that applies of the rare ingredient of private and public enterprise. We have developed an approach to communications that is considered to be one of the finest in the world. What is at stake during the seventies is not the sudden retreat of our system, but rather lack of money, lack of confidence, or lack of understanding of the dynamics of broadcasting. There is a possibility of the system slowing down in terms of its potential, bogged down by a combination of regulations, economics, technology and manpower shortage.

We need to encourage support of broadcasting institutions, and most important we need to encourage and recognize at the same time those who are in broadcasting for individual achievement and initiative. During the next ten years, we suggest that corporations will provide a measure of stability and resource in terms of people and money for the development of broadcasting and that this can clearly be in the public interest. Government and business in the next decade will recognize both the values and the responsibilities of a corporate approach to broadcasting all of which can result in improved service for Canadians.

The next decade will see the consumer too coming into his own. The age of the consumer is certainly with us now and business, broadcasting and governments will be asked to assume increased responsibility. During the years immediately ahead, it will be important for companies such as ours to recognize the dangers of falling into an inflexible position of large companies losing some of their vitality and their drive. In communications we should all be encouraged to keep our options open and to remain flexible for the changes that will be coming at us quickly.

In terms of news it will continue to represent a responsibility for broadcasters to maintain a balance as between editorial and advertising. It will also be our task to make sure that resources and information remain free and open—that any agent which acts between the broadcast journalist and the actual source of news be watched most carefully.

Mr. Chairman, I hope these comments have been of interest—the private and public participation we had in broadcasting in Canada, has established over the years, a working relationship which in the seventies, under our free enterprise system has the capability of producing the greatest gains for our country. In the next decade ahead, broadcasting will emerge as a skilful blend of ownership, technology and program information. It will help Canadians to meet the challenge of a new age. Thank you very much.

The Chairman: Thank you very much, Mr. MacKay. As I said, if you wish to refer any of our questions to your colleagues, please feel free to do so. I believe the session this afternoon will start with Mr. Fortier.

Mr. Fortier: Mr. MacKay, before we get into the meat of your brief, I think we should try and elucidate a couple of points which I would like to put to you. Your largest single shareholder is Southam, is that correct?

Mr. MacKay: Yes, sir.

Mr. Fortier: They own some 30 per cent of your class B voting shares?

Mr. MacKay: Right.

Mr. Fortier: And 30.7 per cent of your class A common, non-voting?

Mr. MacKay: I think right at the moment they own somewhere between 20 and 25 per cent of our non-voting shares.

Mr. Fortier: Of your non-voting shares?

Mr. MacKay: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: Could we have the exact figures?

Mr. MacKay: I think Mr. Nash would have that.

The Chairman: Mr. Nash?

Mr. Frank Nash, Vice-President, Finance, Selkirk Holdings Limited: Well, I think it about...

Mr. Fortier: Well, while Mr. Nash is looking for the figures, can you tell us how the holdings can fluctuate at different times? Is that done through sale and purchase on the exchange or is that done through other methods?

Mr. MacKay: To the best of my knowledge it only occurs through the other methods; not through the sales of their shares on the exchange.

Mr. Fortier: And those other methods?

Mr. MacKay: For example, when we had a public issue of shares for a private placement of shares and release shares from the treasury—recently we had a private underwriting and I think there were approximately 300,000 shares sold. None of the directors, such as Southam, participated in that sale.

Mr. Fortier: So their holdings were diluted correspondingly?

Mr. MacKay: That is right.

The Chairman: I think Mr. Nash may have the answer now.

Mr. Nash: 22.4%—that is Class A.

Mr. Fortier: That is class A non-voting?

Mr. Nash: That is right.

Mr. Fortier: Twenty-two...

Mr. Nash:—point four.

Mr. Fortier: And class B voting remained at 30 per cent?

Mr. Nash: That is right.

Mr. Fortier: Does their share interest entitle them to have—is it three directors on your board?

Mr. MacKay: Yes. There are a total of ten directors on the board of Selkirk—three directors are employee directors, three are Southam directors and four are non-employees, non-Southam, outside...

Mr. Fortier: Commonly referred to as outside directors?

Mr. MacKay: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: You don't consider that three Southam nominees as outside directors?

Mr. MacKay: Well, I was putting Southam as a group. They are certainly outside directors.

The Chairman: Which are the three Southam directors?

Mr. MacKay: The three Southam directors at the present time are Gordon Fisher, Michael Harrison and George Crawford.

The Chairman: Thank you.

Mr. Fortier: George...

Mr. MacKay: Crawford.

Mr. Fortier: He is the attorney?

Mr. MacKay: Yes. He is a lawyer from Calgary.

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Harrison, whose name you just mentioned, appeared before the CRTC last month on Tuesday, February 10, and stated that Southam did not participate in the day-to-day operation of the Selkirk stations but that, and I quote:

"... they participated in major, financial and policy decisions."

Would you care to explain to the committee what this involvement by Southam "in major, financial and policy decisions" of Selkirk amounts to?

Mr. MacKay: Yes, I will attempt to. First of all, I think I should say that their participation is no different than any other director.

Mr. Fortier: You don't mean any other director, you mean any other group of shareholders?

Mr. MacKay: Any other director. They are members of our Board of Directors.

Mr. Fortier: The three of them?

Mr. MacKay: Yes. They believe that they assume the same duties that each of the other directors assume, and they are, in broad terms, to assist in the determination of the corporate policy of Selkirk Holdings Limited and to assure that the business of Selkirk is conducted properly. They review management performance, review management compensation—my compensation for example—and management development. They make information available and look after the interest of the common shareholders. They encourage management in attempting to prove the company and certainly encourage us to look ahead, to innovate where possible.

Mr. Fortier: How do they, in practice, differentiate between their direct interest in the company as opposed to their indirect interest through their shareholdings in Selkirk? You know, there are those companies, such as the Calgary Broadcasting, Edmonton Broadcasting where Southam both has a direct participation in the equity of the company as well as participation through Selkirk. How do the Southam directors who sit on the Selkirk board differentiate in practice between the interest on the one hand of Selkirk and the interest of Southam?

Mr. MacKay: Well, Mr. Fortier, I really can't tell you how they differentiate...

Mr. Fortier: Well, how do you feel they differentiate?

Mr. MacKay: Yes, perhaps I should tell you that we are talking about something, I hope, that is rather ancient history.

Mr. Fortier: Well, CHCH is not ancient history?

Mr. MacKay: Two years ago Selkirk and Southam sat down and entered into a series of discussions and we discussed this question of these interests in which we both hold—joint interests—and we decided that it would be desirable if we did not continue to hold joint interests in the station you referred to. We entered into an agreement and the agreement has been filed with the CRTC which will see Southam withdrawing—selling their interest to Selkirk in those stations and other investments such as cable in which we both hold a joint interest.

Mr. Fortier: I see. This is a written agreement which is filed—entered into and filed with the CRTC?

Mr. MacKay: This is a written agreement and submissions have been filed with the CRTC. We are hoping the matter will be coming up very soon.

Mr. Fortier: Could you file a copy of that agreement before the committee?

Mr. MacKay: We could file a copy of each agreement but each one is different.

Mr. Fortier: You mean with respect to each individual station?

Mr. MacKay: That is right.

The Chairman: May I just ask for clarification—are these all Southam broadcasting holdings?

Mr. MacKay: No. There is one interest which they hold—I believe this is the case—I have not—I can't speak for them but I believe they hold an interest in London.

The Chairman: I am sure they hold an interest in London.

Mr. MacKay: That is the one. That is the only one. The other interests which they have which is not a joint interest was CKOY Ottawa, and we have also agreed to purchase that. They have agreed to sell it to us.

Mr. Fortier: So in all these instances they have agreed to sell and you have agreed to buy?

Mr. MacKay: Right.

Mr. Fortier: Is it as firm as I have just put it?

Mr. MacKay: It is firmer.

Mr. Fortier: So it is now up before the CRTC for approval?

Mr. MacKay: It is before the CRTC for approval and we have asked for a hearing.

Mr. Fortier: Yes.

Mr. MacKay: It is in their hands.

Mr. Fortier: So in all those joint ownership situations...

Mr. MacKay: Yes. There were actually, I believe, four joint interests involved—CJCA in Edmonton, CFAC in Calgary, the Greater Winnipeg Cablevision Limited which is a cablevision company in Winnipeg and Hamilton.

Mr. Fortier: That is Niagara?

Mr. MacKay: Niagara Television Limited

Senator Beaubien: Mr. MacKay, is that why you issued new stock?

Mr. MacKay: No, it really wasn't. What we have been doing over the past few years is buying a few other things from time to time and it was my view that before turning the financing of anything as substantial as channel 11 that it would be a matter of good housekeeping to clear all the decks and free ourselves of debts that we had incurred on prior acquisitions.

Mr. Fortier: How was the price arrived at? Was it arrived at by negotiations between Southam and Selkirk, or did the Southams fix it unilaterally?

Mr. MacKay: No. We had experienced that sort of thing before and we agreed to seek an independent authority for an independent evaluation. Now we both had an opportunity, if after we received the evaluation, we could back away from it, so to speak, so we chose a company where we didn't have an interest and gave them the facts.

Mr. Fortier: Was that an easy thing to do?

Mr. MacKay: Well, that depends. It is a relative term—easy—but it was done and I would say that it was done in a very agreeable fashion. We are very satisfied and I have reason to believe that they are very satisfied.

Mr. Fortier: So that there was an outside firm that made an evaluation of the value of the shares?

Mr. MacKay: Of the investments.

Mr. Fortier: Of the investments, yes. And you were not bound to accept their valuation?

Mr. MacKay: Not at all.

Mr. Fortier: Any more than Southam were?

Mr. MacKay: That was the marvellous part about it all. We could just get up and walk away if we wanted to.

Mr. Fortier: But again in actual fact, am I correct in saying that the parties have agreed now to accept the valuation made by this independent appraiser?

Mr. MacKay: Yes sir.

The Chairman: Could I just ask about Mr. Harrison's role...

Mr. MacKay: I would just like to say one thing as well, that in connection with channel 4, there was a little different process we went through because I think Southam owned a minority interest there and we had to negotiate with other people. I think the Soble estate—they were very much of a key factor, and also Mr. Nathanson who had an interest as well. We are talking about the point interest of Calgary, Edmonton and Greater Winnipeg Cable. There they were just three there just the two of us were involved and nobody else, and so we had to find a formula that we felt would be in the interest of our shareholders—in the interest of the public and also settle our own blood pressures.

Mr. Fortier: To the extent of at least 30 per cent, Southams were selling to themselves?

Mr. MacKay: Well, I don't know whether Southam's would say that was so.

Mr. Fortier: Well, to the extent of their interest in Selkirk.

Mr. MacKay: Well, to the extent of their interest or investment in Selkirk I suppose they felt this was useful.

Mr. Fortier: They were selling to themselves.

Mr. MacKay: I don't know whether it was selling to themselves because, you see, they don't own Selkirk.

Mr. Fortier: No, but I was careful to say, to the extent of their equity participation in Selkirk, they were in fact selling their direct interest in these companies...

Mr. MacKay: To Selkirk.

Mr. Fortier: To Selkirk, right.

Mr. MacKay: Right. I might just say that the Soble Estate and Mr. Nathanson are going to be substantial shareholders of Selkirk as well so that I wouldn't want you to think that just Southams were interested in Selkirk.

Mr. Fortier: That is in the case of the Hamilton station?

Mr. MacKay: Yes.

The Chairman: I think when Southam retained Mr. Harrison originally—I see you have here Vice-President, Tele-Information Southam Press Limited. I believe that is a new title for Mr. Harrison, isn't it?

Mr. MacKay: Yes.

The Chairman: Wasn't he Vice-President Broadcasting?

Mr. MacKay: That is a new title but—I can't really say for sure but I think his first title was Vice-President of Broadcasting.

The Chairman: And he is now Vice-President of Tele-information?

Mr. MacKay: Tele-information, yes.

The Chairman: Does that involve anything more than the Southam relationship with Selkirk?

Mr. MacKay: I think it is a kind of a new field that he is interested in. I think he is now becoming very concerned about many other areas of the electronic communications such as information retrieval, and I think they are examining programming and they are examining many, many other areas than the areas with which we have been associated with them for so long.

Mr. Fortier: This policy of expansion—I think we could call it such—on the part of Selkirk in acquiring from Southam their interest in broadcasting media—is it being pursued? Is Selkirk still in the market for other broadcasting interests in Canada?

Mr. MacKay: I think to say categorically yes or no is too categorical. I think we would say that we are interested in growing under the terms of the sort of standards we feel are acceptable for such growth. We just don't take everything that comes down the pipe, if you know what I mean. I would say that where we feel it is in the interest of the company, and of the public, I think we would be interested in growing.

Mr. Fortier: Would you be interested, for example, in acquiring Southam's 20 per cent interest in CFPL in London?

Mr. MacKay: We have never discussed it.

Mr. Fortier: Would you tell us why Southam's interest in CFPL is excluded from this blanket agreement?

Mr. MacKay: I think it has to do with the fact that there is a tremendous amount of ancient history and a relationship with Southam in terms of the newspapers originally. I am not just exactly sure what the shares are—if the shares are shares of the London Free Press and from the Free Press into the television stations, I really don't know. I really can't comment on it, but I know there is a long relationship there.

Mr. Fortier: It wasn't a case of Selkirk saying "We don't want those"?

Mr. MacKay: As a matter of fact we didn't even discuss it. That is a fact. We just sort of know that there is that kind of relationship. I think that Mr. Blackburn, in my opinion, is a person that certainly if the Southams were interested in selling, should be considered.

The Chairman: But Selkirk would like to acquire that interest?

Mr. MacKay: I would want to look at it very carefully. I haven't examined their statement and I just couldn't say that I would want to buy anything these days without taking a good hard look at it.

Mr. Fortier: So you are in the market if, as you put it, they...

Mr. MacKay: The criteria...

Mr. Fortier: ...are met.

Mr. MacKay: ...are met, yes.

Mr. Fortier: Are all your broadcasting holdings, Mr. MacKay, referred to in your brief? This is a loaded question so maybe I should go on immediately to another one. For example, I did not notice any reference to Canastel in your brief. Don't you have an interest in Canastel?

Mr. MacKay: Perhaps Mr. Nash can tell you what Canastel is about.

Mr. Nash: Yes, we have an interest in Canastel which we acquired last summer. Canastel is a holding company which owns approximately 12 per cent of British Columbia Television and 25 per cent of CJCH Limited in Halifax. We own 44.9 per cent of Canastel and Western Broadcasting own 55.1 per cent.

Mr. Fortier: So that is another company through which you have an interest in broadcasting in British Columbia?

Mr. Nash: That is right. I think that is reflected indirectly in our total interest in British Columbia.

Mr. Fortier: Yes, I guess I could have read it into that, but I did not see the name Canastel in your brief.

Mr. Nash: No.

Mr. Fortier: What about Castleton Investments?

Mr. Nash: Castleton Investments is a holding company which owns interests in British Columbia Television and interests in Ottawa Cablevision Limited.

Mr. Fortier: I think we forgot to mention that through Canastel you also have an interest in CJCH in Halifax, do you not?

Mr. Nash: Yes.

The Chairman: I believe he mentioned that.

Mr. Nash: Yes, I did mention that.

Mr. Fortier: So these are two other companies in which you again have an interest in broadcasting in British Columbia as well as in Nova Scotia?

Mr. Nash: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: Greater Winnipeg Cablevision—is it mentioned in the brief?

Mr. Nash: I think it is 25 per cent.

The Chairman: It is mentioned at page 119.

Mr. Fortier: Well, that is a minority interest?

Mr. Nash: Yes.

Mr. MacKay: It is a minority interest.

Mr. Fortier: Yes.

Mr. MacKay: Those companies that you referred to are companies that do hold the additional interest in B.C. Television and that is how we acquired that additional interest which was added to the total interest you see.

The Chairman: Why would you not list those holdings on page 120 where you list minority interests?

Mr. MacKay: I don't know.

The Chairman: Well, that is not a loaded question, but I am just curious as to why...

Mr. N. A. Botterill, Vice President, Selkirk Holdings Limited: My oversight. The ultimate holdings are shown under B.C. Television.

The Chairman: I don't put it to you critically except as it relates to the original speech in the Senate when I made some statements about Selkirk Holdings Limited and you vote me a letter, I think justifiably, saying that I had perhaps overstated the case. On the other hand, isn't it true that not too many people, certainly very few listeners, understand who owns what in Selkirk Holdings Limited?

Mr. MacKay: I don't know the degree of interest of listeners to the ownership, but I do know that shareholders—we report it in our quarterly statements in detail whenever we acquire anything and we try to keep every shareholder completely up to date on our activities.

The Chairman: Well, if I may pursue this just for the moment. Although it is not in the brief, indirectly through Canastel you control 25 per cent of CJCH in Halifax, is that correct?

Mr. Nash: We have an indirect interest.

The Chairman: Do you think the listeners to that station are aware of your indirect interest?

Mr. MacKay: I would say that I don't think they are aware, but I don't think many listeners are aware of really who owns that particular station.

The Chairman: Well, that is exactly my next question. Should they?

Mr. MacKay: Well, I would say this. If it is in the public interest, I don't see any reason why they shouldn't.

The Chairman: Do you think it is in the public interest?

Mr. MacKay: Well, to the extent of anyone feeling that is sort of a hiding situation, certainly they should know.

The Chairman: Mr. MacKay, when you yourself are listening to a radio station or watching a television station, or indeed reading a newspaper, don't you like to know who owns it? Do you care?

Mr. MacKay: Well, Mr. Chairman, do you really know who owns anything these days?

The Chairman: Well, I am beginning to wonder. I would sure like to, wouldn't you?

Mr. MacKay: I think I would like to know who is the key owner. I never get too disturbed at the long list of shareholders of all the companies in this country, or owners of various enterprises, but it seems to me that the key must be that if there is an interest, I see no reason why they shouldn't be advised at all. I know, for example,—I look at various publications and I often say "Who owns this?"

Mr. Fortier: Well, shouldn't the question be phrased this way? Should not the owners consider it to be in the public interest that their listeners, or viewers, or readers know who owns the stations, or who owns the newspaper?

Mr. Nash: May I just interrupt here?

The Chairman: Certainly.

Mr. Nash: The CRTC has not approved the sale of CJCH Canastel's portion in that regard so we really don't own it officially as yet. There would be no point in advising anybody...

Mr. Fortier: We will exclude that one from our discussions.

Mr. MacKay: I think the principle of saying "Is the public interested in who owns whatever it is they want to know about"—I see no reason why they should be kept in the dark.

Mr. Fortier: Well, I think you have made that point very clearly, but the question I ask is, do you as an owner, or a representative of an owner, do you not feel that it is incumbent upon you to tell your listeners or your viewers?

Mr. MacKay: To be absolutely honest, I have never felt that thing as sort of a problem and I have never felt any sensitivity to it.

Mr. Botterhill: It seems to me that the position which Mr. MacKay has taken, or tried to explain, has never occurred to us. It is just that over these years, all these things have evolved into what our ownership is today; but right from the very beginning, they were separate companies—CFAC in Calgary is the Calgary Broadcasting Company which is publicized and known and our interest has grown in those over a period of time. And this matter of ultimate ownership behind Calgary Broadcasting has just never occurred. We don't promote, we don't identify as a Selkirk station—CFAC in Calgary is Calgary Broadcasting, or Edmonton Broadcasting, or whatever.

Mr. MacKay: Other than in all of our statements we print very clearly what we do own and send it to a wide source of news editors, financial page editors, every shareholder, and to all sorts of people, such as the Government. We send this out to a few thousand people so that there is a fair amount of information going out now, if you know what I mean.

Mr. Fortier: Yes.

Mr. MacKay: But as for public ads, if you are thinking of that sort of thing, we have just never thought of it.

The Chairman: I think specifically what we are thinking about is not the group you have mentioned, as important as all of these people are, we are thinking about the listener.

Mr. MacKay: I would like to find out just what our listeners think of that. Some of these interests boil down to pretty small potatoes, you know, with people.

The Chairman: You mean your listeners really don't care?

Mr. MacKay: Well, I think when you get down to 1.2 per cent or .5 per cent, .4 per cent, such as in B.C. Television you have a long, long list of shareholders and of course they also sell their shares from time to time so it is a fluctuating thing.

The Chairman: Well, let's take—you own according to the information I have here—you have a one-third interest in CHBC Television in Kelowna. Do the viewers to that Kelowna television station—are they aware of that one-third interest?

Mr. MacKay: Yes I would say that they are aware of it this way. They are aware that in Okanagan—for example, I am glad that you brought that up because I think each one of these cases has a little...

The Chairman: Is a special situation?

Mr. MacKay: In Okanagan, for example, would say that the public at large know that Okanagan Television is owned one-third by CKOV, one-third by CJIB in Vernon, and one-third by someone from out of town. I think that is well known because the three stations there in the valley originally financed it and they had to hustle about and stir up a lot of enthusiasm for it. I would think that that is not a constant thing in their mind however.

The Chairman: Do you think that viewers and listeners care who owns the stations in Canada?

Mr. MacKay: I think that they care on occasion.

The Chairman: Do you Mr. Botterill?

Mr. Botterill: Not generally speaking, no.

The Chairman: Do you think they should?

Mr. Botterill: I can't see any real reason.

The Chairman: You can't?

Mr. Botterill: The station—it is an entity in the community that is either good, bad or indifferent.

The Chairman: Well, let us take a hypothetical case—let us say it is bad?

Mr. Botterill: Yes.

The Chairman: Wouldn't it be in the public interest for them to know who is running that bad station?

Mr. Botterill: Well, they know who is running it locally and they can go to them.

The Chairman: They don't know who owns it though you said.

Mr. Botterill: Not the ultimate holding of Selkirk, but they know...

The Chairman: They know who to go to to complain to?

Mr. Botterill: Exactly.

The Chairman: Fine.

Senator Beaubien: Has anyone asked who owns it?

Mr. MacKay: I am sure on occasion that they have, and whenever they have asked we have simply told them. We have never, you know, said why do you want to know because this is a very normal question.

The Chairman: I should perhaps say to Senator Beaubien that I am not putting this line of questioning in any sense critically of Selkirk any more than I am being critical of the public that don't care, and I disagree with Mr. Botterill—I think the public should care.

Mr. Botterill: Well, I am not saying that they shouldn't care, but my point is that the ultimate ownership of Selkirk with all its involvements really has no bearing with the people in that community. If they want to disagree or do anything with their station, there is an identity there they can reach.

Mr. MacKay: Let me just say again Mr. Chairman something which will clarify this. We believe that there is a wide circle of the listeners and the viewers that is interested in knowing who owns what stations. We provide this information to media and to all shareholders. I can see your point however that if there was something happening—some abuse—if it was not in the public interest this is a risk, as you say—there may be some inherent risk there, but I would say this much; as far as we are concerned we are completely delighted to tell everybody what we own and where we own it and we have done so for years, but we just haven't used, for example, our own radio station time to advance the fact that this is another Selkirk station—we just haven't done that.

The Chairman: Senator McElman?

Senator McElman: This may not apply directly to Selkirk, but would you think the public would show a lively interest in the directors and principal shareholders, if those same names were appearing with some frequency also on the boards of let us say banking and financial institutions, steel mills, mines, and many other principal areas of the economy. Would you think then that there would be, or should be, a lively public interest that the same names are also appearing on the boards and principal shareholders' lists of media?

Mr. MacKay: Well, it is a matter of judgment. I would say this—yes—I think that is quite in order. As a matter of fact, I believe you have to publish all of your holdings when you are on these various boards.

Senator McElman: Oh, agreed. I am not saying that they are hidden in any sense.

Mr. MacKay: I think it is useful then.

Senator McElman: Would you not think that the public interest would be enlivened?

Mr. MacKay: Yes, I think that is an interesting bit of information, I must say. In the business field, I am always interested to see the names of people or their various activities.

Mr. Fortier: Let us talk about All-Canada Radio and Television Limited, if we might, for a few minutes. It represents some 72 radio and television companies in Canada as I read your brief and on page 112 you say:

"All-Canada is more than a 'rep' to it's stations."

And then you go on to say or to explain what it seeks to do. Could you tell the committee whether it ever purports to advise its member stations on, let us say, management and operation matters?

Mr. Ross A. McCreath, Vice-President and General Manager, All-Canada Radio and Television Limited: Yes, we do help the stations in many different ways in consultation with them. They like to know what is going on in the rest of Canada if they are selecting a television station, if they are selecting programming for next year's schedule, et cetera. They may say "How are programmings varying in other parts of the country according to your assessment?"—so they will consult us in that way. There are many areas; we have a broad outlook across the country and when you are operating a radio and television station in one particular community it is difficult, perhaps, to see beyond that community so you use all of your connections that you can. We have a daily connection with them because we are their salesmen, so they will perhaps ask us questions more often than anybody else because it is easier to contact us.

Mr. Fortier: They expect you to play this role, do they?

Mr. McCreath: Oh, very definitely.

Mr. MacKay: May I just say one thing about this. Thank you very much, Ross. Ross is here for any questions you may have to put to him.

The emphasis, of course, of All-Canada is on sales and anything we can do to help improve its sales is part of our responsibility. I think one interesting point about All-Canada is from an east-west sort of basis it has its own kind of communications with those areas I just referred to, and there is regionalism in many aspects of our country. It is interesting, and I think valuable, for broadcasters to learn something of the differences and to learn how to help one another. For example, if a station is short of a good salesman and we know that one of the other stations has an over-supply of good salesmen, we only have to be sure of one thing and that is when you recommend a salesman you have recommended a good one.

Mr. Fortier: Would you recommend a salesman who is working for a Selkirk station?

Mr. MacKay: Well, ask any of our Selkirk people—they dislike us intensely for that but it happens all the time.

Mr. Fortier: Yes.

Mr. Botterill: I think you could sum up the relationship between the representative and the owned and non-owned stations as being the guide, philosopher and friend to them all.

Mr. MacKay: I would like to put that down on paper.

Mr. Fortier: It is now. Of course, All-Canada is a wholly-owned subsidiary of Selkirk?

Mr. MacKay: Yes, sir.

Mr. Fortier: Would All-Canada agree to act as a "rep" for a station which is competing with a Selkirk station?

Mr. MacKay: Well, yes. Let me tell you this. One of the things is—we talk about the Southams and their interests and it is interesting that many stations where they have had interests, we still represent the stations. In the case where Selkirk owns and operates a station, we don't generally represent the station in that community against the station that Selkirk owns. It isn't because All-Canada wouldn't like to and hasn't tried to, but it just doesn't seem to work out too satisfactorily.

Basically we represent our own stations—and they represent a small part of our representation business—but by far, the largest portion of our representation business comes from a variety of owners in a variety of stations.

Mr. Fortier: Do these stations which All-Canada represent have any say in the management of All-Canada?

Mr. MacKay: No station that we represent has anything more to say about the job that All-Canada is doing than the station that we don't own. In other words, all stations have the same opportunity to complain, or to suggest, or to communicate, but there is no special role for a Selkirk station in All-Canada—they stand on their own feet.

Mr. McCreath: They can cancel a contract with us at any time because we are in a highly competitive business. There are 13 firms in the representations business in Canada, and if we don't keep our shirts clean and do the job that we are supposed to do, we will lose the station. Indeed we do lose stations, and hopefully get new ones from time to time.

Mr. MacKay: We have lost station representations from stations we have had an interest in.

Mr. Fortier: Have you?

Mr. MacKay: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: Who is on the board of All-Canada?

Mr. MacKay: The board directors of All-Canada?

Mr. Fortier: Yes.

Mr. MacKay: Well, I have that listed here.

The Chairman: Well, it is not in the brief.

Mr. MacKay: Oh, I beg your pardon, I do not have it listed here.

Mr. McCreath: Well, Mr. MacKay is President, I am the General Manager and Vice-President, and we have a Vice-President Radio, a Vice-President Television, and Vice-President Secretary Treasurer.

Mr. Fortier: These are all...

Mr. McCreath: Employees.

Mr. Fortier: Are you the only director also holding a position on the Selkirk board?

Mr. MacKay: No, Mr. McCreath is a director on the Selkirk board as well.

Mr. Fortier: Yes.

Mr. MacKay: The other three are All-Canada executive vice presidents.

Mr. Fortier: Is there any identifiable way that the Selkirk influence can be traced through All-Canada on any one of these either owned or operated stations?

Mr. MacKay: No. You will have an opportunity because I notice that there are other stations are coming here that we have no interest in and you will be able to find out very clearly that that is not only not the case, but we take very definite steps to assure that it doesn't happen by being aware of his particular kind of question.

Mr. Fortier: Very interestingly, Mr. MacKay, your company has interests in TV stations which are affiliated both with the CBC and CTV. Let me ask you a loaded question. Which affiliation have you found to be most satisfactory? The one at CTV or CBC?

Mr. MacKay: Well, what is the word that describes the situation when you have two wives?

Mr. Fortier: Lucky!

Mr. MacKay: I am not going to go into that, Mr. Fortier!

However, to that extent we do not suffer from a poverty of riches. We live with both. I think each particular market has its own particular quality and own particular set of problems, and in some markets there is just nothing like a CBC affiliate compared to CTV, and in other markets CTV—all the way compared to CBC.

The Chairman: Could you tell us about those markets, please?

Mr. MacKay: Well, we have a CTV network affiliation in Vancouver.

The Chairman: Do you think that is better than having a CBC affiliation?

Mr. MacKay: In Vancouver it just seems to me to be the ideal situation.

Mr. Fortier: What about Calgary where you have the only privately-owned CBC affiliation in CHCT?

Mr. MacKay: Well, Mr. Penn is here, the President of channel 2 in Calgary. I don't know whether he could tell you in mixed company what he thinks of it at times, but I can tell you it has been a pretty long, hard battle in Calgary. I don't know if you know that Calgary is the only city in Canada that is served by two private enterprise stations.

Mr. Fortier: Yes.

Mr. MacKay: And the only other place in Canada where there were two private stations competing, was the Regina-Moose Jaw area. The CBC station, once the CTV station, was established and launched proceeded to lose money and never, never again broke into the black. So you have some idea of the enormity of the task when you are a CBC affiliate competing with the CTV private station affiliate. That is the history at the moment.

Now, I think fortunately we are very lucky to have a man with David Penn's—I think genius and experience and ability—it is going to help you! He is a very well qualified man and perhaps could touch upon this if you would like to hear more.

The Chairman: Well, I think, with respect, that perhaps it won't be necessary. I don't want to be rude to Mr. Penn, but time is running on and there are other questions. Believe me, Mr. Penn, I don't wish to be rude. I would just like to pause here to follow on with Mr. Fortier's question. Which market do you prefer having a CBC affiliate?

Mr. MacKay: Well, Lethbridge is a perfect example of a station that has developed an excellent record working into the community, and its CBC affiliation has proven to be a benefit. It is an interesting thing that in Lethbridge where there is now a CTV station as well, our station in Lethbridge does extremely well with the audience in general programming.

The Chairman: That isn't a CTV station in terms of audience?

Mr. MacKay: Well, in terms of audience, yes it is.

The Chairman: What about revenue?

Mr. MacKay: Well, I don't know their figures, but we are coming out of the blue and that is progress, I will tell you.

Mr. Fortier: From the point of your programming...

Mr. MacKay: Well, it is not so much a question of programming because programs, as you know, change. Really, the basic question here is the flexibility that one network might have as opposed to the other in terms of reserve time and things of that nature.

Mr. Fortier: That is really what I would like to get at.

Mr. MacKay: I think the CTV network you could say in quick terms is perhaps a little more flexible.

Mr. David F. Penn, Vice-President and General Manager, Calgary Television Limited: CTV affiliation, I think, would be a better way of putting it.

Mr. MacKay: Yes, a little more flexible. Their reserve times are just a little better and they seem to suit the situation a little better.

The Chairman: Whatever the affiliation, whether it is with the CTV or CBC, and I perhaps relate this question to radio as well, is there a Selkirk sound or trade mark, or something which makes a Selkirk station uniquely different from the other stations in Canada?

Mr. MacKay: No, there really isn't. We don't advocate what you might call a formula station.

The Chairman: There is no Selkirk formula?

Mr. MacKay: There is no Selkirk formula.

Mr. Botterill: That is perhaps one very good reason why there isn't Selkirk identification in those markets because it doesn't mean anything. It is not a Selkirk station as far as the public is concerned.

Mr. MacKay: We believe a formula might bring on the surface sort of quick results, but we think that the kind of broadcasting stations that we attempt to turn on really by and large become the voice of the community and the best reflection of the community and in the long term will do the best job.

The Chairman: You say at page 5, paragraph 11:

"In each case—radio, television and cable—the management has autonomy and independence in all programming areas."

Is that literally true? Do you stand by that statement and if we were to ask your station people they would all verify that?

Mr. MacKay: Yes, they would.

The Chairman: Well, what is it you do?

Mr. MacKay: Well, we provide services that they feel might be useful—there is a whole list of them—in terms of providing engineering help to them, we provide all sorts of financial and fiscal assistance to them, we raise money for them when it comes to investing in new studios or new equipment, that sort of thing you know.

The Chairman: Why do you not inject yourself into programming? What if a particular station is being badly programmed—presumably you stand back and do nothing?

Mr. MacKay: Well, let me put it this way. You have to know exactly how Selkirk works.

The Chairman: That is what I would like to find out.

Mr. MacKay: I think I can take you from the private Selkirk Holdings, the company, and pass the ball to Norman Botterill and Bill Speers who are supervisors of our stations and let them, perhaps, tell you a little of the way in which we operate our stations in terms of the various meetings and sessions, the program meetings and sales meetings that we conduct.

The Chairman: Well, then perhaps I can put my question to Mr. Botterill. You say "the management has autonomy and independence in all programming areas." What do you do with a station that is badly programmed?

Mr. Botterill: We go to work on it immediately. We had a situation in one of our western stations which isn't resolved as yet. A great deal of thought and consideration has been given to the problem and possible solutions and there was occasion for the manager of that station to discuss his troubles with other of our managers periodically and program people as well. Out of all these discussions, and so on, came the manager's recommendation for what he would like to do to tackle this problem. After full discussion even at the local board level of the station, it was decided upon and he has embarked upon it now.

The Chairman: Well, what if he didn't? What if he said "No sir, I don't agree with you fellows?"

Mr. Botterill: Well, that would come right up to me.

The Chairman: Would he be fired?

Mr. Botterill: That would come right up to me. At that point I would say "Well, you go ahead but it is on your head."

The Chairman: Is there not a point at which you would dismiss him?

Mr. Botterill: Not for that sort of thing, no.

The Chairman: If his ratings were consistently bad and his station was doing poorly you would just go along with him?

Mr. Botterill: Well, we would go along and try to help him and bring to bear on him all the resources of our organization and all the other stations. We might bring in a program man from another place.

The Chairman: Mr. Botterill, at what point would you dismiss a manager?

Mr. Botterill: Well, without specifics, that would be a matter of "Well, we have tried everything your way, let's try it our way."

The Chairman: Well, there is a point at which you would say you would dismiss him?

Mr. MacKay: Well, I think you could say that we are perhaps the originators of group therapy because we are the ones that have been working in this field since broadcasting began.

The Chairman: Well, would you like to explain that?

Mr. MacKay: Well, as a group philosophy.

The Chairman: That is what Mr. Botterill was talking about, was it?

Mr. MacKay: Yes.

The Chairman: One of the questions that we put to various people who are involved in common ownership situation both in print and in the electronic media is, how much concentration is too much? Do you want Selkirk to own all of the private radio and television stations in Canada? Would that be in the interest of your shareholders?

Mr. MacKay: Mr. Chairman, I am glad that you asked that question.

The Chairman: Well, that sounds like a very political statement!

Mr. MacKay: Yes, I know.

The Chairman: You have your music I can see!

Mr. MacKay: Well, I sort of had a feeling that this might come up because I read some of your reports before and this question has arisen and I thought you might be interested in our view of a sort of yardstick, that we think perhaps is useful for the consideration of your Committee. I think that whenever you start to talk about concentration, the worst thing you can do is inject the word "if". I think you have to look very much at the actual issue.

On page 13 of our brief we make a point of stating that it is not the fact of multi-ownership which is the key question here, but rather the relationship between specific owners and the management of a station and what effect this relationship has on the station's performance that counts.

Now, it is interesting to note that the largest concentrator and owner and operator of radio and television stations in this country is the CBC. At the same time, the balance of television stations—about 90 to 95 per cent—are owned by radio stations or radio station owners who have an investment in the television station. Multi-ownership, we think, often results from an application being the only one submitted. Now, in this question of limitation we do have some yardsticks.

First, I think you have to identify the markets by size and by geography. What is the situation regarding the particular market—is it a new application? Is it the purchase of new shares? If so, what is the history between the owner and the station—in other words, can we be of real help as opposed to just buying another station? The effectiveness of the group owner, we think, is perhaps paramount and should be reviewed. Is he responsible enough? Is the management competent? Is there a record of performance in the public interest? Does the company have national resources such as manpower, and does it have the economic resources?

Finally, we have to say to ourselves, what is the alternative? It is interesting to note that going back just a few years when the English television application came up in Montreal there were only two applicants, and both were from people who were in the broadcasting business. Now, in our case we have kind of a philosophy here. You will know by examining the stations that we own that we have quite a mix of ownership in our company—a mix of very small markets, medium markets and some large markets.

They are spread pretty well throughout Alberta and British Columbia, and right now a small interest in Hamilton. Our cable investments are minority investments as well. We think that this spreading and this position of being able to help some of the smaller stations is really in the interest of broadcasting. That, in fact, a great deal could be said for multi-ownership under those terms.

Now, we don't think you could own all of the stations because simply you wouldn't have the resources in terms of manpower, you wouldn't have the resources in terms of finance and—the word “if” again—it is impossible anyway.

Finally, we have to go to the CRTC with every application and there they have their own setup of criteria perhaps quite different from the ones I have mentioned—I am not too sure.

The Chairman: I think Mr. Juneau said when he was before the committee that he would welcome guidelines in this area from Parliament.

Now, you have listed some criteria—honesty, confidence, record of performance, natural resources, economic resources, and so on, all qualities which I think you would agree your company possesses.

Mr. MacKay: Right.

The Chairman: And yet you have said even with your company there comes a cut-off point and what we are trying to establish is where is that cut-off point?

Mr. MacKay: Well, I would say that one of the cut-off points would purely be when there are other alternatives. I mean, that might be a cut-off point—the other alternative might be better.

The Chairman: Well, you surely wouldn't argue—I would be very surprised if you would argue that if there was a licence pending in market that Selkirk should be precluded because somebody else is applying? Surely it should go to the best operator?

Mr. MacKay: Well, I don't think we should be precluded, but I think certainly that should be one of the values that the application would be judged upon. I think you really can't say. I think the worst thing that has happened to the United States—and I am now not going to be a Mr. Johnson in Canada blasting, but one of the worst things they have done is to come up with a quick answer to this problem, and that is numbers. Here numbers alone—five, six, seven, doesn't really mean a thing. Where are the stations? What is the story of that station? Does it need the kind of injection that a multiple owner can give it? What is going to happen to that station when the individual dies? I mean, we simply have to find a way for this corporate growth. So it seems to me that looking at the practicalities, I think that many of the answers to the questions, which are raised in our minds in a general sense, answer themselves in the light of the actual applications.

I am sure you agree too that there is no one company in our country including the corporations that have the finances to literally purchase all the radio and television stations in this country.

The Chairman: Well, just a moment.

Mr. MacKay: I can't think of any right offhand.

The Chairman: Well, publishers and broadcasters come before this committee and whenever we talk about the reasons for concentration very few publishers and very few broadcasters are frank to say that it is also a very profitable enterprise. We are not critical of that—but it is. This committee is not critical of profitability in private broadcasting.

Mr. MacKay: Hear, hear.

The Chairman: But it is a fact of life. And so to say that it could never happen stretches my imagination—maybe not yours...

Mr. MacKay: Well, Mr. Chairman, I think this. I guess there is a risk in everything we do in life and there may be the risk. I don't know—I can't see it—but literally and honestly and literally for this committee I cannot see the possibility of one company owning all the radio and television stations in this country.

Senator Smith: Well, the CRTC would not allow it anyway.

Mr. MacKay: Well, apart from the CRTC, just really—and I agree with you—it is really just incomprehensible that in a society like we are living in today in Canada—it is almost as incomprehensible to me as to believe that in ten years this country will disappear because of broadcasting.

The Chairman: But is it not a fact that in broadcasting, there are fewer and fewer people owning more and more stations?

Mr. MacKay: Yes.

The Chairman: It is an ongoing trend and you explain some of the reasons why in your brief.

Mr. MacKay: Well, it is a very interesting thing with public companies, actually, more and more people own more and more stations. As a matter of fact, there are probably more actual owners of broadcasting stations in Canada today than at any time in its history.

The Chairman: More and more shareholders?

Mr. MacKay: Yes, they are owners.

The Chairman: Well, I guess you could argue then that there are even more owners in the CBC?

Mr. MacKay: Well, I don't know whether that is quite the same thing. They don't have shares and they don't pay dividends in the form of cash.

The Chairman: Well, are there any other questions that the senators may have? Mr. Fortier?

Mr. Fortier: I wonder if we could hear, Mr. Chairman, from one of the other of the radio or television managers and have them tell us what benefit proves from group ownership?

The Chairman: Specifically from Selkirk group ownership?

Mr. Fortier: Oh, definitely.

The Chairman: Yes, I assumed that was what you meant.

Mr. MacKay: Well, if I might just start off and I will touch upon the information we have here for you.

The Chairman: By all means.

Mr. MacKay: I thought that you would be interested in knowing what the managers think about Selkirk and its relationship...

Mr. Fortier: I was looking for that in your brief and I didn't find it except in the case of the Vernon presentation. The others all had a lot of awards and community interests.

Mr. MacKay: Well, I think you would be interested in this letter. This comes from our manager way up in northern Alberta—a chap by the name of Wally Everitt who has a tremendous personality and he wrote a letter and I will read part of it. I won't read all of it, because it is quite long.

Mr. Fortier: Could you summarize it and file it with the Committee?

Mr. MacKay: I will read just a little bit and stop and then file it.

The Chairman: Fine.

Mr. MacKay: He says:

"I have been pondering for some time the best way to present the advantages of belonging to the Selkirk Family. As everyone knows, a member of a large family functions more effectively when the individual is stressed. The individual can grow, mature and become a person in his own right while retaining the warmth of the family environment and reflecting the upbringing of that family. A radio station finds itself in the same position as a member of a chain of stations. The individual station is encouraged to project its own image while still benefitting from the advantages of belonging to a larger 'family'. As a member of a group of stations the individual station can train its personnel for higher positions within the chain; moves can be affected "without loss of pension or health benefits and key personnel positions can often be filled within the ranks of the company. Top Management personnel has very often trained within a station chain and can bring a wealth of experience and broadcasting knowledge to stations within the chain. Selkirk stations have set any 'exchange' programs as to programming and sales ideas. In this way, smaller stations in minor markets can benefit from the experience of 'proven successes' in major markets, while keeping abreast of changes in programming within the broadcasting industry... As a member of a radio group, individual stations can offer their staff lower rates and better benefits on health plans, hospitalization and retirement plans. This does much to attract the top personnel in the broadcasting industry."

I won't go on, but I think it gives you a kind of a sense and again on page 56 of our brief you will note that another one of the station managers states—and I think this is sincere—"Our affiliation with Selkirk Holdings keeps us in the picture with regard to new engineering, programming, accounting and sales techniques. Production Managers, Managers, Sales Managers, Engineers and..."

Mr. Fortier: Yes, that is the Vernon situation?

Mr. MacKay: Yes.

The Chairman: I am sure all of the communications you receive from member stations are not full of such unqualified joy. What are some of their grievances?

Mr. MacKay: Well, they would like to make more money, I suppose, and would like to grow faster.

The Chairman: But with Selkirk?

Mr. MacKay: They would like to grow faster.

The Chairman: Do they claim that you stunt their growth?

Mr. MacKay: Not at all. It is inherent in anybody we have in management to want to grow.

Mr. W. A. Speers, Vice-President, Selkirk Holdings Limited: I guess I am the nearest thing to a station manager that is left. I have managed radio stations for this group for about 35 years and I think probably it is the loneliest job in the world. It is a very comfortable feeling to know that you can pick up the phone and say "Before you guys come out here I want to talk to you because I have a problem." You don't feel alone then and you can get some backing for your point of view or perhaps you can have an adjustment made in it that makes it possible for you to do what you want to do.

The disadvantages—and there are disadvantages in everything—are that in this group we have a set of standards within which you must live, and I mean by that standards of public service, public acceptance, and service to the public. I must say that we are pretty critical of managers who go outside that framework for the sake of the quick buck. You know, we are in a business, and have been in it for one hundred years, and are going to be in it for another hundred we hope, and that is the attitude that prevails.

It is kind of in the nature of things that if a person has talent or ability he is going to seek a larger audience for his talent or larger markets for his ability, and in this kind of a group you have an opportunity to do that.

Mr. Fortier: Do you sometimes feel that you would rather be owned by someone in the community rather than by someone at head office in Toronto?

Mr. Speers: I sometimes feel I would rather own it myself!

Mr. Fortier: Well, that is legitimate.

The Chairman: Thank you, Mr. Speers.

Mr. MacKay: I might just say that all of our personnel are encouraged to participate in the shares of the company.

The Chairman: When I read the CJIB presentation—that is Vernon as I recall...

Mr. MacKay: Yes.

The Chairman: I thought it was one of the most interesting because it dealt with some of the things which interests us most; and it says "CJIB could be compared to a minor league baseball team." Now, I am sure that is a very honest statement, but it concerns me for a reason, and perhaps you could put my mind at ease. Presumably the best announcers—would it be true to say that the best announcers in the Selkirk organization are at your biggest and best stations where they can be paid more lucrative salaries?

Mr. MacKay: Well, fundamentally that would be correct.

The Chairman: Quite understandably.

Mr. MacKay: Yes, quite.

The Chairman: And yet perhaps what concerns me, and I would like you to comment on it, Mr. Botterill, is that if in broadcasting—I think this minor league baseball analogy is not just true of Selkirk; it is true of smaller stations all over Canada. But if the system filters through the most competent newscasters and the most competent announcers generally into Toronto and Montreal and Vancouver and the big cities, doesn't it provide less than adequate service in sections of the country where more adequate service is probably more desperately needed than in the big cities where there are lots of media? Do you follow the point I am trying to make?

Mr. Botterill: I think perhaps I do and I think in theory you are perhaps correct. However, by virtue of the progression you are speaking of that leads them up to the top you can draw them in at the smaller level and attract better people even to start with bear ing in mind—I think we should emphasize this, that the smaller stations of Canada—not just our stations—are the generators of a great many radio people.

The Chairman: Yes, that is a point made in your brief.

Mr. Botterill: We draw them out of the woods and they progress upwards, and indeed these people who have the talent don't stop at the top of our largest station, they go on from there.

The Chairman: Yes.

Mr. MacKay: One point I would like to mention is I don't want you to think that people kind of start just in a small market—you know, how do you keep them down on the farm once they see the farm. I think what happens in our company, too, is that often happens from major centres, who are at a certain level, move into perhaps a little bigger job in a smaller station. We have a perfect example of that in the letter I just read to you from Wally Everitt who was sales manager of one of our larger stations and a chance for management came along, so that it was a perfect place for him to move and become a part of that broadcasting organization.

The Chairman: Yes, but your best broadcasters aren't in Vernon?

Mr. MacKay: No.

The Chairman: If I could just put my question perhaps another way—in baseball, it really doesn't matter because baseball is baseball, but we are dealing here with a terribly significant community product, i.e.—broadcasting, and it seems to me a listener in Vernon is just as important as a listener in Toronto and may very well be in need of better service.

Mr. MacKay: Well, let me tell you. There are some announcers in our small markets who are better than an awful lot of announcers in large markets, but there is a thing that happens with talent, and sometimes it is in lieu of pay, and that is the recognition from the largest possible audience. Many a man has gone from a small market to find later on, to his own dissatisfaction, that there was a lot to be said for what was going on back home. In other words, you cannot say categorically that the best broadcasters are in the largest markets. I think some of the very best broadcasters in this country are in the smallest markets.

The Chairman: But a bad broadcaster doesn't last in a big market?

Mr. MacKay: Nor a small market, really.

The Chairman: Nor a small market?

Mr. MacKay: No.

The Chairman: You made a reference, Mr. Speers—your background I know is in news.

Mr. Speers: As a matter of fact, my background is in management. I just happened to get in the news.

The Chairman: Well, news is your specialty? You know a great deal about news, don't you?

Mr. Speers: Well, that is part of the piece. You may have gathered that impression when I appeared here as President of Broadcast News.

The Chairman: I was going to ask you a specific question about news. There is a reference in the brief somewhere which I can't find at the moment referring to "rip and read" radio stations and I am delighted that the brief honestly concedes that such things as "rip and read" radio stations did in fact exist. The brief puts them in the past tense. Do you think that there are no more "rip and read" stations anywhere in Canada?

Mr. Speers: Well, I think there is a technique even with rip and read so-called. A news story comes to you off a wire—a piece of paper, and with a pencil, by changing a few words, you can make it your own story. There is a great deal of that.

The Chairman: That is done now?

Mr. Speers: That is done now every day even in places where you have small newsstands.

The Chairman: Well, what do you do in Vancouver?

Mr. MacKay: Well, we have Mr. Hutton here.

Mr. Fortier: Well, perhaps Mr. Hutton can tell us how the absence of your two daily newspapers in Vancouver in recent weeks has affected your news broadcasts?

Mr. W. M. Hutton, News Director, CKWX Radio Limited: Well, to begin with, we instituted additional news broadcasts the morning the paper stopped publishing. We put brief broadcasts in on the half hour. These were also intended to be vehicles for carrying public service announcements such as death notices, funeral announcements, birth announcements, and so on. We have been rather pleased with the way things have worked out so that when the disagreement is settled out there, we intend to keep them.

The Chairman: Do you?

Mr. Hutton: Yes.

The Chairman: Commercially—for sale?

Mr. Hutton: Hopefully commercially, yes.

The Chairman: Mr. Hutton, the special study, which this committee caused to be done on Vancouver, paid due homage to radio. It wasn't critical of radio but it said that the radio newcasts, the public were finding, were really not a substitute for the newspapers. In my opening statement this morning I referred to Mr. Jack Webster and if you saw the program on television Sunday night he said "Speaking as a radio man that they just couldn't do the job."

Mr. Hutton: I don't think we can. We pretend to do the job the newspapers do. I think people miss their newspapers and there is no doubt about that. They miss them for a multiplicity of very personal reasons; their interest in the stockmarket, their interest in a particular sports columnist who they like to read; maybe they want to keep up with Dick Tracy—you know, there are so many things; but I don't think—really I would disagree to the extent that the comments that I have heard was that it wasn't for a lack of hard news that people missed the papers.

The Chairman: It was for other things?

Mr. Hutton: It was for other things. It was for in-depth news, it was for signed commentary, this type of thing.

Mr. MacKay: Well, Mr. Hutton, while you are talking, it might be interesting for the committee to know about your development in trying to bring signed commentary to the station.

Mr. Hutton: Well, this was something I was going to say in talking about the small stations. I am now trying to put together, and have been for some time, a series of brief commentaries which, hopefully, will be from all parts of Canada under the sort of broad title of explaining one part of Canada to another. This would also be available to all of the stations—as a matter of fact, available to the smaller stations without charge, and they could make use of it as they wish.

Mr. MacKay: I don't want to cut off the discussion about news because it is the life blood of our stations, but before we go any further I should mention that this kind of service represents some of the things that group ownership does provide.

The Chairman: Are there other questions that the senators have? Senator McElman?

Senator McElman: Just following up the Vancouver situation. In the current context and your special efforts to provide additional service in the vacuum of print news, have you found the CRTC regulations with respect to the amount of time you can have as paid time in providing service—have you found these regulations rather restrictive of what you want to do for the community?

Mr. Hutton: Not in this particular instance, no, I can't say that I have. I have long felt, however, that the lack of commercials in the body of newscasts in Canada has tended to reduce the length of broadcast. You can only go so far without putting in a commercial.

Senator Sparrow: Why?

Mr. Hutton: Well, eventually you have to pay for the radio station. It is not subsidized by all of us as the CBC is. It is strictly a commercial proposition.

The Chairman: Mr. Speers?

Mr. Speers: Well, I think the radio stations carry as much advertising as is reasonable for their audience to begin with. It would be possible for us perhaps to run longer newscasts if we were allowed to put commercials in the beginning of them, but to make an exception because there was a newspaper strike—we wouldn't even ask the CRTC if we could do it. We wouldn't dare to put them in a position—if you like the word—of authorizing strikebreakers taking advantage of the situation.

Mr. Fortier: Do you think people listen to radio programs or television programs because of the commercials which they will hear or which they will see?

Mr. Hutton: I think they do to some extent yes.

Mr. Fortier: Do you think this is an important factor for the viewer or listener?

Mr. Hutton: I think it is, yes.

The Chairman: I don't want to cause consternation in the home front, but as Mr. Hutton was saying yes, some of the people on the other side were saying no.

Mr. MacKay: Well, it is sort of an example of the independent thinking we now have. I think that is a generalization that we could talk about all afternoon. But I just go back for a moment...

The Chairman: Well, let us just deal with his one for a moment. You don't agree with Mr. Hutton?

Mr. MacKay: Well, I think I could say this. Some commercials are more attractive than others and to the extent that they are appealing and attractive, I think people find them pleasant. There have been, as you know, some hit songs that have come out of commercials—you know, million record sellers; a lot of talent has been born as a result of commercials, singing groups that have become identified through a commercial and become top entertaining stars. So I would say yes, there are many inherent benefits to what you call the good commercial. I would also have to say that all commercials don't have all of those qualities and perhaps are not produced for that purpose.

The Chairman: Don't the people go away from the television set when the commercial comes on?

Mr. MacKay: No, I don't think so. I know there was some measurement made in London and they found that the water closet level went up between breaks...

The Chairman: Yes.

Mr. MacKay: However, that is a British habit! It is a case of bad kidneys and not bad commercials.

The Chairman: You think a study in Canada would be different?

Mr. MacKay: Well, I don't know about that particular aspect of the study, but I would say that by and large our approach to commercial broadcasting in Canada is infinitely better than that in Britain.

The Chairman: Would you compare it to that of the United States?

Mr. MacKay: Well of course, I think we are so far ahead of the United States, and I think Mr. Johnson kind of confirmed that when he was here last week.

The Chairman: Are there other questions the Senators have because we do have another brief. If not, I am going to terminate—you are going to say something, I am sorry.

Mr. MacKay: I was just going to say one closing thing to Mr. Fortier's question about group ownership and keeping talent in the smaller market. One of the greatest single assets a multi-owner has, if he is fortunate enough to have an interest in a radio or television station in the small market, is a very exciting challenging means of keeping very good people in that marketplace. The chance to grow. Now, even somewhat larger markets—David Penn is a perfect example—an outstanding broadcaster and manager of a radio station who had reached the point where he wanted to try his wings elsewhere. We bought a television station, he is running it and he is as happy as a clam. We couldn't be happier either and I think this is in the public interest. It is showing it in terms of audience that it is hard to keep them down on the farm.

Mr. Fortier: I think I should thank you for your comment and I should point out that our Mr. Spears has just informed me that a similar study was done to the one that was done in London, England—was done by The Financial Post some months ago and it coincided with the conclusions of the British studies, so our kidneys are not any better!

Mr. MacKay: Well,...

Mr. Fortier: I mean our programming is not any better.

Mr. MacKay: I would also think that you might want to look at The Financial Post.

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if we might be able to hear from Mr. MacKay very briefly on his reaction to the recent CRTC proposals to increase Canadian content?

The Chairman: Yes we can, but I will make that the final question.

Mr. MacKay: Well, Mr. Chairman, I think that we have learned a great deal in broadcasting and those of us—and there are people here present before this Committee with me today, who can take you back through a whole list of regulations that we used to have, regulations that froze the power of private broadcasting, which made it possible therefore for U.S. channels to grow and use those frequencies at maximum power. We have had regulations which said you will not broadcast the news or record after 7.30 at night. We have had regulations that said you will not broadcast a spot announcement after 7.30 at night and you will not quote a price. So through the years we have had a lot of regulations. We have learned one thing. Those that are not practical, simply will not work.

Now, in connection with the new proposed Canadian content regulations, I think that the very form which is proposed as a regulation is an old form and definitely calls for a reply in the old pattern. It seems to me that we haven't got a problem with U.S. content in Canada basically. What we really have is a problem of Canadian content; quality Canadian content, and I am a very firm believer that what we really need is not necessarily more Canadian programming, but better Canadian programs that more Canadians will watch. It seems to me that we have reached a point where all of us really have to understand not only the reasons for the more Canadian content and how to get from the goal of 40 per cent Canadian content to a 60 per cent Canadian content goal, but also how, in the doing, we end up with a stronger Canadian society and healthier broadcasting industry.

Now, when you face that kind of a situation it seems to me we have to approach that problem differently. I am a strong advocate that this regulation is to become a fact and of a brand new approach. Now, we are proposing an approach to the CRTC—we have not submitted it to them yet, but I will merely say to you that I think its underlying base is incentives. We have to try to create more pride in Canadian programs and less of a sense of compulsion. I think we have learned this lesson in so many, many other disciplines, that encouragement, reward and incentives, I think, will go a long way to really get at the root of the problem which is better quality Canadian content.

Mr. Fortier: That is a very complete answer and I don't want to ask you what those incentives will be that you will put before the CRTC next month, but I am tempted to ask you this: why have you not made any concrete proposal until the CRTC came forth with its proposed regulation?

Mr. MacKay: Because I think that we have been pretty busy in broadcasting. Number one—we have been pretty busy in terms of getting used to our television responsibilities learning the skill of TV. We have been busily enmeshed in the cablevision world recently we have been devoting an awful lot of time to the implication of educational television and that is a whole story in itself which think will stagger this committee, but really it is a case of too much to do in too little time. Now, up until this moment we were going along fine. This represents in my view a dramatic change, a new goal, and this is why when the regulation came out it is important enough that I think we must pause and consider it very carefully.

Mr. Fortier: The goal is a legitimate one, is it not?

Mr. MacKay: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: It is the means which you question?

Mr. MacKay: I think all goals of that nature—anything that will strengthen our country and if this will indeed strengthen our country it is the most valuable of goals.

The Chairman: Perhaps I could conclude the hearing by quoting your own phraseology of just a moment or two ago when you said you had too much to do and too little time to do it. I think you should realize that the members of this Committee realize just the extent to which private broadcasters are involved with various Government agencies, organizations, bodies, committees, subcommittees hearings and I think it is important for you to know how this Committee sees itself. We realize, and we hope you do, that this by no means a CRTC hearing in any shape or kind or description; it is not a Royal Commission on Broadcasting, but it is attempting to bring the entire Canadian media picture in some kind of perspective and I suggest to you that had we gone ahead, without any reference to the broadcasting industry, broadcasting would be understandably critical; and so we have been anxious to bring some representative broadcasters before the committee. Saskatchewan Holdings is a significant member of the broadcasting community, and we felt it would be a useful organization to have before the Committee. We appreciate your coming, we appreciate you bringing your full team, we appreciate the brief you have prepared which will be quite valuable to us.

Mr. MacKay: Among other things it is to prepare yourself for a meeting among friends.

The Chairman: Thank you very much. Short recess.

Short recess.

The Chairman: Honourable Senators, if I may call this session to order. The second brief we are going to receive this afternoon is the submission from Moffat Broadcasting Limited.

Seated on my immediate right is Mr. Randall L. Moffat, the President of Moffat Broadcasting Limited. On his immediate right is Mr. James M. Pryor, the Chairman of the Board, and on the extreme right flank is Mr. Ron Mitchell, who is the Executive Vice-President.

Mr. Moffat, I know you were here for the earlier presentation and so I don't need to repeat all of the things I said at that time. The procedure we follow is simple; you make an opening oral statement and then we ask you some questions on your oral statement, on your written brief, or anything else which may be on our minds. If you wish to refer any of the questions to your colleagues, please feel free to do so.

Welcome.

Mr. Randall Moffat, President, Moffat Broadcasting Limited: "As the Chairman has mentioned, my name is Randall Moffat and I am the President of Moffat Broadcasting Limited. With me, as he has also indicated, is Mr. Jim Pryor and Mr. Ron Mitchell.

In our brief, we attempted to answer many of the original and supplementary questions of this committee. Some questions, for example, copyright and the effect of American controlled advertising agencies on the advertising industry are of such a technical nature or involve such intimate knowledge of subjects that we prefer to leave them to experts in those fields. We have filed, on a confidential basis, the financial information requested by the Committee.

You will have noted in our brief that we have outlined the organization of our company, its ownership and its beginning. Briefly, Moffat Broadcasting was founded by my late father, Lloyd E. Moffat, in 1931 and has gradually grown to the present position where we operate radio stations in principal cities of western Canada as well as having interest in two companies, CJAY-TV in Winnipeg, and Metro Videon Limited, which is a TV company serving a portion of greater Winnipeg, which are of concern to this committee.

In our formal submission, we have touched on the philosophy of local programming held by our company and also have discussed what we view as the responsibilities of broadcasting to the community.

While it is not our intention to take up the time of the Committee by covering in detail the material contained in our brief, I would like to take a few moments to re-state our views on the ownership of mass media, which is of primary interest to the Committee.

We do not view the broad holdings of one firm in itself as harmful. To the contrary any social desirable benefits result. In our case, Moffat Broadcasting Limited has been able to provide exposure and encouragement to Canadian talent. The Maple Leaf Music System and the Lloyd E. Moffat Awards are two such projects that we have described in our brief.

In co-operation with the stations of CHUM Limited, we have been instrumental in developing the Canadian Contemporary News system, an all-Canadian news service of which we are very proud. Another advantage that we have in group ownership is the integrity of our news reporting at the local level which is protected and the financial stability of our company has allowed us to undertake expansion and improvement of our broadcast facilities.

We have been able to provide professional management in administration, programming and engineering, which assists us improving the service to our communities. We firmly believe that group ownership will continue to play an important role in the development of Canadian broadcasting.

One aspect of media ownership that does concern us and that is the situation where all media in a given city are controlled by one owner or group of owners.

"We cannot suggest, however, rigid rules for the limitation of ownership that can be applied with equal force across Canada. We submit that each individual community presents a different set of circumstances. The degree of concentration must be assessed against—in the first place—the availability to the public of the effective competition for the dissemination of opinions and information and, two, against the economic ability of the city to support additional outlets.

"We would also like to take this opportunity to address ourselves to the statement of Lord Thomson that 'a licence to broadcast is a licence to print money.' I believe Mr. Ray Crépault, President of the Canadian Association of Broadcasters, when he appeared before you, suggested that the remark of Lord Thomson was the 'most unfortunate comment ever made about broadcasting.'

"Making the statement is not what is unfortunate. The attitude that prompts such a statement is what we regard as unfortunate. To us, a licence carries with it as many responsibilities and obligations as it does rights and privileges. While it is true that broadcasting stations are granted the exclusive right to occupy a specific frequency, new stations are continually being licensed. To a degree, economic protection is afforded by the Canadian Radio and Television Commission in order that certain goals set by the Broadcasting Act can be attained. As many stations in Canada explain losses in their operations, it is evident that this economic review by the Commission is not a guarantee that broadcasting stations will make a profit.

"I presume even Lord Thomson would agree with us now as he has announced the sale of his broadcasting interests.

"I think it should be mentioned that broadcasters, in carrying out their responsibilities, have had to deal with two basic considerations that confront Canadians in every aspect of our lives: the first is our relatively small population that is dispersed in one of the largest countries in the world; the second is the presence in the United States of a large, wealthy, and aggressive neighbour. In the light of these two undeniable facts of life, we believe that Canadians are fortunate to have both the quality and quantity of broadcast service they enjoy. Both the private and public sectors of broadcasting provide a service, both in radio and television, which represents one of the prime forces that are at work in keeping Canada together, both in a political and social sense.

"It must be remembered, as well, that it is impossible for each individual broadcaster to cater to every expectation that Canadians have of their broadcasting service. I would hope that this Committee, in assessing the role of broadcasting as part of the mass media, will remember that the service provided by our industry is the sum total of all broadcasting within that particular community. When taken as a whole, the industry provides a broad spectrum of service in order to satisfy individual tastes and needs.

"Moffat Broadcasting is proud of the contribution we make in providing broadcast service to Canadians in western Canada. We do not pretend to be all things to all people, but we do feel we give a full service to the audience we attempt to serve."

That concludes our formal statement, Mr. Chairman, and myself and my colleagues will be prepared to answer any questions that you may wish to put to us.

The Chairman: Thank you very much, Mr. Moffat. I believe the questioning this afternoon will begin with Senator Sparrow.

Senator Sparrow: Mr. Moffat, in the concentration of ownership which you referred to verbally, did I understand you to say that you thought it was a bad thing to have the ownership of all media in one area. Is that what you said?

Mr. Moffat: Yes.

Senator Sparrow: I mean newspaper, radio, television and perhaps cable; is that correct?

Mr. Moffat: Yes.

Senator Sparrow: As such the broadcasting without the printed word is not a bad thing. Is that what you are suggesting?

Mr. Moffat: Well, as we suggest, I think it has to be a question of looking at some specific market and determining what other radio stations, for instance, exist, what other television stations exist, whether newspapers exist and whether there is a cross-ownership between broadcasting and print.

Senator Sparrow: Are there any markets in Canada today that you would say concentration of ownership is detrimental to the listening public or reading public?

Mr. Moffat: Not that I am aware of, senator. Of course, I am speaking of western Canada.

The Chairman: How about eastern Canada or do you just want to confine your remarks to western Canada?

Mr. Moffat: Well, it is not that I wouldn't like to speak about eastern Canada, but I am just not familiar with it, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: You say at page 23 and you stated orally that you find undesirable:

"any situation where all media within a given market is controlled through one owner or group of owners."

And you can think of no such situation in western Canada?

Mr. Moffat: No I can't. There may be some smaller situations perhaps in the interior of British Columbia where that might exist. I am not familiar with any specifics.

The Chairman: How would you classify Regina?

Mr. Moffat: Well, in Regina there exists for competitive purposes additional radio stations. There is one additional television station to the key owner which seems to be the Siftons in that part of the world. The unfortunate aspect, I think, of their ownership is the existence of one newspaper. However, I think that they were the pioneers in that part of the world and have certain built-in investments in the community.

The Chairman: Senator Sparrow?

Senator Sparrow: Specifically then, how much is too big or how much is too much—referring to Regina again—should any special provision be made as an example in Regina at this time? Do you consider it a dangerous situation now or in the future, has it the potential of being a dangerous situation?

Mr. Moffat: Well, I think that the degree of concentration that exists in Regina is such that it should be watched and I wouldn't think that it would be in the public interest to expand or lead to more concentration in the Regina situation.

Senator Sparrow: How would you control that then?

Mr. Moffat: Well, unfortunately the only control the people of Canada through Parliament can exercise in the broadcasting industry is through licensing of the Canadian Radio and Television Commission.

Senator Sparrow: So from that example you can't set up a basic principle of ownership necessarily?

Mr. Moffat: No, I don't think you can. I think it becomes about as close to the line, so to speak, as one can get.

The Chairman: I would like to ask you—in Edmonton you have 45 percent of a radio station—CHED, is that correct?

Mr. Moffat: Yes.

The Chairman: Do you think it would be desirable in Edmonton to have an alternative daily newspaper to the Journal?

Mr. Moffat: Yes, I think it would be.

The Chairman: You think it would be?

Mr. Moffat: Yes.

The Chairman: Do you think it would be financially possible to start a daily newspaper in Edmonton?

Mr. Moffat: Not from—and I am not an expert and I don't purport to be in the print media, but what I have read and what I am told is that it would take a tremendous amount of money to even have a crack at starting a new daily newspaper in Edmonton without any guarantee at all that it would be successful. I think that the Edmonton Journal enjoys an economic monopoly in Edmonton which would be very hard to break.

The Chairman: Even although there are 800,000 people in the market area?

Mr. Moffat: Yes.

The Chairman: These questions may be unfair because you are not a publisher and believe me we appreciate that. However, we are interested in having your views.

Senator Sparrow?

Senator Sparrow: I will leave that group ownership for a moment unless there are other questions on it.

The Chairman: Are there any other supplementary questions on group ownership? Well, we may come back to it, please go ahead.

Senator Sparrow: Well, still dealing with page 23, you say:

"Each of our stations have experienced the threat and, indeed, the actual loss of advertising business from vested interests with the community. Small operations may not be able to retain their integrity as easily as stations that operate within a larger framework."

Could you give us examples of what you are referring to there?

Mr. Moffat: Well, I won't name names, I think, for obvious reasons. I can give you one example that came up as recently as two days ago where we had an unusual cancellation of business from a department store. While they gave other reasons, it came to our knowledge that the chief reason that they cancelled their advertising was because we were carrying some commercials from an employees' union. That is the kind of thing I mean and that particular case was as recently as two days ago.

The Chairman: Which station was this?

Mr. Moffat: Well, it happened in Winnipeg.

The Chairman: In Winnipeg?

Mr. Moffat: Yes. But this kind of thing happens and I think we can say this, that we have all had experiences in this type of situation.

Senator Sparrow: Would you find the same type of pressure from governments—provincial or federal?

Mr. Moffat: No, I haven't.

The Chairman: But the actual loss of advertising—are these always local advertisers or are they ever national advertisers?

Mr. Moffat: Basically local.

The Chairman: Basically local advertisers?

Mr. Moffat: Yes.

The Chairman: Do you ever bend to the pressure?

Mr. Moffat: No.

The Chairman: You just play it straight up the middle then?

Mr. Moffat: Yes. We listen to what their considerations are and if they have a valid point to make then we will adjust our policy.

Mr. James M. Pryor, Chairman of the Board, Moffat Broadcasting Limited: It is quite obvious that these advertisers have not found a sufficient amount of leverage against whatever the base is that they will operate from to cause us to deviate—I am not suggesting that at some time that couldn't happen because there may be some realities, but one of the great benefits of being able to have a number of local sponsors in different markets is so that you have that base and you are not at the mercy of any one advertiser.

The Chairman: Well, I think it might be useful to pull this matter out so that the Committee could have it in its proper perspective. You say:

"Each of our stations have experienced the threat and, indeed, the actual loss of advertising business..."

I don't think we should view this out of proportion because this isn't a monumental problem is it, or is it?

Mr. Moffat: Well, it can be a monumental problem. I think we have an example in Nova Scotia, and my facts may not be correct where there was an occasion where a station lost its licence for this kind of thing.

The Chairman: That was the station in Yarmouth?

Mr. Moffat: Yes.

The Chairman: But within your own particular organization this is not a major problem?

Mr. Moffat: No, I wouldn't class it as a major problem.

The Chairman: It is a serious problem but not a major problem?

Mr. Moffat: It occurs.

The Chairman: Senator Sparrow?

Senator Sparrow: The problem that may get greater if you give in on one of those respects, in other words?

Mr. Moffat: I would think that it would.

The Chairman: Mr. Fortier?

Mr. Fortier: If I may, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: The reverse side of the coin Mr. Moffat; have you ever refused to carry advertising?

Mr. Moffat: Yes we have refused advertising.

Mr. Fortier: For what reasons?

Mr. Moffat: Well, because it didn't particularly fit our radio station—the sound of our radio station.

Mr. Fortier: Would you give us examples of that?

Mr. Moffat: To the type of audience to which we appeal. Well, certain personal hygiene products we refuse to advertise.

Mr. Fortier: Because the product did not fit the sound of the station?

Mr. Moffat: Or appeal to the audience that we were trying to serve—it wasn't in good taste in so far as our audience is concerned.

Mr. Fortier: Could you give us other examples?

Mr. Moffat: Well, we have refused advertising where we felt that some promotion or unusual financial thing was going to be inflicted upon our listeners, something we didn't feel was quite above board.

Mr. Fortier: Have you ever refused to carry advertising because it conflicted with, let us say, a competitive product which was already the subject of a commercial on a radio or television station?

Mr. Moffat: I am not sure I understand your question, Mr. Fortier.

Mr. Fortier: Supposing the T. Eaton Company in Winnipeg asked for some advertising time which it was ready to pay for and the Bay was one of your regular...

The Chairman: Well, I think that is a pretty hypothetical question. I don't think we need to specify the names of the companies.

Mr. Fortier: Well, I was asked to explain my question, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: Well, all right, as long as it is very clear on the record that it is hypothetical.

Mr. Fortier: It is a purely hypothetical question.

The Chairman: Fine.

Mr. Fortier: Now, merchant X comes to you and asks for merchandise...

Mr. Moffat: We have never refused.

Mr. Fortier: Pardon?

Mr. Moffat: We have never refused advertising...

Mr. Fortier: Because merchant X was in competition with merchant Y?

Mr. Moffat: That is right.

Mr. Fortier: That has never been the basis for a refusal?

Mr. Moffat: No.

Senator Sparrow: Does the Moffat interest extend beyond broadcasting as such? Does your company have ownership in any other fields?

Mr. Moffat: Well, in the cable industry in Winnipeg—if you include that in broadcasting—we have no other substantial investments.

Senator Sparrow: In industry or otherwise?

Mr. Moffat: No.

Senator Sparrow: In reference then to your remarks about threats as far as advertising and so on, a position of a conglomerate in the broadcasting field might tend to exaggerate this problem, if there was ownership between broadcasting news media and perhaps other industrial aspects—that this problem may exist?

Mr. Moffat: Well, the potential that the problem exists is certainly there.

The Chairman: Mr. Pryor?

Mr. Pryor: I wonder if I might just add a comment to that. It would seem to me that the potential would exist if that conglomerate were sufficiently large that it became percentage-wise relatively important against the whole spectrum of the advertising community that was at hand to a broadcasting station. And only at that time, if it did so become that big or that important—simply because advertisers know that they are not refused space on a radio station, or in a newspaper—I just assume it is the same way—unless their advertising is in bad taste, or illegal, or contravenes the laws; this type of thing. I really can think of no other reason why anyone would be turned away and neither can advertisers, so I really wonder that such an abuse would occur.

Senator Sparrow: Maybe I should ask you for a further explanation. This vested interest in the community—are you referring to perhaps the withdrawal of advertising or editorial comment?

Mr. Moffat: That would certainly be the most primary way that that conglomerate of broadcasting media could make itself evident.

Senator Sparrow: Leaving that for a moment. Could we have your comments on the new CRTC regulations?

Mr. Moffat: Well, as far as the television regulations are concerned, the station in which we have an investment—channel 7, is about halfway through the preparation of its presentation to the Commission. We can't really identify how the new content regulations will affect us at this point in time. However, we are very concerned with the position that channel 7 finds itself in with regard to American competition which we feel is rather a unique situation.

The Chairman: Would you describe that situation in a little more detail, please?

Mr. Moffat: Well, the primary competition that we are talking about is the existence of KCND in Pembina, North Dakota, which is a village, I think, of approximately 200 people. The antenna that KCND broadcast from is located about ten yards south of the 49th parallel...

The Chairman: How far is it?

Mr. Moffat: About ten yards.

The Chairman: Ten yards?

Mr. Moffat: Yes, from the 49th parallel and it is there for the express purpose of broadcasting to Winnipeg.

The Chairman: Senator Beaubien?

Senator Beaubien: That is your big competition in your market?

Mr. Moffat: Well, in addition to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

Senator Beaubien: Yes.

The Chairman: Therefore you suggest or you recommend to the committee legislation similar to that in print and to quote your brief:

"... whereby advertising expenditures by Canadian companies on foreign broadcasting stations become non-deductible items for corporate tax purposes."

Mr. Moffat: Right.

The Chairman: And that is a recommendation which you make to the Committee?

Mr. Moffat: Yes.

The Chairman: May I ask you in making that recommendation have you considered the possibility that these advertisers would simply, with the extent to which the Canadian economy is controlled by American companies, that they would simply place this advertising through American head offices and would therefore circumvent the legislation.

Mr. Moffat: Well, certainly that applies in connection with national advertising and there may not be anything that the legislative change could do to effect that, but as far as local advertising is concerned, I think we would find it would terminate that.

The Chairman: Well, I think the Committee would be terribly interested in knowing if you could tell us the extent of local advertising on this channel?

Mr. Moffat: Any figure that I could give would be just a straight guess and I would think...

The Chairman: Well, it would be an informed guess.

Mr. Moffat: Well, I would think it would be about $400,000 a year in case of KCND.

The Chairman: And these would be local Winnipeg advertisers who buy advertising on this station?

Mr. Moffat: Right.

The Chairman: What would the national advertising figure be?

Mr. Moffat: I have really no idea.

The Chairman: It is perhaps unfair to ask you. I am not trying to put you on the spot.

Mr. Moffat: No; it is not really an unfair question, but I just don't know.

The Chairman: Senator McElman?

Senator McElman: Of that local advertising, what percentage of the total TV dollar being spent in that area would that $400,000 constitute?

The Chairman: Do you understand the question?

Mr. Moffat: Yes. I would think about 20 to 25 per cent.

Senator McElman: It is substantially enough.

The Chairman: And you think the legislation even if they could circumvent it nationally in the way I have suggested, locally could not be and it would in effect draw the advertising back into Winnipeg television?

Mr. Moffat: Right.

The Chairman: Or other Winnipeg media?

Mr. Moffat: Yes.

The Chairman: Can you back that theory up?

Mr. Ronald Mitchell, Executive Vice-President, Moffat Broadcasting Ltd: These people have to advertise to stay in business. They have to spend the money either in TV, radio or newspapers.

The Chairman: Have you ever, Mr. Mitchell, conducted any kind of a random survey or sample to find out what these people would do? Have you ever said to these local advertisers, "Look, what if you couldn't use this channel, what would you do?"

Mr. Mitchell: Yes, I have.

The Chairman: And what do they say?

Mr. Mitchell: Well, they said that they were getting a pretty good price on it and did we know that we are not hitting the entire market but we are hitting it enough to make a dent on it and we are going to continue doing it.

The Chairman: Yes, but if they couldn't have it—do they say they would go in to other Winnipeg media?

Mr. Mitchell: You have to look at the type of business, Mr. Chairman, and these people need to get customers into their business.

Mr. Jim Pryor: It seems to me the same customers, Senator Davey, that are advertising—they are advertising on the other media other than Winnipeg—they are advertising on his station in Pembina and as a result they would not terminate their advertising in Winnipeg if indeed Pembina were not available to them, but they are able to provide them with programs of great popular appeal during the prime periods when the CBC and CTV television stations are running Canadian content which may not have great public appeal.

The Chairman: What network is Pembina affiliated with?

Mr. Moffat: ABC.

Mr. Pryor: Yes, ABC, primarily.

The Chairman: This is perhaps a very unfair question to put to you because you couldn't be expected to know but you might with your knowledge of the broadcasting.

Would that $400,000 figure exceed the local advertising on other similar stations—like Bellingham and Buffalo and so on?

Mr. Moffat: The local advertising?

The Chairman: Yes.

Mr. Moffat: I don't know.

The Chairman: Yes, I realize that it is a pretty tough question to put to you.

Mr. Moffat: I know that KVOS takes a lot of money away from the Canadian stations in the Vancouver market but whether they do locally as much as they do nationally I am not sure.

The Chairman: Mr. Fortier?

Mr. Fortier: Do you think, Mr. Moffat, that this Pembina station was set up to fulfil a need of Winnipeg advertisers or was it set up to fulfil the need of Winnipeg viewers?

Mr. Moffat: Well, I think it was set up to fulfil a need of American shareholders primarily. People watch the station and it is obviously providing somewhat of a service to them.

Mr. Fortier: By and large why do the local advertisers use that medium rather than CJAY TV?

Mr. Moffat: Basically the question of cost.

Mr. Fortier: You cannot offer competitive prices, is that correct?

Mr. Moffat: That is correct.

Mr. Fortier: And neither does the CBC affiliate?

Mr. Moffat: That is correct.

The Chairman: Senator Sparrow?

Senator Sparrow: Has Canadian content at this time have anything to do with that? Is this what you are talking about—the Canadian audiences preferring that type of thing?

Mr. Moffat: No, not in that direct connection. Certainly the requirements that are made of us under the Broadcasting Act to do with Canadian programming, increase our cost of operation versus what it does cost the American stations to operate. They don't have to charge as much for their advertising minute as we have to. In that connection, the content regulations are a factor.

Senator Sparrow: I am just quoting from the Edmonton Journal and it says in reference—and editorial reference to the changes it says:

"All it will do among 55 per cent of Canada's television viewers—the ones within the antenna reach of American television or cablevision—is cause them to watch more U.S. TV. And the proof that they undoubtedly will comes from the CRTC itself: one of its studies shows that when viewers have a choice, right now 58 per cent of the time they will watch American programs." Would that be true now?

Mr. Moffat: Yes.

Senator Sparrow: And will that increase with this new Canadian content regulation?

Mr. Moffat: It is our hope that it wouldn't; it is our fear that it will.

Senator Sparrow: It is a fear?

Mr. Moffat: Yes.

Senator Sparrow: Is there any percentage figure you can give us?

Mr. Moffat: No. As I said we are just about halfway through our study as far as Channel 7's programming is concerned so we don't have any final figures to give you.

Senator Sparrow: Just as a matter—the editorial goes on and it is rather humorous because they make reference to new programs or Canadian programs to take the place of existing programs and some of them—I won't read them all but there appears a new program "Let's Make a Deal": Two dramatic hours with a used car salesman." The next program, "Great Expectations: A rerun of the Speech from the Throne." "Of Human Bondage: A small businessman examines Benson's tax proposals. The Flying None: (spelled N-o-n-e) An in-depth Six-hour review of historic Canadian air strikes.

The Chairman: Are you leaving the CRTC Regulations?

Senator Sparrow: Yes.

The Chairman: I am wondering—I am sure the Committee would be interested in Mr. Moffat's comments on those that affect radio.

Mr. Moffat: We don't anticipate meeting with much difficulty the content requirements of the Commission so far as AM radio is concerned.

The Chairman: Thank you. Senator Sparrow?

Senator Sparrow: In the next few years what do you foresee as changes in programming as far as radio is concerned? I think perhaps I ask this in the context of a switch from AM to FM as an example for competition and so on in total programming. Do you see a drastic change from as it exists today?

Mr. Moffat: Perhaps Mr. Pryor or Mr. Mitchell would like to answer that. It is a personal question—I don't anticipate any change in the kind of program that AM radio is doing now. If anything, I think it would continue to be closer to the community than perhaps it is now. I think the change that started with AM radio when television hit the broadcasting scene about 1950 or 1951 is probably not a complete change yet. I think radio will still move towards this localization.

Senator Sparrow: Will there be a switch from AM to FM in the foreseeable future?

Mr. Moffat: I don't think so in Canada.

Senator Sparrow: You don't think so?

Mr. Moffat: No.

The Chairman: Mr. Pryor?

Mr. Pryor: If I may just speak to that.

The Chairman: Yes?

Mr. Pryor: There are areas in the United States, where there is a drift so to speak from AM to FM but I think if those areas are examined, one will notice that the spectrum space for AM radio stations is completely non-existent and the desire for variety and additional service therefore had to be taken up in the FM frequencies because that was all that was available. There are not any areas in Canada—there are some but not many areas where the spectrum space is completely utilized in the AM field, so in answer to your question I don't anticipate FM replacing AM radio in this country in the foreseeable future. I think it will provide an additional service but it will be a supplementary service to serve minority groups and minority type audiences more directly and merely give additional variety in the system, but not act as a replacement.

The Chairman: You say at page 4 of your Brief—

"We discovered that specialization in the sense of consistently serving the needs of an identifiable segment of the population would be the future role of radio."

Does this mean that for each of your stations you horn in on a specific segment of audience?

Mr. Moffat: Yes. We don't try to provide service to everybody within a given market.

The Chairman: Well, is the audience that you are after the same in every market or...

Mr. Moffat: We are after different audiences.

The Chairman: Different audiences in different markets?

Mr. Moffat: Depending on what...

The Chairman: Well, could you tell us what those audiences are?

Mr. Moffat: Well, in Winnipeg, the audience is primarily adults over 25 years of age. In Moose Jaw where it is a single station market...

The Chairman: Yes.

Mr. Moffat: We do try to provide block programming that will satisfy a whole range of desires. In Vancouver for instance we serve an audience that we identify as being up to the age of 35.

The Chairman: Under 35?

Mr. Moffat: Yes. In Calgary and in Edmonton we have a slightly different position that somewhere between the Vancouver and the Winnipeg situation.

The Chairman: It is 25 to 35 you mean?

Mr. Moffat: It is basically 25 to 49 in Calgary and Edmonton.

The Chairman: Do you think that if radio stations attempted to reach identifiable segments, does it become important that some agency, presumably the CRTC, ensure that all segments are reached in multiple station markets. In other words, what would happen in, well, let us use a city that you are not in—Toronto. In Toronto if all the radio stations decided to horn in on the same market, the same segment to use your words, some segments presumably would be ignored. Can this decision be left to the marketplace or should the CRTC or some other agency determine what the regional balance will be?

Mr. Moffat: Well, I think the Commission has an opportunity to ensure diversity of service through the applications that they receive to serve a given market like in Toronto. I think the economics of the marketplace would really mean that you wouldn't find that a majority of the stations were trying to serve one specific segment of the population.

The Chairman: You think it is a pretty academic sort of a problem?

Mr. Moffat: I believe it is. It has a tendency to work itself out.

The Chairman: Senator Sparrow?

Senator Sparrow: How do you determine these markets?

Mr. Moffat: Through audience surveys which are primarily done by the Bureau of Broadcast Measurement.

Senator Sparrow: Do you find that you are continually making changes because of this with regards to radio programs?

Mr. Moffat: No, not continually.

Senator Sparrow: In a particular radio station that you owned, say, for ten years, in that period would there have been many changes in programming in any particular market?

Mr. Moffat: Not many. There will have been some but not many. In Winnipeg for instance in the last ten years, we have had one basic change in programming policy.

Mr. Mitchell: I think the basic question is how do you determine which part of the people you want to serve.

The Chairman: Which segment?

Mr. Mitchell: Yes, rather than how do you measure it.

Mr. Moffat: Well, you have to sit down and you take a look at each individual market. If we feel that there is an avenue, that there is somebody that is perhaps providing service but not well maybe, that is an area that we would deem to be worth going after.

The Chairman: I think Senator Kinnear has a supplementary question and so does Mr. Fortier. I will take Senator Kinnear first.

Senator Kinnear: Mr. Chairman, my question is on programming. I was out of the room for a while but I am wondering if your Vancouver station—if you were flexible enough there to take advantage of more news during the newspaper strike?

Mr. Moffat: Mr. Mitchell, you were talking to Mr. Donald Hamilton the Manager of CKLG.

Mr. Mitchell: We didn't increase the news content that much for that reason. You have to understand that in Vancouver, while the official newspapers are not publishing, there are other newspapers being circulated with a wide distribution. The unions are publishing their own newspapers as you know and becoming a free enterprise.

Senator Kinnear: Yes, we did have a report on the other newspapers.

The Chairman: I note Senator Kinnear that Mr. Hamilton is in the room and I have asked Mr. Moffat if we could put a question to Mr. Hamilton—if you don't mind, Mr. Moffat?

Mr. Moffat: No.

The Chairman: I think Senator Kinnear's question is really basically how is your station responding to the absence of newspapers. What special steps have you taken and how have they been received in the community?

I should apologize. I realize that you weren't expected to be asked any questions but since you are here we might as well take advantage of your presence.

Mr. Donald Hamilton, Manager, CKLG: First of all, we took a good look at our news. I wouldn't say we expanded the amount of time that the news was taking but I would say that we were editing the news much more closely and trying to take a broader concept of the news in the time that we were normally devoting to it. We also undertook to retain some of the people who had been displaced in the walk-out or strike at Pacific Press, some of the feature writers of Pacific Press. We have also undertaken a rather massive service to the community that in some way perhaps might be tied to the strike or walk-out, in that we are conducting a rather intensive investigation into the use of drugs in the community and will be airing a 20 hour special starting next week.

The Chairman: Twenty straight hours?

Mr. Hamilton: Two hours a morning and two hours a night for five straight days.

The Chairman: What time in the morning and at night would that be?

Mr. Hamilton: 9:00 to 11:00 in the morning and 6:00 to 8:00 at night.

Senator Sparrow: Is that a repeat at night?

Mr. Hamilton: Yes, it is and in this particular regard we have retained a substantial amount of press people to develop this particular community need.

Senator Kinnear: Well, at the time I wonder if you would be able to keep them?

Mr. Hamilton: I would seriously doubt it because we had to retain them on a free-lance basis because they are union members with unions with which we are not affiliated and I would think that their first love would probably be to go back to work for Pacific Press.

The Chairman: Have you had any indication of any community response to these things?

Mr. Hamilton: No, I don't think in all fairness I have. I have no knowledge that it has been particularly well or particularly poorly received. People tend to take the news that they hear for granted and the fact that sometimes if you invest a significant amount of money for people in a particular effort the public aren't necessarily aware of that.

The Chairman: Have you picked up a great deal of commercial revenues—extra commercial revenues?

Mr. Hamilton: No, we have picked up very little as a matter of fact. In terms of percentage, we were operating at a fairly high percentage of efficiency when the newspaper went out and since that time we have filled up to the point of 100 per cent efficiency but that was not substantial.

The Chairman: Thank you. As I said we realize that you weren't expecting to be asked questions but we are grateful to have your comments.

Mr. Fortier: I think you had a supplementary question?

Mr. Fortier: Yes, Mr. Chairman. It goes back to Mr. Moffat's last answer to Senator Sparrow. This increased concentration of radio stations on particular segments of the community—what does it mean in terms of the future of CBC radio according to you?

Mr. Moffat: Well, I think the CBC radio at least in the markets that we are involved in or involved with in the last year, I would think have improved their presentation.

Mr. Fortier: In what way?

Mr. Moffat: If I can use the words and I know you will probably question me on it later—they have modernized their operation. I think that CBC radio got stale and I think that certainly they are garnering more audience than they ever had before.

Mr. Fortier: But in those areas where you have an interest in stations, which compete with the CBC, do you find that they are becoming increasingly a competitor to be reckoned with, although they cater to a broad spectrum of audience, whereas you try to hone in on a particular age group?

Mr. Moffat: I think that the CBC radio is doing a good job of public affairs broadcasting. It has kind of a universal appeal but I would think that they probably don't touch the high end of an age scale and they probably don't come close to the lower end of the scale.

Mr. Fortier: Is there a need for CBC radio in Canada today?

Mr. Moffat: Certainly in the outlying areas where no other stations exist and there aren't many of those.

Mr. Fortier: What about those areas where private broadcasters exist. Should the CBC get out of the radio field or should it continue to perform?

Mr. Moffat: Well, I would think to discharge their mandate under their Act they would have to continue in the radio field.

Mr. Fortier: Even if their audience dwindled to an infinitesimal number?

Mr. Moffat: Well, that is a difficult question. Suppose if nobody is listening, the station might as well be shut down. If it is not performing a service, if nobody is listening to it they just might as well shut down.

Mr. Fortier: Well, as you know their audience is very small, a very faithful audience but it is relatively small in areas such as Winnipeg.

Mr. Moffat: Well, that depends on what people—in those areas I think you will find the CBC radio is not that small—that they do have an average audience of 8 or 10 per cent and perhaps 12 per cent which isn't a small audience.

Mr. Fortier: Do you find that in those areas that they are competing on even terms with the private broadcasters, having access to the public purse?

Mr. Moffat: No. They have an advantage in competing with us. They have no limitation on the prices that they can pay for programs or people as we do.

The Chairman: Senator Sparrow?

Senator Sparrow: You would call them an effective opposition?

Mr. Moffat: Yes.

Mr. Pryor: They were effective in hiring people away at prices that we couldn't afford to pay and we needed to be competitive with in Winnipeg as an example.

Mr. Moffat: For people they certainly are effective competition. In a commercial sense we very rarely run into a CBC radio salesman that gives us any difficulty at all.

Mr. Fortier: What about CBC television in Winnipeg?

Mr. Moffat: Well, that is a different question.

Mr. Fortier: Would you rate the competition there from the point of view of manpower and from the point of view of programming?

Mr. Moffat: Would I rate the competition?

Mr. Fortier: Yes. How do you view that competition?

Mr. Moffat: In television?

Mr. Fortier: In television yes, in Winnipeg.

Mr. Moffat: The same situation applies.

Mr. Fortier: From your point of view, does the CBC television provide fair or unfair competition to Channel 7?

Mr. Moffat: I think they can do things because they have access to the public purse which we don't have. Some of their purchasing practices, that you have heard about before, are questionable in our view.

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Crépault, the President of the Canadian Association of Broadcasters told this Committee two weeks ago that the CBC should cease to perform as it presently performs. Are you aware of his presentation?

Mr. Moffat: Yes, I was here for the C.A.B. presentation.

Mr. Fortier: Well, as a member of the C.A.B. do you agree with that?

Mr. Moffat: Yes I do.

The Chairman: I would like to ask you—at page 4 in your Brief you talk about your attitude towards local programming and so on, you say:

“...Canadians can do little to influence the course of the war in Vietnam but they can and want to become involved in helping under-privileged people who may well live down the block.”

And then on the next page you talk about a program in Vancouver by Myles Murchison who recently completed a six-hour special on World Peace. Was that six one-hours or what exactly was that program?

Mr. Moffat: I would again ask Mr. Hamilton to answer that, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: Fine.

Mr. Moffat: Whether it was a six-hour package or a series of programs...

Mr. Hamilton: It was a complete one six-hour show on Christmas Eve—6:00 p.m. to midnight, for which we won an award as the outstanding community involved station of the year.

The Chairman: What was the theme of the program?

Mr. Hamilton: The theme of the program was World Peace with an additive survey of a cross section of the community—what peace means to me and an expression from individuals on the show, the relative importance of peace and the different aspects of peace, internal peace, world peace, poetry, drama and everything relating to peace.

The Chairman: Is Mr. Murchison an employee of the station?

Mr. Hamilton: Yes he is.

The Chairman: And a director?

Mr. Hamilton: He is our Director of Public Affairs.

The Chairman: Did Mr. Murchison anywhere on that program indicate that—and I quote the Brief “Canadians can do little to influence the course of the war in Vietnam...”?

Mr. Hamilton: Well, I can't recall that.

The Chairman: Do you think he conceivably...

Mr. Moffat: Those are my words.

The Chairman: I realize that but I was wondering if Mr. Murchison would have uttered those words on the program.

Mr. Hamilton: He may have but I don't recall.

The Chairman: Do you think there was that possibility?

Mr. Hamilton: Well, I can't really say...

The Chairman: I am not trying to be difficult but I just found that to be a very startling statement which I underlined when I read it. It seems to me that many people who listen to your Vancouver station and are familiar with it I don't think would share that sentiment.

Mr. Moffat: That they cannot do anything?

The Chairman: I think they can.

Senator Sparrow: What award did you refer to?

Mr. Hamilton: It was the Golden Leaf Award from R.P.M. Magazine.

Senator Sparrow: Did you submit it to the C.A.B. Awards?

Mr. Hamilton: Yes.

The Chairman: Let's talk about again—quoting your brief—“helping the individual relate to his community.” How specifically do you do that?

Mr. Moffat: Well, by providing Public Affairs shows, by finding out what an individual or groups are concerned about in a community.

The Chairman: Could you give us an example of the success that you have had?

Mr. Moffat: Well, in one instance in Winnipeg we have been very successful in attracting audiences with nothing but straight community news.

The Chairman: I meant something that you have achieved for the community?

Mr. Pryor: If I might comment?

The Chairman: Please, of course.

Mr. Pryor: I would like to speak to this and I would like to say something a little later in terms of the development of some of the needs of the community and in order of priority.

We, after having done such a survey of attitude and of needs, found that in the Calgary community and the Edmonton community—and indeed it may be extended to other communities in this country—that ignorance of the drug situation, simple drug education, knowing what was going on in the field of drug culture, abuses and all the rest of it was certainly something that was not present. A lot of people talked about it and the word “drug” appeared in the newspapers and was viewed on television but very few people really knew anything about it, particularly parents.

We undertook in the City of Edmonton and in the City of Calgary to put on a special as a pattern that we had developed—it was some 24 hours of broadcasting that dealt with this drug problem.

The Chairman: Over a 24 hour period?

Mr. Pryor: Again, broken up—two hours in the morning, two hours at night and over a six day period. We set aside this period and in co-operation with the Provincial Health Authorities and all of the various governmental authorities in our area and our city, developed drug kits that were distributed to thousands of people as a result of our show. They were primarily educational in nature.

The Chairman: What was the community response to this?

Mr. Pryor: We had thousands more requests for drug kits containing the information than we had drug kits to give them. We completely under-estimated the response. There was some negative response—we had some letters from people that said “You shouldn’t talk about this drug thing, it’s terrible”, and that was the point of the exercise.

The Chairman: You mentioned two cities, Calgary and Edmonton. Had the newspapers not done this sort of thing prior to your doing it?

Mr. Pryor: Well, it has been mentioned here but they made no big effort in our opinion to really focus on the problem in depth.

The Chairman: Mr. Moffat in dealing with drugs, the phrase you used which I wrote down was you analysed “what was going on” and presumably you explained where people get drugs, how they get them, how much they pay, what the cures are and so on. Did you in the course of this programming attempt to answer the question why the young people take the drugs?

Mr. Pryor: You are addressing your question to Mr. Moffat?

The Chairman: Well, yes I did. I was probably looking at you...

Mr. Pryor: Yes we did. We shared the belief in what exposure we have had to this problem, that it is very similar to alcoholism and a lot of the other human ills that exist. I don’t think we will be able to wipe it out but we may come to a point where we understand it as a symptom of other basic motivations other than as an ill in itself. People take drugs for reasons and the successful treatment centres, we are aware of, are dealing in trying to satisfy the basic need and the reason the people are driven to particularly hard drugs. We have done a considerable amount of work, since this program started, in trying to help civic and provincial officials in setting up a drug treatment centre. This has been completely abortive because frankly we are finding very, very great difficulty in finding people who are qualified in this field and as a result we have made a couple of trips to the United States and to other places to view treatment centres where in fact this specific issue is brought to bear—they are attempting to treat the basic motivation with people who take drugs rather than the fact that—that they are addicted or are taking drugs.

The Chairman: I hope I can put this next question and I hope you won’t misunderstand the question. Given your earlier statement about horning in on a specific audience, would it be fair to say that the segments you are horning in on, at least in those two cities, are the people who might have the greatest need or the greatest interest in this type of information?

Mr. Pryor: Well, in a very simple answer, no. We hope that because we departed from our format in Calgary and in Edmonton of being primarily a musical source (this kind of an approach with news—two-hour block programming of this type is not our normal type of format) and in our departure we try to promote or we hope to attract people who are not normally within our audience. We do think that young parents who have children in the very early teens, well really from grade eight on up through the school years, are most faced now with the necessity for the education in this field; and we do feel that we do have those parents as our audience, so in that respect yes. But to re-phrase the question, we don't feel that our audience are simply drug users. I am not sure if that was your inference...

The Chairman: Well, I suppose it was the inference but in an offensive way. You are suggesting then that this programming is directed at the parents rather than the kids?

Mr. Pryor: The kids, no.

The Chairman: Why don't you, Mr. Mitchell, editorialize on your station?

Mr. Mitchell: Well, I think we try to follow the Broadcasting Act which asks us to present a balanced presentation of information.

The Chairman: But does that preclude editorializing—I don't think it does because lots of other stations editorialize.

Mr. Mitchell: It doesn't really but we feel it is more important that we get all the sides of the issue exposed.

The Chairman: So in doing the kind of program on drugs which you have done and which we have been discussing aren't you really editorializing?

Mr. Mitchell: No we didn't really because we did have the open line going on. We presented the information—presented it for a half hour and opened up the phones and let the people call in. Now, when they call in, it gives both sides. We offer to let the people come on and we sought out the user who felt it was a great thing that they were using these drugs. No, we thought it was more important that we exposed both sides and try and let the people form their own opinion on it.

I think that some of the things that came out were rather shocking to us. The fact that some of the drug pushers are now carrying around magnum pistols is concerning the police enforcement officers in Edmonton, the fact that there is an alcoholics anonymous home in Edmonton—and yet there is nothing for the drug addict, the example of the young girl who went to the hospital in a coma or under the influence of drugs with her wrists slashed was bandaged up and released still under the influence of drugs—this is the type of thing that has come out and concerns us all very greatly.

Mr. Pryor: Senator Davey, there is one thing—there is a semantic problem and we deal with it in broadcasting all the time and if I could just take the time...

The Chairman: Please.

Mr. Pryor: Defined the way we see it, but this may not be the way your question was phrased, and editorial to us is a very specific statement of a position by the licensee company of a broadcasting station. It says, we at Moffat Broadcasting believe that—whatever the case may be—that drugs are bad, are good or something in that context. In that sense we do not editorialize. We do however encourage commentary, observation, development of attitudes of various kinds in a balanced basis through controversy of opponents and this type of thing, which is popularly called editorial opinion or editorial commentary. In other words, it is a departure from the simplicity of saying a lady was run over by a car—it might have been a very horrible type of accident and I think we have a tendency of trying to put it in a little more human terms than that, but we don't consider that an editorial commentary. An editorial commentary to us is a statement of position by a licensee and that's a thing that we do not do. We do encourage commentary and we try to do so with opposing viewpoints and balanced viewpoints at all times.

The Chairman: Mr. Fortier?

Mr. Fortier: This is a new philosophy applied to AM stations, at least your AM stations, is it not—this investigation and report in depth of a particular problem which may afflict your community or the general Canadian community?

Mr. Pryor: Is it a new development?

Mr. Fortier: Well, this is a new emphasis, is it not?

The Chairman: This programming format you mean?

Mr. Fortier: Yes, that's right.

Mr. Moffat: Well, new within five years.

Mr. Fortier: Well, this sets the stage for my question. What has brought it about—because there has been—it is not only in the last five years—there has been manifestation of social ills in the Canadian community. What in the last five years has made it necessary for private broadcasters such as your team to present this sort of in depth study on your network?

Mr. Moffat: Well, I think it is part of our responsibility to recognize what kind of problems exist in the community.

Mr. Fortier: Why was it not done before?

Mr. Moffat: Before five years ago?

Mr. Fortier: Yes.

Mr. Moffat: Well, I would say...

Mr. Fortier: Well, what has happened? Is it that the newspapers are doing this very sort of thing, doing more in depth studies? Is it that television has arrived and that you have had to face up to increased competition from that medium, or what is it?

Mr. Mitchell: I would suggest that it is because we find in talking to our listeners that there is a growing awareness of the problems in our community and it is reflected in the newspapers, television and radio.

Mr. Fortier: Well, those problems were here six years ago, ten years ago—maybe not as we know them today...

Mr. Mitchell: But they didn't concern the people. They didn't concern you.

Mr. Fortier: They did not? Are you sure that your listeners were not concerned about problems which perhaps warranted programs such as the ones you have now developed?

Mr. Pryor: Well, I think they were concerned but I think however in our society, it is more evident that people are more prepared to vocalize their concern.

Mr. Fortier: Well, I would like to know that it is that has made it possible or made it necessary now for radio stations such as those in your group to present this sort of study?

Mr. Pryor: Well, if I may venture an opinion which is strictly a personal one—there are no answers to that question obviously but I really wonder about anybody's capacity to stick to my answer in this regard. It seems to me that young people have caused changes in attitudes throughout our society in the last few years to a degree that I am not aware of having existed in our society before. They affect our dress, they affect our attitudes, they have changed I think public attitudes so much more to sensitivity to human beings rather than sensitivity to objects and economics and these things, but frankly I think that the pressures that are being exerted, many times extreme, but they are creating an awareness.

I don't think our attitudes about war—my attitude certainly would not be the same if it had not been for a great deal of the outcry that has existed about war and a deep questioning of these factors.

Now, whether the media starts that or thinking people start that, or no matter what the case may be, it is maybe simply a matter that the young people today are simply a generation that are not inhibited by the same factors that maybe inhibited some of us in our time. I think they have had a very enormous effect on the morals and on the outlook of all the media.

The Chairman: Mr. Pryor, are these young people concerned about Mr. Benson's White Paper?

Mr. Pryor: I don't think so.

The Chairman: And yet surely that could be a legitimate topic for the approach you have taken.

Mr. Moffat: It has been.

Mr. Pryor: It has been, yes.

The Chairman: They are concerned about some things and those things—the things that they are concerned about, they have been able to transmit this concern to the real world?

Mr. Pryor: There seems to be an observation—it is the observation that I make that I wish we could get them interested in the White Paper.

The Chairman: Well, may I ask you this question. In reading your Brief the first six or seven pages of it—I found it interesting but there was really only one thing that concerned me. I am sure it must concern you and I am wondering how you handle it. I read "We see our role as broadcasters to concentrate on our own local areas", and the word "local" appears at least a dozen times in the first six or seven pages. How do you stress this local approach without becoming either provincial or parochial? How do you prevent your listeners from becoming sort of turned inward?

Mr. Moffat: Well, we do provide a balance of national and international news and information but it is localized to, for instance, Calgary. For instance part of the concern Calgarians have is how they fit in the Canadian fabric right now and I think that is a legitimate part.

The Chairman: Does your station in Calgary, for example, carry lots of national news?

Mr. Moffat: Yes.

The Chairman: And international news?

Mr. Moffat: And international news.

The Chairman: The Committee has in our files lots of rate card information and ratings on audiences and so on and so we don't have to ask you those kind of questions but as a rule of thumb, what has been the response to this kind of programming or this kind of approach? Without going into the specifics of rating has it been successful?

Mr. Mitchell: We didn't try to sell it.

The Chairman: Well I meant audience response.

Mr. Moffat: Generally favourable.

Mr. Fortier: You did not sell advertising on those?

Mr. Mitchell: We did not on the ones we described.

Senator Sparrow: Do you have generally the same news policy for each of your stations or would it vary?

Mr. Moffat: Well, I am not quite sure what you mean by that.

Senator Sparrow: Well, for instance some stations cover primarily local news and other stations primarily provincial news or Canadian news or international news.

Mr. Moffat: No. We require of our stations, that they do give in news a balance to international, national and local stories. They just don't give local stories to the exclusion of international and national.

Senator Sparrow: How do you figure out a balance?

Mr. Moffat: Well, that is left up to the individual news director.

Senator Sparrow: It could vary from station to station?

Mr. Moffat: Well, I suppose it could but in practice I don't think it does.

Mr. Pryor: It seems to me that it varies daily. There may be more news in Ottawa that is of local interest today than there is relatively international news but tomorrow that mix may vary again so I think you have to rely on the judgment of your people. I would like to make one distinction and there is semantics involved here. When you talk about news of interest to local people that's not necessarily only local news. Our orientation is we have a responsibility to serve the people who can hear our signal—they are local people to us and we try and present to them what is of interest to them and that news may be something about the White Paper or the Senate on the Mass Media or whatever else may be of specific interest to them but we try to fit their needs other than only taking information that takes place within that area.

Therefore we are trapped I guess in our own semantics by saying it's local needs rather than just local stories in nature, if I can draw that distinction.

The Chairman: What is the Canadian Contemporary News System?

Mr. Moffat: It is an association of—Paul Akehurst is here and he can correct me—I believe twelve or thirteen stations—across Canada that are inter-connected to feed stories of interest to them all.

The Chairman: Are these stations commonly owned?

Mr. Moffat: Not all of them, no.

The Chairman: Of the thirteen do you know how many different owners or ownership groups are represented?

Mr. Moffat: I would think four or five.

The Chairman: Mr. Akehurst?

Mr. Paul Akehurst: I was going to say six.

The Chairman: Why I asked the question you were here on the day the Canadian Association of Broadcasters were here and if their rationale for concentration of media ownership in broadcasting they held as an example the kind of thing which could be done by a merger and with the example specifically of news broadcasts, but it occurred to me in looking at Canadian Contemporary News System, that this is a co-operative. It isn't jointly owned. Am I right or wrong about that?

Mr. Moffat: Well, it is a co-operative. It isn't jointly owned but I think it would be a lot easier though to launch a project like Canadian Contemporary News where you do have group ownership rather than trying to get together 13 or 14 individuals.

The Chairman: Well, you have got together six or seven or four or five or whatever the number is.

Mr. Pryor: In the beginning and in all deference to the reporters in the room, Canadian Contemporary News started around the nucleus of our stations in Moffat Broadcasting and the CHUM stations because that was enough to get it started and we could finance it and pick up its losses and get it going. Since that time the service has improved to the degree that it has been able to attract other people into the thing but I don't believe without some reasonable economic base it could have developed in the beginning. I am perhaps putting words in Mr. Waters' mouth but it seems to me that it was necessary to have a certain...

The Chairman: Well, we will take the words out of Mr. Waters' mouth when he comes before the Committee after Easter.

One other question on news that I have. At pages 19 and 20 and I am assuming that this applies to television as well, you say:

"In the face of the enormous amounts of news and information made available from all sources, people tend to be more independent in their interpretation of events."

I wonder if you could give us any evidence to back that statement up?

Mr. Waters: In terms of specific research, no we can't.

The Chairman: It is just a feeling that you have?

Mr. Moffat: Yes, it is just a feeling but in discussions with my friends—they share that view. They do listen and try to get as much information on a given subject as they can in order to make up their mind.

The Chairman: It is just a feeling?

Mr. Moffat: Yes, we have no research on it.

The Chairman: Are there other questions that the Senators have?

Senator Sparrow: I would like to ask a question on prime time. Would prime time, in the connotation in which we discuss it, be the same in all of your stations or does it vary from area to area?

Mr. Moffat: It does vary. For instance in Winnipeg we consider prime time to be from 6:00 a.m. to 10:00 a.m. In Vancouver it is really hard to define prime time and restrict it to the morning. They have almost as much audience in the evening so it is rather hard to say.

Senator Sparrow: Do you know why? Have you tried to analyse why it is different?

Mr. Moffat: Well, it depends on the availability of the segment of population that you are trying to serve through radio. In the case of Winnipeg where we appeal to an adult segment of the community they just aren't available at night. They are doing other things, watching television or whatever people do in the evening. In the case of a station that is youth oriented, they are available to radio.

Senator Sparrow: In the evening?

Mr. Moffat: Yes. They make themselves available to radio.

The Chairman: Mr. Fortier?

Senator Sparrow: May I just ask one other question?

The Chairman: Please.

Senator Sparrow: Have you any twinning arrangements with any other radio stations?

Mr. Moffat: Twinning arrangements?

Senator Sparrow: With another radio station in another country. Have you any twinning arrangements with any other radio stations in other countries?

Mr. Moffat: No.

Senator Sparrow: Are you familiar with some stations that have twinning arrangements?

Mr. Moffat: Twinning in terms of ownership?

Senator Sparrow: No.

Mr. Pryor: We don't understand the question, Senator.

Senator Sparrow: The twinning of cities is an example, one to another. There are some radio stations in Canada that have this twinning arrangement with radio stations in other countries. You are not familiar with it?

Mr. Moffat: I am generally now, yes.

Senator Sparrow: Do your stations have that twinning program?

Mr. Moffat: No.

The Chairman: Are any of your stations programmed out of the United States?

Mr. Moffat: No.

The Chairman: Is any of the music chosen out of the United States?

Mr. Pryor: Absolutely not.

The Chairman: Mr. Fortier?

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Moffat, with respect to your CTV affiliate in Winnipeg, to what extent do you participate in the management of that television station?

Mr. Moffat: We participate in the general policy of the station. We do not in day-to-day decisions.

Mr. Fortier: Who are the other shareholders of CJAY TV?

Mr. Moffat: Woodmount Investments Ltd. which is a beneficially owned to the benefit of Mr. Ralph Misener and I believe Senator Campbell Haig has a direct ownership.

Mr. Fortier: Senator who?

Mr. Moffat: Senator Campbell Haig.

Mr. Fortier: These are the three shareholders?

Mr. Moffat: And Moffat Broadcasting, yes.

Mr. Fortier: Yes, Moffat.

Mr. Moffat: Plus the general manager of the station has an interest as well.

Mr. Fortier: Can you tell us generally how your affiliation with the CTV network has worked up to now?

Mr. Moffat: It is expensive but in our view works well.

Mr. Fortier: To what extent is an affiliate station in a position to influence the network programming?

Mr. Moffat: No, really my knowledge in this specific area may be lacking. In terms of influencing the programming that is put on the CTV, as I understand it, there is a programming committee of the Board of Directors that advises the network on which representation is held by the individual station. Presumably at that meeting they get a chance to express their views on the programming of the network and out of their discussions a consensus is arrived at for the programming of the network.

Mr. Fortier: Is this affiliation a very flexible one or do you find that there is too much rigidity in the time on any given day you must give to the network programming?

Mr. Moffat: I guess to be a network they have to imply a certain rigidity in the programming schedule, I think CTV however is very adaptable. We can provide almost instantly pre-emptions for events that we feel are significant.

Mr. Fortier: Of local interest?

Mr. Moffat: More of national interest.

Mr. Fortier: Would this be a pre-emption on your station as opposed to the network programming?

Mr. Moffat: Both. It would be in network time or non-network time.

Mr. Fortier: In 1969 when you were forced to sell your station in Regina did you have to make a choice as to whether or not you were going to have to give up Regina or Winnipeg?

Mr. Moffat: No we did not.

Mr. Fortier: You did not...

Mr. Moffat: Make a choice.

Mr. Fortier: Could you have held on to Regina and sold Winnipeg?

Mr. Moffat: I suppose we could have attempted to.

Mr. Mitchell: I think we would have had one problem, sir, because I think when we would have asked permission to acquire the remainder of those shares, that would be a violation of our policy. We agreed at the time to sell the television stations in a year and we did so.

Mr. Fortier: Now that the CRTC are re-considering that policy—that one broadcaster can only have an interest in one CTV affiliate—are you interested in acquiring an interest in another CTV affiliate in Canada?

Mr. Moffat: Specifically no, we are not at this point in time. I am not saying that we wouldn't be interested in a station—a CTV station affiliated with the network. We are not examining any proposed purchase.

Mr. Fortier: What is your main beef about the CTV affiliation? You must have one.

Mr. Moffat: Its expense.

Mr. Fortier: Its expense?

Mr. Moffat: Yes. It is a very expensive membership to hold.

Mr. Mitchell: I think part of the reason for that is the high cost of delivery. You know, it costs a lot of money for CTV to have a microwave system serving both ends of this country and I think that is one of the factors that gets into the high cost.

Mr. Fortier: How is the overall cost of the microwave system proportioned to the affiliate stations?

Mr. Moffat: I don't know. Is it distributed in a program fund?

Mr. Pryor: A program formula.

Mr. Fortier: What?

Mr. Pryor: A program formula.

Mr. Fortier: I see.

Mr. Moffat: Which is a function in some uses of the rate card.

Mr. Mitchell: Plus a little negotiation.

Mr. Fortier: So you say that your main complaint is the cost?

Mr. Moffat: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: Is it your view after serious analysis, that the cost could be lowered?

Mr. Moffat: Of CTV?

Mr. Fortier: The cost to you of CTV affiliation?

Mr. Moffat: No, I don't think it could. Perhaps we would take issue with some nickel and dime expenditures of CTV but nothing of significance.

Mr. Fortier: What about programming which is provided by the network. By and large do you find that it is adequate from the point of view of your audience in Winnipeg?

Mr. Moffat: Yes we do.

Mr. Fortier: You do?

Mr. Moffat: There are certain things we perhaps would like to change about the programming in terms of additional techniques and specific programming but generally, I feel that the programming they do provide is attractive and of interest to our people.

Mr. Fortier: Well, I have one other question which has been touched upon—what is the future of radio station programming in the next decade in Canada? I mean, you have just explained how you have adjusted in the course of the last five years...

The Chairman: Well, I think that question has been discussed, Mr. Fortier.

Mr. Fortier: Well, I am looking ahead now.

The Chairman: Well, I think that was discussed, was it not, earlier?

Mr. Moffat: Well, we talked in terms of AM or FM as method of transmission...

The Chairman: You mean programming as such?

Mr. Moffat: Yes, we touched on the programming aspect of it. I thought at that time and I still feel the same as I did a half hour ago, there won't be many changes in the programming of AM radio stations. Now, there are other factors that may enter into that but if there are, they are unknown to me. I don't see that there will be a change in the direction of AM programming.

Mr. Fortier: What I am trying to get at here with this preamble is the effect which cable television will have on the future of radio and the future of television?

Mr. Moffat: Well, I don't think that cable television will have a direct effect on AM radio.

Mr. Fortier: That is one.

Mr. Moffat: As far as television is concerned, depends on so many circumstances—what stations are brought in, on cable, the amount of programming that is brought in, etcetera. When I say what stations are brought in—in the situation in Winnipeg the cable company in which we have an interest, carried KCND. Now, we are licensed by the Federal Government to do this and I think the effect on CJOY broadcasting stations would be different for instance if we were allowed to import an ABC affiliate from Minneapolis to Winnipeg. Cable is going to have a definite effect on television broadcasting; there is no doubt about that.

Mr. Fortier: Through your CATV company, you provide your viewers with KCND which is in competition with your CTV affiliate, is that correct?

Mr. Moffat: Right.

Mr. Fortier: In other words you are sort of hedging your bet?

Mr. Moffat: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: Are you doing similar hedging in Calgary and in Vancouver? In other words are you seeking to become involved with CATV...

Mr. Moffat: Not in Vancouver, but in Calgary, yes we are.

Mr. Fortier: You are?

Mr. Moffat: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: Is there an application pending for the CRTC?

Mr. Moffat: Yes there is an application before the Canadian Radio and Television Commission.

Mr. Fortier: But not in Vancouver?

Mr. Moffat: No.

Mr. Fortier: Have you applied for CATV licences in other cities in Canada?

Mr. Moffat: Yes, in Edmonton.

Mr. Fortier: In Edmonton?

Mr. Moffat: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: And that is also under advisement?

Mr. Moffat: Yes, it is before the Commission.

The Chairman: Well, may I then perhaps on behalf of the Committee thank the witnesses. I think, Mr. Moffat, it is perhaps not necessary to repeat all of the things I said in response to the Selkirk appearance but certainly the same things apply. You have been a very candid and straightforward witness as indeed many of our witnesses have been. We are particularly grateful for your presence and I may say the one thing I neglected to say to the Selkirk people is, given the understanding I hope they have and I hope you have of the analysis we are trying to do on the overall Canadian media spectrum, having been before the Committee, having listened to our questions, having looked at us and having perhaps sensed, I hope a little more directly, where it is we are trying to go, if you have additional thoughts or ideas when you return home that you would like to send us, either privately or publicly we would be delighted to receive them.

The Committee comes back after Easter and has two sitting weeks and then we turn to the rather formidable task of preparing our report. Yours has been a useful contribution and, thank you.

Mr. Moffat: We may take the opportunity to send you additional information.

The Chairman: Thank you.

The Committee adjourned at 5:55 p.m. until 8:00 p.m.

The Committee resumed at 8.00 p.m.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, if I may call the session to order.

The witness this evening as I have indicated several times during the day is a press critic of international renown. His reputation, I think it is fair to say, is worldwide. He has the most interesting background and I think that perhaps I could just highlight some of the more recent developments.

He was prior to its demise—I won't say immediately prior to its demise, but prior to its demise—a contributing editor to the Saturday Evening Post. You may be interested, Mr. Bagdikian, to know that in the speech I made to the Senate of Canada proposing the establishment of this Committee, a speech which I made about a year ago, I quoted extensively from several speeches or series of remarks you made about any number of subjects all involving the media in its various stages.

Mr. Bagdikian worked for many years as a correspondent and a columnist for the Providence Rhode Island Journal and he was in 1961 a Guggenheim Foundation Fellow. He has received a number of honours for distinguished reporting including the George Foste Peabody award. He spent two years in a special media project with the Rand Corporation.

Before I tell you his most recent assignment, perhaps I could just read from a magazine—this is an article which I believe originally appeared in the Columbia Journalism Review. However, in any event, Mr. Bagdikian says:

"The leading paper in the capital, the Washington Post, is the most irritating to the country, at least for this reader."

Now, our guest this evening is now the national editor of the Washington Post and thereby I am sure hangs the tale.

The procedure we have here, sir, is one of informality. I would propose that you make some opening remarks and then following that we would like to ask you some questions, not just about your return to the Washington Post and your career at the Washington Post, but there are many other subjects on which we consider you expert, and I think we would also like to ask your opinions.

I should perhaps also include in my introduction an admonition. When Commissioner Nicholas Johnson was here last week, he made an excellent presentation—a worth while presentation as far as our committee was concerned—but the Canadian Association of Broadcasters subsequently issued a press release questioning whether or not American national should be discussing problems which are of primary Canadian concern.

I know you well enough to know that you will not be in the least bit inhibited, so welcome.

Mr. Ben Bagdikian, National Editor, Washington Post: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I am not inhibited but also while having the natural born arrogance of a journalist, I am not going to presume to talk about the Canadian mass media about which I know much too little.

Now I did write that the Post was a very irritating paper to me because it was so close to being great, that it didn't quite make it. The Post then did the most unfair thing possible two years later. They called up and said "All right, you are a critic and you have been telling us how we ought to do it, why don't you come and do it," and that as you know is terribly unfair.

I am flattered to be here and I think that this committee is doing something which every democracy needs to do regularly and thoroughly. I have already confessed that I don't know much about the Canadian mass media, but Canada and the United States do share, I think, some of the same media problems. We are both peculiarly dependent on having a maximum flow of public information. We both have vigorous mixed economies and that means that we both experience the same combined advantages and disadvantages of a journalistic system, which is both a business enterprise and at the same time a social institution.

There is no simple or final answer for that of profit-making and news processing at the same time. I believe Government control of the news media is bad, but if that is so, then inevitably news will be produced by business corporations that have to make a profit. God and man will wrestle forever in our mass media; and therefore for no other reason than each party to the struggle says that the other is non-existent, I suspect that there will be hearings of this sort every journalistic generation, not because any one committee fails to find the answers, but because we are dealing with a living, growing, social organism that will always produce new problems and which will require new solutions.

I assume I am here partly because I have been a practitioner, and at student, and a critic of journalism. But I am, as your know, here also as a happy employee of a communications conglomerate. I believe you can be all of these things because in the case of the mass media we are dealing with a mixed blessing. Like most of life, the challenge is to keep that mixture as worth while as possible. There are some good reasons why we should have some large journalistic and mass communications corporations. For one thing it is unrealistic to think that journalistic corporations will remain small while other industrial corporations become giants, and furthermore there are things that large organizations do that small ones can't. There are not many Walter Lippmanns working for impoverished weeklies or, if there are, we don't hear about them. There are not many small organizations that can attempt to report the activities of the very large governments, or of China, or France, or the United Kingdom. And to this question whether there are more sins committed by the established big organizations than by the desperately insecure ones—the secure giants are often indifferent or greedy or arrogant, but the impoverished ones are usually the quickest to succumb to corruption or to serve the most undemocratic purposes of bureaucracy. Nevertheless, concentrated power in the mass media does constitute a serious problem certainly in the United States.

In the United States local printed monopolies in newspapers is now normal. We have 1,589 cities in the United States that have daily newspapers. Of those, 97 per cent have only one newspaper management and of the remaining 3 per cent, most combine their production, advertising and business operations which means that they are not going to fight each other very hard.

This has economic and editorial consequences. A study in Journalism Quarterly in autumn of 1966, shows that when a monopoly daily comes under local competition, it increases its local news in the case studies by 24 per cent. If its competition dies, it goes back and reverts to its lower quotient of local news. In a study we did at Rand, we found that local news costs 90 per cent more to produce than national or global news. So that what happens is that under competition, the consumer gets a more expensive product.

In addition to local monopolies we have a phenomenal growth of chains in the United States. Not phenomenal as phenomenal in percentages as you had, but phenomenal in numbers and in the rate of growth. Now, our publishers don't like the word "chain". They preferred the word "group", perhaps in the manner of undertakers who prefer to be called morticians, but the pejorative aura around the word "chain" goes back to the days of William Randolph Hearst, when the tyranny of absentee publishing was more spectacular. However, compared to the present size of chains we are really much more dramatic than that.

In 1910 there were 13 chains in the United States and they owned 62 papers or 3 per cent of all the dailies. In 1968—now in 1970 the figures are even larger—in 1968 there were 159 chains in the United States and they owned 828 dailies or 47 per cent of all the daily newspapers. In circulation their control is even greater. The largest 35 of our 159 chains control 63 per cent of all papers sold daily in the United States. So that 35 organizations which give a newspaper hierarchy usually means 35 men—have ultimate control over papers bought by 40 million households every day. That is an awesome responsibility.

Now, chain formation follows the trend of all corporate activities. It isn't just the newspapers that are getting bigger and bigger and combining, but there are some important differences between corporate chains and newspapers, between let us say newspapers and gasoline stations. A newspaper's distinctive product is social and political intelligence, which is of course a major force in shaping our national-social values.

Now monopoly or near monopoly in this is dangerous and yet this happens; and curiously it happens apparently despite the fact that chain owners do not enjoy the conventional economies of size. It appears that running ten chain newspaper plants is not much cheaper than running ten independent ones. You apparently don't make more money per paper simply because you own ten of them. Then why do they do it? I suppose pride and ambition is one reason. A man who is successful in a business wants to go on and be successful even in a bigger business; but there are more practical reasons at least in the States.

In the United States most newspapers are closely-held corporations usually within families. There are not masses of impersonal stockholders demanding national dividends. If profits are all distributed as to demands, dividends are of course taxed; but if profits are not distributed—if they reach over $100,000 then they are taxed at a special 38½ per cent tax on undistributed earnings unless these undistributed earnings are used to buy other newspaper properties.

In the United States our tax laws as such make it possible for profit earnings to be held as not taxable under a special undistributed earnings clause. So a proprietor, in effect, is penalized for ploughing his profits back into the paper and the community that produces them.

Capital formation is another advantage of chain owners. If you have ten papers then you can economize on nine of them while you collect money to buy an eleventh.

Another advantage is business experience. I don't know about Canada but in the United States, newspaper proprietors are very jealous of their financial and operating data, so that our standard economic literature is full of blanks when it comes to newspapers. Some chain owners have told me that they learn a great deal by buying other papers because there is no way they can find out accurately what the business experience is of other papers.

Now, newspapers are profitable in the United States, but the monopoly pattern and expanding chain don't produce the renewal and regeneration that profitable businesses frequently do.

Ordinarily when a corporation or a social activity becomes very profitable, or if it takes the reverse course—if it becomes morbid, new people are attracted in either to take advantage of the profits that are growing or to take over from some management that is becoming obsolete. That is one way new ideas, new products, new needs are produced and served

But this has not happened in newspapering because typically when a proprietor decides to sell his paper, he generally picks a purchaser with a same general outlook. When two Florida papers were sold to the Chicago Tribune some years ago, the seller said he picked the Tribune because it shared his political philosophy. When the DuPonts of Delaware briefly considered selling their newspapers, it was considered important according to an internal memorandum to find an outside newspaper organization whose political and economic views closely parallel those of the present ownership."

Now, these are very human desires and I guess I would feel the same way myself if I owned a newspaper and had to give it up, but means that control of this important social institution remains in a limited circle of political and economic views without the usual free enterprise mechanism for innovation and growth.

It seems to me that the greater degree of merger and chain formation there is, the more this keeps the traditional and sometimes obsolete, social and political outlooks fixed and immune to change. This in the United States has produced an incredible number of stuffy front offices in what I think is the world's most exciting business. The newsrooms are full of ferment and ideas and excitement, and the business offices of newspapers are frequently more dull than the business offices of companies that produce flying pans and wheel covers and things of this sort.

Frank Munsey was a man who about 70 years ago made millions of dollars turning the neighbourhood grocery stores into chains and about the turn of the century he discovered that he could do the same thing with newspapers. When Munsey died in 1925 one obituary said "Frank Munsey, the great publisher, is dead. Frank Munsey contributed to the journalism of his day the great talent of a rat packer, the morals of a money changer, and the manners of an undertaker. He and his kind have about succeeded in transforming a once noble profession into an 8 per cent surety. May he rest in trust."

A point I want to make is that that obituary was written by another publisher—William Allen White of Emporia, Kansas, and that would never happen today. The circle is too closed and too respectable and besides it is now a 13 per cent trust.

Now, broadcasting in the United States is even less creative. We have three television networks and the greatest talent seems to be spent imitating each other. In radio we have thousands of individual stations—as many as 34 in one city—but they exhibit a deadly uniformity in programming, most of it canned, with at most six types of stations within which all is the same. This by itself ought to warn us that large numbers of units in mass communications do not guarantee diversity.

Now, broadcasting, because it is licensed and operates within a limited electromagnetic spectrum, is inherently fixed in numbers of stations. There aren't that many positions on the dial. So when a market becomes highly profitable the alleged laws of supply and demand do not operate. The profits don't attract new interests into the business—they simply increase the powers of the established companies.

Now giantism in both newspapers and broadcasting also makes for a disproportionate political power. Now, this is not so much in a persuasiveness of editorial. Our more perceptive editorialists in the States have learned a refreshing humility since the American people have consistently refused to behave as editorials have told them to do. Much more powerful is the crucial function of deciding what will become a public issue and what will not; and this decision runs all the way from great public schemes, to which local candidates will be photographed in what pose, or whether the candidate will be photographed at all. Owners of large media organizations are treated with deference and that is unknown to small media operators.

I have sometimes thought of conducting an experiment which I would call "One Hundred of the Most Powerful Government Leaders in Washington" and in each case leave the name of a different newspaper as the calling one and my guess is that if one plotted the time elapsed before the call was returned it would tend to follow the circulation figures of the newspaper column. But these problems are probably better known to you than to me.

There is another problem which is less concrete but in some ways more troubling. Canada and United States are both affluent growing economies, developing a sense of nationality, thanks in part to the mass media. We both have our regional frictions but these were not so much created by the mass media as exposed by them. As communications satellites develop, we are even enlarging our sense of belonging to the same planet, yet we live our private lives not as members of the planet but as members of a town or community or neighbourhood; and it is in this smaller orbit that we in the United States seem to be suffering our worst pathologies.

Our country is richer than it ever was before, these communications are more widely spread, its economy is more productive, but our neighbourhoods and our communities seem to wither and become dehumanized. This loss of a sense of community comes from a basic change in our civilization and can't be laid at the door of the mass media alone.

We no longer assume in childhood that we will attend the same school as our parents, or learn the same subjects in class, and then inherit our father's house and his occupation. In a hundred different ways, we have gone away from our native communities and then insulate ourselves from our new ones. But nevertheless we depend on our new communities in important ways. We depend on unseen companies, committees and boards to provide our food, our water, our highways, our housing codes and our jobs, and all of them in a complex of functions and jurisdictions.

In the States, we have 18,000 municipalities and 17,000 townships, and within these there are 500,000 local governmental units of one kind or another. Our prolonged years of education and then after that our cosmopolitan careers remove us from the direct contacts of sources of power in our own communities, and so we become dependent on the mass media to tell us about things that we used to hear in the general store or town meeting, or at the only church in the village. But at precisely this time we have lost the community medium of information, the local newspaper or the locally programmed broadcasting station.

In 1880 in the United States, there was a daily paper in 90 per cent of all urban places. In two-thirds of those places there were competing papers. Today less than 30 per cent of our urban places have their own daily newspaper and of those only 3 per cent have competing papers. Broadcasting is even less localized and has even less local information. We have 4,400 commercial AM and FM radio stations in 2,600 different communities, and we have 639 commercial television stations in almost 300 metropolitan areas. But these large numbers have not produced the local programming and the immediacy that was intended of them when the Government first handed out licences.

I looked recently, more or less at random at this one television station in our mid-west. It is the only station in its city, its strongest signal reaches out 18,000 square miles covering 23 counties. These counties have more than 800 governmental bodies, 350 of them with the power to tax including 21 municipalities and 110 school boards. They are served by one station that is supposed to tell them all what they can't find out for themselves and which is important to them.

Now, taking the normal time these stations devoted to news—if each of these governmental bodies made only one decision a week—the station, if it did nothing else in its news could give maximum exposure of eight seconds a week to that decision.

Now, we are specially dependent on local news in the United States which is why we have essentially local and not national papers. We control important functions at the local level—schools, police, probably taxes and neighbourhood design—yet we have lost sight of these decisions partly because there is such a poor fit between our mass media jurisdiction and those jurisdictions by which we live our personal and political lives. This poor fit exists because the forces in the marketplace insist on it.

The paper that does not saturate its circulation area, or a broadcasting station that does not maintain its ratings will soon be hurt, but this is because of the way we finance our media and the way we use our technology and all of this is aggravated by mergers and chains. These things will not go away easily. We will have large monopoly newspapers in our communities, and it seems to me that the existence of this we have to think of as mechanisms that bring our mass media close to the people.

All of our social institutions, at least in the United States, are now being challenged by people who say they want to be part of the action; people want to be heard. Universities, political groups, and companies are being challenged to open up their sources of the intake of popular feeling and to listen to the constituents. And papers and broadcasting stations, it seems to me, cannot escape the given fact that we tend towards monopoly in both of them. We have to invent mechanisms to bring together a mass medium and its constituents.

In the last two or three years I have been part of an effort to establish and study local press councils which are, in effect, committees of cross-sections of communities' representatives who sit down regularly with the publisher of their newspaper or the proprietor of their broadcasting station in their own community. Now, this is different from, let us say, the British Press Council or other national press councils which cover a whole country or whole province.

The local press council is concerned with a single community and the idea is that both parties need to speak to themselves in some way other than the one-way communication of receiving the newspaper on your doorstep every morning and not having a very good method of talking back, or listening to your radio and television and not being able to talk back.

We had a bequest to form a fund for a free and responsible press and with this money, we supported a number of university researchers who created press councils in communities near their campuses.

We had two major rules. One was that this council, which was the selection of members of the community—cross-sections of the community who sit down regularly with the newspaper publisher—that this council should not be the creature of the publisher. He would not select the members of the community who would sit on it; he would not run the meeting—the university person would do that.

The second rule was that the council had no power over the newspaper whatever. It did not remove editorial discretion from the editor, it could not force things into the paper, the only power it had was the power of discussion with the publisher and the editor at these monthly meetings.

We did this in about six communities throughout the country. We hope to publish a book about it later this year with more detailed results, but roughly we found some interesting things. Some of them were obvious, but I think obvious things that need to be moved and need to be experienced.

First of all it turned out that publishers don't know their community very well. After all, they are substantial businessmen in their communities. They tend to belong to the clubs with the president of the bank and the heads of insurance companies and the heads of factories in the towns, and in their normal social lives they meet people pretty much like themselves. This is perfectly human but it is not necessarily the best way to find out what is going on in your total community.

So when they sat down with the community representatives they got to know each other. We found it useful, incidentally, that there be a dinner meeting preceded by cocktails—it made sometimes for fireworks but it also made for candor and insight. We found out that many things were going on in the community which the publisher didn't know. Not because, in most cases, the publisher was stupid or evil, but because in the normal course of events, a busy businessman doesn't have time to go out into all the nooks and crannies of his community. Yet this is frequently precisely the parts of his community that he needs most to know about. He found things out, he found out that there were important news stories that he wasn't getting, and he would find out that the news stories that they ran were incorrect.

I attended one of these meetings on the west coast where one of the community representatives was a labour union official and he brought up at this monthly meeting the fact that the newspaper publisher had a story in his paper about a fight within the union. The publisher began being very defensive about it and the labour union representative said "No, I am complaining about the fact that it was much worse than you found out, and the reason is that you call the secretary-treasurer of the union every time and he doesn't tell you the truth." So the publishers found out a great deal that they hadn't known about before.

The other thing that came up is also obvious but I think necessary to experience. That is that community people didn't understand the newspapers very well. It turns out, as you Senators know perhaps better than anyone, that when you are involved in a conflicting situation, it is going to be very difficult to get all parties to the conflict to decide what is a fair report and most people who are in conflicting situations don't really want a detached report—they want support. They want advocacy and they go to the newspaper and say "You reported this other fellow saying this, but that is a lie, you should have known that," and both sides say the same thing, but if you get them together in the same room they argue with each other. It becomes obvious to them—this is frequently the case—that the newspaper in fact cannot satisfy everybody.

Some of our worst newspapers are the ones who try to satisfy everybody. There is such a thing as a detached observer. He is frequently wrong, he is frequently biased. The fact is this is not always the case and he is detached in ways that the people involved in a news situation are not. It is very therapeutic to bring them together regularly in order for them to see that this is a problem in which one should not expect complete dissatisfaction, but at the most fairness and remedy of errors.

These local councils, we felt, were extremely successful. We ran out of money after a year as we had planned to. We were a responsible foundation and that is to say we thought our obligation was to spend ourselves out of existence; but many of the publishers decided to carry it on at their own expense because they found it so useful.

Now, of course this is quite different from a national council such as the British Press Council which has to cover a very large number of papers. You can't possibly put in the same room, all of the papers and all of the publishers and cross-sections of the communities. It therefore ends up as a different kind of function which is partly to be a complaint bureau (which is very necessary) and partly to be a sampler of performance—picking out places maybe at random or maybe because some situation presents itself.

But, reporting to the whole country therefore, saying here are the complaints we have received, here is how much we thought they were justified, here is a sampling of the performance of our press and this is what we think they have done in this last year—that is quite a different thing. I think both are very necessary and very useful.

There are problems, of course, involved in doing this, but I think that the dangers of not doing it are much greater. The dangers are that the mass media will become detached from the mass, that they will cease to be responsive, that the burden of operating large corporations, and the natural social environment of a man who has to do that, will separate him from the people he is trying to serve.

Therefore, I think it is important that we do find mechanisms by which our mass media can retain their independence. I think editors have to be free to report, reporters have to be free to report as they think is most fair and wise, but I think they have to be open to criticism and open to remedy when there is demonstrable error and we don't have enough mechanisms for that now.

Since our mass media are getting larger and larger and covering larger and larger constituencies I think that we, in a long term way, have to consider whether we want them so large to begin with. Our present technology rewards and demands bigness. Newspaper plants are expensive to build and operate and once they are in operation, naturally they benefit by mass production. Broadcasting through the air with powerful transmitters places each station in direct competition with each other station and that results in competing for the same kind of programming, and that produces uniformity.

But we are just now entering a period of change in technology, and if we are wise, we may gain control through technical developments of some of the immediacy and community service that stopped when we no longer lived and worked in the villages.

Cable television will become common in this decade and new printing technologies will change the cost and patterns of newspapers. Now, in Canada you already have cities that are more advanced in cable than any place else in the world, but every developed country will have it shortly. Our present cables are being laid down in communities with 20 channels. In one community in the United States there is a cable system being laid down with 42 channels. This is quite easily multiplied by electronic means into an era of 180 channels, and the possibilities of programming are exciting and very broad. However, these won't happen automatically.

Printing, similarly, may make it possible to publish small papers in small places where it is not economical now. In general we need to scale our mass media down to a human size but this requires public policies and corporate policies that do not exist now. This means tax laws, this means regulation of broadcasting, it means some examination of advertising policies which is what really forms our mass media. In the United States, for example, we need to do non-commercial broadcasting on a respectable scale, instead of on the pittance we now do it on; and we have to have provisions for both national and regional networks as well as low power local stations to serve their own communities.

We are all on the threshold of this new technology of cables, communications satellites, computers and new home appliances, and this will transform the cultural and informational lives in the next 20 years. But we ought not make the mistake of letting the machines and the corporate imperatives that drive them, produce another commercialized culture such as we have inherited. We know enough about technology and we know enough about our social needs to design the machines for human and social purposes and not the other way around. Our present culture is an accident; an accident driven by the imperative to sell the maximum number of goods to the most people at the lowest cost and this has resulted in an evolution that is wildly out of control for short term gains.

Let me conclude with just one example. It appears that the first radio commercial was broadcast on August 28, 1922, when the American Telephone and Telegraph Company advertised itself on its own radio station in New York City. Apparently this offended everyone—even A. T. & T. which forbade any other station to broadcast commercials on pain of losing their telephone service. Even the National Association of Broadcasters thought that a commercial in the evening was specially crude because it contaminated the family hours. A few years later Herbert Hoover, who was later to become our President, but then was Secretary of Commerce, and then as later not one of our more strident radicals, said that blatant commercials were inconceivable. And he said about commercials in broadcasting "It is inconceivable that we could allow so great a possibility for service, for news, for entertainment, for education and for vital commercial purposes to be drowned in advertising chatter."

The moral I draw from that is that what seems inconceivable today may through corporate and public policy be incorrigible tomorrow.

Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: Thank you very much, Mr. Bagdikian. There are so many areas to dig in and ask you questions about, but I suppose the one which tempts us to begin is the Press Council. It is so tempting that I think I will begin with something else.

I thought I spotted, if not a contradiction in your remarks, one thing which I found that I couldn't quite understand. It was the reference you were making to the enormous political power of the media, and you indicated that the editorial advice offered by the media has been consistently rejected in the United States—the papers being overwhelmingly Republican, and the Democrats being mostly successful. But at the same time you attributed this success to the news coverage or news play, if I can use that description, which the media gave the politicians. By that standard could the media have achieved that editorial objective on the advice they were offering, if they had treated the thing differently on the news pages? Do you follow the question?

Mr. Bagdikian: Yes I do, Senator. I think that is true and I think they did. They wrote editorials denouncing most administrations and denouncing social security, and things of this sort, and people didn't pay much attention to it and so I think in this they were not very persuasive. The thing I meant when I referred to the fact that they have the power of deciding which issues become public issues, is that we really get concerned with an issue as we hear about it and read about it in the news columns, on the newscasts on television, and on documentaries—and that decision is still within their power.

The Chairman: The point I was making, sir, was would it not then have been possible for them to focus on other issues which might have elected the people whom they were proposing?

Mr. Bagdikian: Yes, and I think there was a great deal of this. I also think this: that despite the very strong opinions of publishers and broadcasting proprietors, there is a very substantial degree of professionalism in journalism, so that we are not confronted with our own versions of stories which tell things which are only perpetuating official dogma. We do have professionalism, journalistic professionalism and in all justice many of the same proprietors, who are very rigid and dogmatic in their editorial opinions, accept the need for professionalism and the exposure of ideas that they differ with.

Now, I think this acceptance has been growing. I think it is perfectly true that many urgent social issues have not been presented with the kind of care and space that they deserve because of the perceptions of the proprietors of the newspapers and the broadcasting stations. But, nevertheless, there has never been an iron curtain. That combination of journalistic professionalism plus the acceptance of some obligation to permit the publication of news with which you disagree, does occur. I think it doesn't happen enough but there is no question it does occur. So that if they wanted to be completely dogmatic, they could have kept silent about issues that they didn't like, but they aren't completely dogmatic—they accept a degree of professionalism. I think this is an increasing degree.

The Chairman: Is the Establishment controlling the press in America?

Mr. Bagdikian: Well, there are many establishments and it depends to whom you speak. Our vice-president seems to think that the Establishment resides in New York and Washington and that there is a kind of national warfare that goes on between one side of the Appalachians and the other.

I wouldn't be completely honest if I didn't say that there are some newspapers and newspaper organizations which are profoundly influenced and influential on the rest of journalism. There is no question that the New York Times is read by more individual journalists around the country and taken as a cue than other papers. There is no question that the Washington Post is read by policymakers in Washington and therefore has a disproportionate influence on national policy. So in that sense there is an Establishment, but there isn't an Establishment in the sense that there is any kind of organized or explicit agreement among all publishers because there are too many of them. There are, after all, 1,750 daily newspapers in the United States and something like 8,000 weeklies.

The Chairman: You mentioned 35 people controlling something like 53 per cent of the circulation, and you talked about the influence they have on 40 million American homes. Are those 35 people all the same kind of people?

Mr. Bagdikian: No they are not. As a matter of fact, as I hope I hinted at at any rate, it isn't necessarily 35 people. There is not one man with his hand on a knob turning public opinion. There are hierarchies of professional journalists and of managers who make decisions but in the end it is typical in a newspaper that one man makes an ultimate decision on who these people will be and what the scope of their operations will be. So there are 35 organizations that control what 40 million households see as their printed news every day. Now, they are not all the same kind of person.

Some of the best journalism is done by people working in chains and there is a vast difference among them in devotion to fairness and broadness. I wouldn't want to give the impression that the operators of chains and conglomerates are inherently evil, or that they must be. That is not so. Some of the most responsible journalism is done by people who have monopolies because they don't have to worry about the competition. If you worry about the competition, you have to put out a headline that catches the reader's eye before another headline, and if you are working on a story then you have to publish it right away—you may not get it right but you get it written.

The Chairman: Is that true of the Washington Post and the New York Times?

Mr. Bagdikian: That we watch each other?

The Chairman: No, that you have to look to the headline to sell papers?

Mr. Bagdikian: No, because what is happening in the United States is that there are fewer and fewer newspapers sold on newsstands where the headlines are important. More and more are delivered to the homes by subscriptions—I think there are 80 per cent of the American households that take a daily paper and something like 65 per cent that get delivery to their home.

The Chairman: Is that an on-going trend?

Mr. Bagdikian: Yes, and it is increasing. Fewer and fewer newspapers are sold by people who notice the headlines and most of them are delivered to the homes, so that the headline isn't terribly important. That is not why you buy the paper—it isn't competing with any other paper you see at the time. That is one reason that headlines are declining, and another is the fact that the audience is getting more sophisticated. They aren't fooled any more by the great big two inch headlines about a dog getting run over on the street, or something of that nature.

The Chairman: I want to turn to some of the Senators, but I wonder if I might ask you just one other question for now.

We have had evidence here from publishers, communicators, and others, that the working press tends to be liberal with a small "l", because Liberal with a big "L" is a political party here as I am sure you know; but the working press tends to be small "l" liberal. Would you agree with that generalization?

Mr. Bagdikian: I think that is true. At least in the United States it is true. There have been sociological studies of who is in the Democratic party, which tends to be a liberal party with a small "l", and the Republican party which tends to be a conservative party, and the characteristics would show up people who tend to be liberal, Democrat. These are people who have gone to college, who have professional occupations, and so forth, and certain income levels, and this is the population group from which reporters come. So that it is a reflection, I think, of the part of the population from which they have been drawn and the role they have. There is an interesting tension with proprietors who are overwhelmingly the conservative and Republican. This is one reason why there has been, I think, a development of professionalism, a standard by which judgment can be made on something other than personal opinion. I think it is true that most working journalists in the United States tend to be liberal and most of their publishers tend to be conservative. But, as I say, the standards of professionalism do have some effect.

The Chairman: Senator McElman?

Senator McElman: Mr. Bagdikian, you suggested earlier that in a seller-buyer situation, often the media passes on to another of similar thoughts or philosophy. I have heard it suggested that this is one of the principal reasons for the terrific unrest in your country in certain areas of society, and that this was a factor in their not recognizing and reporting to the public soon enough the problems of the black American, the ghettos, and other problems. Do you subscribe to this opinion?

Mr. Bagdikian: I think this has had an effect, but I think that could be exaggerated because the causes of this unrest really go much deeper than that. I think newspapers are like all our institutions and have not become sensitive enough to changed conditions and changed attitudes. Part of this was because, of course, they were established and because owners of newspapers tended to be of the same social outlook and to perpetuate ownership in that same condition, but not entirely.

Reporters were at fault too—partly because they were restrained, perhaps, by their management, but also because they were overwhelmingly middle-class white. So the professional reporter, I think, shares some of the blame for this, for being insensitive to changed social conditions in this community. I think both share. I think it is an important factor that management of newspapers—like management of most large corporate activities—have not been very close to the constituents they deal with. But I think probably in the case of newspapers no worse than managers of banks and insurance companies.

Now, the obligation on them to be closer is much greater, of course, because that is the business they are in and in that sense, yes, they are much more guilty than let us say the president of a bank who doesn't realize what is going on in the ghettos in the cities. But I think that the causes of this unrest—the other causes are much greater. I think this is an important one and one that certainly professional journalists and corporate journalists have to pay a great deal of attention to, but I don't think it was the main cause.

Senator McElman: It wasn't a lack of crusading spirit?

Mr. Bagdikian: Yes, I think so. But I must say that I can't blame it all on proprietors. That is a bias I have and I am perfectly willing to do admit that. But I have had the personal experience, during the late fifties and early sixties, of doing some reporting in our south where there are many racial problems, of going into a southern city and going to the newspaper and talking to the publisher or editor and then talking to the reporters who had immediate responsibilities for these areas, and typically none of them really understood what was going on in their communities.

Now, not because they weren't as smart as I was, but because they had lived there and they had become used to the landscape and hadn't noticed change, whereas I had gone in there looking for change. But I must say that there was a large area of ignorance and insensitivity among professional journalists as well as among their employers.

Senator McElman: Well, now that the problems are well recognized, not only by your mass media but by the populace at large, in your view are the media—the leading elements of it—doing a responsible job in leading public opinion toward solutions of those problems, or do they tend towards sensationalism of events?

Mr. Bagdikian: I think in the case of sensationalism, no, and in some ways they are swaying in the opposite direction. They went through a period of sensationalism because as a matter of fact these conflicts were a sensation, and it drew everybody's attention and they fixed their attention on that for a very long period of time, and frequently in a disproportionate way on those things which were most wild and written with conflict.

And then there came a consciousness that by being present, journalists could in fact themselves provoke conflict. You know, when a television camera comes in an exciting situation, people are energized by it and they do things which they might not do otherwise, when a camera man shows up or a reporter with his pencil and pad. We are also now in a period of shifting the other way, partly out of a consciousness that we can influence the events that we report by the mere fact of reporting them, but also the way in which we report them; and being frightened, some frightening things have resulted. And this is in conflict with our professional obligation to report what goes on no matter how unpleasant it is, and even though you might think, "If I report this it might provoke trouble".

Now, we are, I think, in a condition of backing away from that kind of reporting, partly because we are conscious of these things, and we are doubly careful not to unfairly or unrealistically provoke violence, but also because the press was in fact involved in reportage of severe social change.

So that the press in the United States, and broadcasting, are under increasing pressure because they report disturbing social conditions. And there is what is for me a disturbing body of opinion that says—and among them some of our officials—which says that if you said nothing about it it would all go away. And that is the opposite side of the other coin, which is that because you say something about it you create it, which is possible. So that in answer to your question, I think we are now entering an area in which we may bear to the other side of under-reporting disturbances, under-reporting violence, under-reporting disturbing social situations because we don't want to create explosions, and because we are under fire for being a party to these things.

Senator McElman: Is this move in your media particularly your print media, your daily newspapers, away from the area of the immediate objective reporting towards the reporting of greater in-depth reporting? More of what we hear called the magazine type of reporting?

Mr. Bagdikian: Yes.

Senator McElman: Is this developing?

Mr. Bagdikian: Yes it is, and I think...

Senator McElman: Is this a good trend?

Mr. Bagdikian: I think it is a good trend. I think we can never abandon the reporting of immediate events because none of us is wise enough to know at any given moment which events are really going to result in something important and which are not. We don't want to be too much philosopher kings in screening out things that we don't understand at the moment, partly because our audience is much more sophisticated than ever before, partly because they have other sources of information—textbooks, they travel—and partly because we, ourselves, are a little smarter than we used to be about these things. And I must confess, partly because we have more monopolies, and therefore are more secure. We can take the time and develop things in more depth and not be so fearful that our competitor will be out on the street with a great splashy story and overwhelm us. Yes, I think throughout all journalism in the United States there is a very definite trend toward more in-depth reporting and interpretation, partly because we need it more because there is too much information and we can't absorb all the facts that there are, and somebody has to help us to determine which things are important and which are not, and which things will have consequences to the future and which will not. But also because in the American press particularly we have been very rigidly devoted to what we call the doctrine of objectivity of reporting facts without any personal opinion interpretation. This is a very useful discipline, but it also can be misleading because not all facts have the same meaning.

In the early 1950s Senator Joseph McCarthy used to step out of a hearing room and say "Inside the room this went on," and newspapers thought they were doing their readers a service by reporting what it was he said and nothing else, as if all information was equally valid. Well, we take more and more responsibility for that, and so that is happening. But it is a very difficult territory because you are then depending on the man who tell you to pass his judgment on what is important and what is not. I am not terribly concerned with that because I think we are a better educated and have other sources of information with which to test what we read about.

Senator McElman: This trend then toward greater in-depth reporting of the news and backgrounding it—is this calling for a different type of journalist? Is the role changing, there a higher calibre required and is that higher calibre developing?

Mr. Bagdikian: Yes, to both those questions. It requires a different kind of person and we are getting a different kind of person. Thirty years ago—if I may use a personal example...

The Chairman: By all means.

Mr. Bagdikian: I began my career as a newspaper reporter in 1941 for a paper in Massachusetts and it was quite evident at the very beginning that I should conceal the fact that I had a college degree because it would go very hard against me. Another fellow who joined the paper at the same time also had a college degree and he made the mistake—and this is where I learned my lesson—of asking the city editor if he could cover a conference of bankers because he had a degree in economics, and the city editor blew up and said "I can't ever have you cover any business affairs" because he genuinely believed that if you had a degree in economics this would hopelessly damage the man's judgment. There was a great deal of anti-intellectualism in the press before because a great deal of the material of the press was crime, the service of politics,—the most flamboyant part of politics—and it took a person who was quick, aggressive and had an eye for the flamboyant, and that is quite different now. So in answer to your question it does require a different kind of person and we are getting it. Our job is to keep them satisfied. The Washington Post has about 20 summer interns a year, juniors in college who want to try out to be newspaper people and whom we want to look at. It had 750 applications—we interviewed about 150 people—the editors themselves went out and talked to them—another editor and I talked to about 37 of them in Boston one weekend. They had astronomical intellectual ratings according to their College Board scores. Three of them had 800 which is the absolute impossible maximum, but they were not only just intellectually acute—they were involved politically, socially, and this creates problems because we asked each and every one of them "When was the last time you marched in a demonstration?" And out of the 7 only three had not marched. And then our question was—and this is what comes when you have active, intelligent, highly motivated people—our question was "How can you separate your role as a journalistic observer from your role as an activist—how can you report something of which you yourself are a part—what if on your day off you were part of a moratorium anti-war march and you went down to the police station demanding a parade permit from the police, who did not give it to you, and the next day as a reporter you go down and say, "What are you doing about that parade permit for the marchers?" How can you expect the sergeant to think that you are a detached observer?" It is a very difficult question because their reply generally was, "Well, in addition to being a reporter I am also a citizen and I have an obligation to my country that I think is very important." So we are getting the benefit of some of the brightest—thank God—for some of the brightest young people in the country, and this is for the first time, I think, in the last five or ten years, but we have to struggle with the fact that we are asking them, even though they are highly motivated and moved by events which, is why they want to be journalists—they have to adopt a discipline that will not only give them a detachment but have them be seen as being fair. We don't really ask them to be inhuman—we ask them to be fair and to be critical of their own reactions. Yes, we are getting a higher calibre person than has ever entered journalism before. It is making for some problems—they come in with their buttons and we make them take them off when they go out on a story, but that we struggle with. Yes, we are getting a new kind of journalist.

Senator McElman: Well, in addition to the new kind of journalist do the media find that they are turning more and more as well to the academic community, professional community for part time efforts, part time contributions?

Mr. Bagdikian: Yes. I think that the relations between the major newspapers and broadcasters and the academic community are much closer than they ever were before. They aren't as close as they ought to be because when you get to the smaller paper this is rare but in the larger organizations yes, this is true. Partly again because most journalists are now college graduates, so they don't have the same kind of hostility and fear for the academic community. As a matter of fact sometimes I think the academic community is falling behind, that some of the better journalists are much more inquiring and innovative, but that is only half true of course. Yes, the relationship is much closer and also in another way—the contribution of people in the academic community, direct personal contributions, articles, being consulted on areas in which they are expert, is happening more and more. In addition to that, more and more journalistic organizations have mid-career projects for their people who will maybe take six months off, or a year, and go to university. There are not enough, but still quite a number. We have the Nieman Fellowship at Harvard, a similar fellowship at Stanford University, and there are many specialized two, or three, or four year courses at universities. So that a reporter who is going to specialize, say, in urban affairs is detached by his paper for three or four months—he studies the course with urbanologists. He may go around the country talking to city planners and then he goes back to his paper with this kind of background. These ties are increasing and I think it is quite productive.

Senator McElman: Mr. Chairman, I have only one other question at the moment. You spoke of the cable systems and that one currently being installed in an American city will have 42 channels. Do you know how they propose to fill those channels—are they going to do it with the standard type of TV stations which now exist or do they have a specialized programming for some of these channels?

Mr. Bagdikian: I don't know. It is in San Jose, California. I hope it is not with all commercial programming, but I don't know the answer to the question. But I do know that in many of the systems that are being installed they are already having transmissions that are not just commercial television or even non-commercial television. In some cases it is a kind of monitoring service to which you have a clock, a wind gauge, a thermometer, and so forth, and others simply have a channel with a camera on a wire service teletype machine so that you can see the news coming up all the time. On others there is a monitoring of public meetings, and then on others there is some commercial but non-journalistic and non-entertainment programming being planned. In New York at least six months ago there was a plan to use part of a cable, for example, to go to doctors so that when a doctor, for example, diagnosed a patient as having diabetes and would ordinarily take an hour out to describe or explain to the patient what it meant to have diabetes and how to deal with it—instead he would talk to the patient and then bring him to a closed circuit television, dials a number to a cable company and they would play an hour-long program on what it is to have diabetes.

This will also be used by drug companies to produce drug advertising to doctors instead of having the salesmen go in person. So there are many ideas on filling these channels. But in the case of the one of San Jose, I don't know what their plans are, but I think it is a good question.

The Chairman: Mr. Fortier?

Mr. Fortier: These increasingly better educated journalists of which you speak Mr. Bagdikian, do they enjoy the same privileges as you did 25 or 30 years ago in being a reporter, or do they have obligations which are not commensurate with the ones that you had?

Mr. Bagdikian: No, I can see no disadvantage. Unlike me they did not take a vow of poverty! They have much freer access—I mean socially and personally with all levels of the community than I had. I don't think that they suffer any disability except that they have more difficult stories to deal with. We don't expect them just to come out with a police story on everything they go out on. We could get away when I started with having the names and addresses correct, and not always that, but we weren't supposed to understand anything, we weren't supposed to deal with complicated subjects. If we went to a conference we just found the most outspoken and loudest person and reported him. Now, this still happens, obviously. But the newer breed, I don't think, suffer great inhibitions except that they are much more socially active than we were. It was much easier for us to take this vow—the priesthood of discipline, of not getting involved in the things you were reporting. But it is not so easy for them. The issues of our time are not that easily set aside. I don't think they give up anything for this. I think it is vastly more exciting. I suppose it is self-criticism, but the better people dropped out of journalism after a while because it was not rewarding. After you have covered the hundredth police story, it gets rather dull. I think that won't be the case now. I think the stories are more challenging so I don't think they give anything up. I think they gain a great deal from this.

Mr. Fortier: The notes which they gather today and the pictures they maintain, the photographs which they may take—how personal to themselves or to the newspapers for which they work, how privileged can they become? Is there not a recent history in the United States of reporters being called upon by law enforcement agencies to assist in criminal investigations?

Mr. Bagdikian: Yes. That is a very serious problem in the United States and getting worse.

Mr. Fortier: I wonder if you could expand on that somewhat for the benefit of the committee?

Mr. Bagdikian: Well, traditionally of course the newspaperman or a journalist and his source—it has been a matter of not legal privilege—I think there are 12 states in which there is some statutory protection, but in most cases there is not. But as a matter of tradition and practice, a journalist who gives his word that he will not disclose his sources of information, and does, suffers in the eyes of his colleagues and, of course, he suffers in the eyes of his sources. It is considered not only bad form, but unethical to disclose any source whom you have promised to keep confidential. And this has gone to the point where newspapermen have been ordered in court to disclose them and have not, and some of them sometimes have gone to jail. This is accepted within the trade and it is even accepted as a gesture officially, although you may be punished for it, but something new has happened. Incidentally it was also accepted in this way: occasionally a reporter will come and say "I know such and such a thing will happen and I know it from a very good source." And his editor will say "What is the source because we will not run the story unless we have reason to believe it is factual?" And if it is a senior man he will say "I can't tell you." And you then have to trust him. But if it is a junior man you might say "Well, I won't run the story unless you tell me." And then he may say "Well, I can't tell you" and it is agreed that you don't run the story. This is the kind of atmosphere that exists. Great care on the protection of confidentiality—not just because it makes for more comfortable journalism, but because a great deal of news is not possible otherwise. Policy in government always operates like photographic film—it develops best in the dark—and policy-makers don't like to have rays of light coming in, and yet if there is never any disclosure of policy formation, the citizen gets a fait accompli and it is too late for him to change. I think this is quite legitimately important to journalism because in the United States we are going through very turbulent times with a great deal of demonstration, agitations and revolutionary activities, and because many people are frightened and because law enforcement officials and governmental officials are in the business of prosecuting illegal activities and conspiracies for illegal activities. Much of this information is concealed from them by radicals and by revolutionaries and yet this activity is some of the more important news of the day, which means that journalists hear the radicals, attend meetings of revolutionary groups, they do articles on what these groups are thinking and saying, they attend meetings and demonstrations in which destruction and illegal activities occur, and then the authorities will say "All right, we are thinking of indicting this group for an illegal act and you were present at a meeting in which they discussed this—give me all of your notes and tell us what they said"...

Mr. Fortier: What has been the reaction?

Mr. Bagdikian: The overwhelming reaction of working as journalists is to decline. Most managements have supported them in a sense that most managements will not turn over upon demand the material which has not been published. For example, if there is a large demonstration in Washington our photographers may take many thousands of photographs of which maybe four or five are printed. Later on, let us say, there is a riot or an attack on an embassy, or something like that, and the law enforcement authorities will come with a subpoena and say, "We want all of your negatives." Well, on the surface to the law enforcement agency this looks like a legitimate request. We are citizens, we have been witness to what might be a crime, and we are being asked to co-operate with the authorities. They don't understand very often why we will say "No, we won't. We will give you the prints of what we publish, but we don't want to turn over our files." Of course we don't because to do so systematically is to become an instrument of the authorities and to do so makes you seem as an instrument of authority and already we are being told by people whose meetings we are attending, sometimes in jest and sometimes not in jest, "You are getting paid by the FBI today", and this sometimes extends to PTA meetings. So that already some of the public is seeing the press as an agent of the law enforcement authorities because later the authorities may subpoena their material and this of course is destructive of reporting. It does create a difficult problem for many reporters who don't want to fail to co-operate in the prosecution of a crime. It is a serious problem and I think in the end journalists must not become instruments of government and one of the minor reasons is that frequently the confidential source they don't want to disclose is the government itself.

I talked to one reporter who said, "I hope they don't subpoena all my records because some of them are from FBI agents."

Mr. Fortier: Was any such case carried to its legal conclusion?

Mr. Bagdikian: No, but I would be surprised if it were not within the next year or so. Well, it has been carried to the legal conclusion in a sense that some reporters have gone to jail in recent years. What happens is there is a confrontation and one side or the other backs down. Usually the law enforcement agency backs down but sometimes not. There have been reporters who have gone to jail for refusing to disclose their sources and this is now very much an issue in the United States with the newspapers and broadcasters and their working reporters trying to work out some arrangements which will protect their confidential files, protect their image in the public as not being law enforcement agents and somehow not go to jail in very large numbers.

Mr. Fortier: You have indicated that by and large your reporters have the vocal support of the publishers. Is that correct?

Mr. Bagdikian: It varies. My impression is that working reporters are much more firm about this than management, partly because management has the advice of lawyers and the lawyers almost universally say in the end there is no law that will protect you from going to jail. And since the lawyer's job is seen by him anyway to keep you out of jail, he says don't go to jail.

The reporter is not as well advised as this—he knows about this and he is told about this, but he is of course the man who is at the point of this and while it remains to be seen how strongly he feels about it, how many will go to jail, in a general my impression is that the reporters are much more doctrinaire about not submitting information to the authorities than are the management. The management generally have the better organization and take the view "Let's sit down with the authorities, explain to them why we won't and see how important it is to them that they have this material." It frequently turns out that it is not terribly important. The fact is that the authorities usually send out their own cameramen masquerading as newspapermen, but they aren't very good cameramen. They put the settings wrong, they forget to take the lens cap off the camera, and then they come to the newspaper and want the pictures. But in general I think that this is a serious problem and one which we will hear a great deal about.

Mr. Fortier: Would you be in favour of legislation which would give a special protection for the reporter's sources?

Mr. Bagdikian: No, I have an irrational position on this. My irrational position is that wherever possible journalists should not ask for special privileges, and where in this case in effect they are asking for a special privilege which is to say to practise civil disobedience...

Mr. Fortier: Yes.

Mr. Bagdikian: They should be prepared to go to jail. That is a very brave thing to say in this room but I think in the end that is what it comes down to. I would not want to see entrenched privilege for journalists which are not available to other people.

The Chairman: Senator McElman?

Senator McElman: In these circumstances would there not be an additional concern by management as well, the journalist, and publisher, and so on, that if it became known that they were turning over information wholesale that when there were marches and demonstrations, violent and otherwise, that they would find themselves roughed up, and cameras broken, and so on? Isn't that one of the primary concerns?

Mr. Bagdikian: Yes it is.

Senator McElman: The concern?

Mr. Bagdikian: It is a concern and that has already happened. Newspapermen have been attacked because they either have been suspected of being law enforcement agents in disguise, or people who are going to get evidence which later will fall into the hands of law enforcement agencies.

The Chairman: Mr. Spears?

Mr. Spears: Well, a couple of questions arising out of a few things that Mr. Bagdikian has said. You said a little while ago, Mr. Bagdikian, that the American audience by and large is much more sophisticated and discriminating than it has ever been before. I would like to ask you how do you reconcile this for example with the lowest-common-denominator level of TV programming, which you deplore?

Mr. Bagdikian: I don't think that they are contradictory although I don't know why they are not contradictory. That is to say I think they are more sophisticated and better educated and I think they are generally addicted to things I deplore on television. There are surveys which show that college professors like Gunsmoke to the same degree as people who have never finished high school. At the same time, the most careful survey I have seen shows that watching of television declines proportionately with education, so that I think that while college professors apparently like to see Bonanza or Gunsmoke, the fact is they don't look at television as much as other people, and this is probably for a number of reasons. Don't forget that really television is the first universal mass medium we have ever had. You don't have to know the written language, you don't have to know the spoken language. It is almost universal in the United States—97 per cent of the households—as a matter of fact, statistics show that there is slightly more television than electricity—so that it is almost universal. So it is a medium which encompasses parts of the population that we have never before thought of as being part of the communications picture. We have never thought, for example, of the less educated, the lowest educated 30 per cent of the population as being in audience for our newspapers and magazines. Radio somewhat, and television does.

So that both in the mass media and in our educational systems much of the low quality performance which we are inclined to attribute to personal performance and a degradation of personal performance I think is in fact not a degradation at all, but inclusion in the process of people who were totally out of it before. The person who did not read very well in the fifth grade, never even went to the fifth grade, who never even was taught reading, the person who watches the television six and a half hours a day which I see is the national average in the United States—I am sorry, I am falling into the semantic trap of the broadcasters. The statistics they have show that the average household has a television set turned on six and a half hours a day which is very different from watching one six and a half hours a day. But at any rate here is an exposure of an almost total population, from infancy, which was never before included in communications.

Also there is this other thing—I think the fall-off of television viewing as you get higher education isn't altogether the fact that while we are so sophisticated we deplore the low level on television so we don't watch it—it is partly that undoubtedly. But it is also because as you get more educated, or if you get in a more responsible occupation, you find yourself busy during the prime viewing hours. You are attending meetings, you are attending hearings like this, you are having business dinners, so you aren't there for the six o'clock news, and then you go back at 11.30 p.m. and it is too late to catch the news and you are pretty tired so you don't watch.

Senator McElman: You sure are describing this committee!

Mr. Bagdikian: I trust that these hearings have some benefit. It keeps you from evil ways! I think that the low level of television is partly that. Then the other thing is that because advertising is placed on commercial television on the basis of sheer numbers and because our broadcasting stations are powerful and cover fairly large areas, the winner in this game tends to be the one with the biggest number.

If there should be cultivated people like you and me who watch not Bonanza but let's say Gunsmoke instead, and there are half a million people who, say, watch Gunsmoke, and let's say 20,000 people who watch some other programming—minority interest programming—the way they detect this in order to sell advertising is to do a sampling survey, sometimes by telephone and sometimes by having a meter on the television set or sometimes by asking a certain number of people to keep a diary, but they do this only by sampling. One sampling, for example, of the entire City of New York which has 8 million inhabitants is done by 36 phone calls. Now, this is perfectly defensible as a sample of the whole population, but you will never discover the audience of 20,000 or 50,000 this way. To discover that audience you have to do very intense sampling and that is more expensive than you can afford if you are broadcasting to a small audience. It seems to me that one of the advantages of cable is that it is a wire going to the home, it will be definite which home is listening to what program at what time, and at that moment minority programming becomes possible; then we will get a better picture...

Mr. Spears: It will become salable?

Mr. Bagdikian: It will become salable, because you can prove the audience in the same way that a specialized magazine can prove its audience, by the people who do the buying, and they can prove the delivery. So I think that the combination of including the whole population which is getting sophisticated with television, plus the fact that we have no mechanism for identifying the audiences—that explains the fact that we have such a low average on television. But, nevertheless, great popularity.

The Chairman: You have a second question, Mr. Spears?

Mr. Spears: Well, I don't want to keep the Senators away from their television sets. There was one other thing Mr. Bagdikian was talking about...

The Chairman: There are a lot of other things.

Mr. Spears: Yes, a lot of other things. But just one other question. You talk about the growing size and the growing remoteness of the newspapers, particularly, from their communities. The phrase you used was that we must scale the media down to human size, which struck me as a very desirable objective. With the new technology, for example, is there a possibility of more smaller, closer to the community newspapers being established? Do you see that happening?

Mr. Bagdikian: Yes, I think it is already happening. It is happening for example with weekly papers, the small offset papers. The young people who have $10,000 or $5,000 begin a paper in a small town because they don't have to buy a big plant and they can go to a job contractor and do it—it is happening with the underground press. The kids have learned that they can put together all kinds of wild things that they can't get published elsewhere and they put it out by going to a contractor without running a big plant. So I think the technology is supporting that.

I think the technology will continue to develop but I still think it is an open question whether it will be put to use in this way; that is, serving particular needs and particular communities, unless we make it easy for people to do this. I think that it is very easy for a large organization to blanket an area and to make it almost impossible for a newcomer to start, but the cost of small papers is going down,—and at that time this will not be so unequal a battle. And I am told that the fastest growing newspapers in the United States are the suburban newspapers. On the whole they aren't very good newspapers because they respond as much to local advertising as they do to the local and social political needs. I am hoping they will evolve into serving this also. I think that is already happening and I think it is very important that it should.

In addition to that, I think large papers will find it possible to publish highly localized editions which they cannot do now. The central printing plant now is a very cumbersome factor and there is no good substitute for it, but I think we are approaching the stage in time and technology where it might be possible for big papers to publish highly localized editions in small towns.

The Chairman: Senator Petten?

Senator Petten: Mr. Bagdikian, you mentioned that DuPont of Delaware were considering selling their papers. Did they in fact get rid of them?

Mr. Bagdikian: No, and the consideration was purely a tentative internal one, or speculative one. They were under some criticism because they were suspected by evil-minded persons, including myself, of using their papers to benefit the corporation, which they quite honestly admitted and they didn't see anything wrong with it. It bothered some people on the corporation that the criticism of their newspapers might hurt the corporation and therefore they ought to consider divesting themselves of the papers. It was just internal speculation without, I think ever getting to the point of actively pursuing it. There were memorandums exchanged in which the most important point was if they did they should sell it to someone who had the same views as they did. And then also have it part of this agreement that if the buyer ever sold it again they would have to offer it back first so that a third buyer would not be of a different viewpoint. So, so far as know it never reached the point of actively trying to sell it.

Senator Petten: It was because of the conglomerate interests that they got a little concerned about it?

Mr. Bagdikian: Yes, that is right.

The Chairman: Mr. Bagdikian, several of our colleagues have other commitments and therefore time is becoming of the essence. I therefore propose to put to you only three other questions. I think some of us would like to keep you here until one o'clock in the morning, but unhappily that can't be the case.

First of all, if I may, on press councils—the whole press council concept is one which is of great interest to this committee. We have heard a great deal about it from publishers who have been before the committee about national press councils and local press councils. If, sir, you have any information which you could supply the committee, information certainly which we could return, we would be most interested. I would be delighted to know when the book is coming out?

Perhaps I could just put two questions to you about press councils, or about these local press councils. I am wondering what size these communities were and what some of the communities were in fact, and did these local press councils concern themselves with the newspapers only, or with all media? And was there more than one newspaper in some of these communities?

Mr. Bagdikian: First of all I will be happy to send some articles which are fragments...

The Chairman: We would be terribly grateful. It is perhaps an imposition, but it would be most helpful.

Mr. Bagdikian: No, not at all, senator. And we hope the book will be published later this year.

The Chairman: How much later this year?

Mr. Bagdikian: Probably in the latter part of the year. I will try to get whatever information I can to you. We did not have any general press councils in any very large cities and that is a problem. We had them in small newspaper towns for the most part. They were in Bend, Oregon; Redwood City, California; Carroll, Illinois; Sparta, Wisconsin, and these are relatively small communities...

The Chairman: What would be the biggest?

Mr. Bagdikian: Well I guess Redwood City would be the biggest one.

The Chairman: And how many people would be there?

Mr. Bagdikian: Well I guess Redwood City must be around 100,000. It has only one paper and the council included only the publisher.

Now, we had two other councils that were in larger cities—St. Louis and Seattle, but these were special ones in which all of the media representatives sat down with representatives from the black community. These were specific summer projects with the black communities and even there there was a problem of having a large number of people with differing goals and viewpoints, that when you got three or four television proprietors and two or three radio people and two newspaper publishers sitting down with ten or twelve community representatives, there was chaos. There was creative chaos, a great deal of hostile shouting back and forth, but very useful. It demonstrated the problem we knew we would have in large cities. I don't know if there has been a satisfactory solution. In the larger city there is a problem first of all of many media representatives, then also how do you pretend you can have a manageable group of representatives of let us say half a million people? There are a number of groups in the United States that are wrestling with this problem. I think it is a problem when you get into larger cities with many media representatives. I think it can be solved—one of our failures was in St. Louis where we had half a dozen media people and maybe a dozen representatives from the black community. It failed in the sense that nothing seemed to be organized to get done—there were half a dozen arguments going on at the same time, but it was very useful for everybody involved because what happened after was that they realized that they had to focus on one thing at a time and so at subsequent meetings they would pick one subject and that tended to bring less chaos and people were able to express themselves more coherently.

At the very least it told us that this problem is soluble—you just have to use a different technique when you get into larger cities, but I think it was very important. I think it is very important that you have a third party as a moderator. In our case it was always a university person, a professor of political science, or journalism. But someone who organizes the meeting, who is the honest broker, and who also can focus the meeting because it turns out that even some of the leading representatives of the communities don't know enough about newspapers or broadcasting to really focus on the problem constructively. So that the moderator is also useful in saying "O.K., next week look at this part of the paper and look for this sort of thing. Look at the social pages, for example, as representative of the community or not—well, maybe they had never thought about that before because one of the things you discover of course is that people are educated by their media. If you grow up with one kind of newspaper you accept that as the standard and sometimes it takes an outside voice to give you a new perspective. I think this is soluble, but with the larger communities it is more difficult.

The Chairman: The second of my three questions is a pretty tough question to answer in a few minutes. Would you give us just a word or two with the benefit of your great knowledge about the future of the magazine industry in your country, which I am sure will be relevant—perhaps we will draw our own relevance—but what is the future of the magazine industry in the United States?

Mr. Bagdikian: Well, as one of the rats that swam off the sinking ship—the Saturday Evening Post—I have a little experience with it. I think that television marked the end of the general circulation magazine, mostly for advertising reasons. The general circulation magazine that went out to a broad national population covering most of the reading public was a very efficient advertising medium. You could reach more people at more different times at less cost with this one publication than any other way. Television can do it much more cheaply. It goes to everybody. The exposure per person is much less than any magazine, and I think that is why the Saturday Evening Post failed, Collier's failed, Liberty failed, and I think Look and Life are having troubles. I would be surprised if they are around five years from now. But the specialized magazines are doing very well. That is because broadcasting again can't prove that it reaches a special audience and if you sell carburetors to my son—which everybody does—then you advertise in an automobile magazine, the motor car fan magazine, because you know that it is going there, and the man publishing the magazine can prove that it is going there. You can't do it on television because not only are you broadcasting to my son, but you are also broadcasting to 50 million people who don't care about your product but for whom you are paying.

If I had to guess I would say that the specialized magazine will prosper and the generalized one would wither.

The Chairman: Thank you.

My third question, and unhappily the last question for this evening is this: Is the Washington Post still the most irritating paper in the country today?

Mr. Bagdikian: I find it a splendid publication.

The Chairman: In the publication I quoted from in the beginning you listed qualities of greatness in newspapers in the United States in the 1960s. I read them with great interest and it occurred to me this evening with your presentation that you have demonstrated these very qualities. For the benefit of the Senators, they are authority, comprehensiveness, art, professionalism and a reliable sense of priority. I think in your presentation this evening, for which we are so terribly grateful, you have demonstrated that you possess each one of these qualities. We are particularly pleased because we know it is an imposition to bring someone as busy as you to Ottawa, but I think you can have some idea of how helpful this discussion has been and I am sure I am speaking for the entire committee when I thank you most sincerely.

Mr. Bagdikian: Thank you very much.

The Chairman: May I remind the senators of the timetable for tomorrow. All meetings are in this room. At 10 a.m. we have CFPL Broadcasting Limited and at 11.15 a.m. we have CHSJ Television, Saint John. And at 2.30 tomorrow afternoon Mr. Pierre Berton, author and broadcaster.

Thank you.

SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE ON MASS MEDIA EVIDENCE

OTTAWA, Wednesday, March 25, 1970.

The special Senate Committee on Mass Media met this day at 10.00 a.m.

Senator Keith Davey (Chairman) in the Chair.

The Chairman: Honourable Senators, ladies and gentlemen, this morning marks the final day of gearings prior to the Easter recess. For Senators and others who are interested the Committee returns on the 14th of April for two weeks of sittings, then the hearing phase will be complete.

Meanwhile today we have I think three very worthwhile and interesting witnesses. This afternoon Mr. Pierre Berton, this morning CHSJ Television from Saint John and the brief we are going to turn to now which has been submitted by CFPL Broadcasting Limited. The CFPL team is headed by Mr. Murray Brown who is on my immediate right and who most of the Senators will recognize. Mr. Brown is the president and General Manager of CFPL Broadcasting Limited.

On my immediate left is Mr. C.N. Knight and Mr. Knight is the Station Manager for CFPL Radio.

Sitting next to Mr. Brown is Mr. W. C. Vingrove who is the Station Manager of CFPL Television.

Next to him is the News Director for CFPL Television, Mr. W. R. Laidlaw.

Next to Mr. Laidlaw is Mr. Hugh Bremner, who is the News Editor of CFPL Radio, and then next to Mr. Bremner is Mr. G. A. Whitehead, who is the News Director for CFPL Radio.

And last but by no means least is Mr. G. A.ingle, who is the Program Manager for CFPL Radio.

I should say at once to you Mr. Brown, that we are flattered that you would bring so many members of the team and I am sure their presence will assist the hearing.

Now, you have been here so often before, both as a witness and as an observer that I hardly think it is necessary for me to go through my usual opening statement, so why don't you make your statement and then we still proceed to the questions.

Mr. M. T. Brown, President & General Manager, CFPL Broadcasting Limited: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: I might say we are all mindful that we have dealt with CFPL Broadcasting rather extensively at other hearings and will be mindful of it in our questions.

Mr. Brown: Mr. Chairman, Honourable Senators, I would like to comment first in relation to Senator Davey's remarks about the number of people. I took quite seriously your suggestion which accompanied your initial guidelines indicating that you would like to hear from people actively engaged in news programming, and this is what we have done.

Our time is short this morning regrettably and consequently I will keep my opening remarks very brief.

The Chairman has very ably introduced the members of our group so that saves me this particular chore. I regret very much that Mr. Glen Robitaille, our Director of Engineering is unable to be with us today. As you know from my written brief I indicated that he would be accompanying us. Mr. Robitaille's son died accidentally on Sunday. Mr. Robitaille made a great contribution to the written brief and is highly respected throughout the country by other engineers and it is unfortunate he couldn't be with us because I am sure he could have made a great contribution today.

I think, Mr. Chairman, that it is important to bring to the Committee's attention that we felt it was desirable and in fact even necessary to set out the views of our radio and television people relative to the guideline question in two separate sections of the brief.

Radio and television are quite different media. Each has its own distinguishing characteristics and the peculiar nature of each medium demands a different kpproach to programming. The problem in each medium being quite different, the attitudes of radio and television people can vary quite remarkably. I trust you have found this evident in reading the different approaches taken by our people in answering these questions.

I don't wish to be redundant Mr. Chairman, but I was again going to bring to the attention of the Committee that a great deal about CFPL Broadcasting was made available by Mr. Walter Blackburn, the Chairman of the Board, both in his written submission and in his January appearance before you and you may recall that on pages 2 and 3 of our submission we did list the references to broadcasting which appeared in the Blackburn brief, should the Committee wish to ask any questions relating to these references.

Chapter 2 of our brief deals with the organizational structure of CFPL Broadcasting itself. We felt inclusion of this information would give the Committee a better idea, a better insight into how a broadcasting organization such as CFPL functions by showing the formal lines of authority and responsibility and the number of positions and the number of people required to fill them in order to provide a quality radio and television service. The balance of our brief departs from housekeeping and concentrates primarily on programming. Some of our thoughts about present day AM radio and CFPL radio in particular are put forth in Chapter 3. And in our references to CFPL programming we have placed additional references to our approach to informational or news oriented programming in which we felt the Committee had a special interest.

As a pioneer in frequency modulation broadcasting, we have attempted to draw from our experience in providing some views on FM. Appended to the brief is a copy of our submission made to the Canadian Radio and Television Commission last year commenting on the future of FM broadcasting in Canada.

In concluding Chapter 3 we describe briefly our affiliation with the CBC radio network and the unique experimental arrangement with the network involving both our AM and FM stations. The first part of the following chapter on television deals primarily with our relationship with the CBC television network.

Tables are included to illustrate the total programming mix of our television station, showing the programming by category as originated both by the network and by CFPL-TV. Again, recognizing the Committee's interest in news presentation, we have devoted several pages to the extensive news operations of CFPL Television.

We did not include detailed description of the many varied programs produced by CFPL-TV but we did append to the brief a copy of a comprehensive report on CFPL-TV's local programming activities. This report was prepared originally for the CRTC.

Competition from American television stations through cable television systems obviously gives us much concern. How does CFPL-TV continue to fulfil its obligations under the Broadcasting Act while competing with the free flow of American television programs via cable TV systems which are licensed by the Government of Canada? This paradoxical situation is outlined on pages 39 to 43 of the brief.

In Chapter 5 we present some views regarding the impact of changing technology on the mass media. Specifically we make some observations on the possible influence of the media of the wired city concept as a potential outgrowth of cable TV in its broadest sense. We conclude these observations by expressing our opinion that it is likely only a matter of time until the public will have an almost infinite choice of services available through cable. With proper policies of development, cable systems could do much to provide a useful Canadian material to homes but without careful research and carefully defined policies, uncontrolled development of cable systems could very readily destroy any attempt to utilize additional broadcasting as a means of maintaining and strengthening Canadian identity.

As you anticipated, Mr. Chairman, our brief had been completed at the time of receiving your list of all the supplementary questions. Although we did not provide specific answers in our brief to these supplementary questions we trust that much of the information included in our submission is relevant to these questions. If the Committee has questions to ask based on the supplementary questions, we shall do our best to provide answers.

I hope Mr. Chairman that you and the Honourable Senators will not consider me immodest if I conclude by saying that we are proud of the contribution made by our broadcasting station to the life of Western Ontario. Appended to the brief is a list of national and international awards won by CFPL-TV along with excerpts of unsolicited letters of appreciation received by our radio and television stations. We believe these provide tangible evidence of the regard in which our stations are held both by the community and by the industry.

Thank you very much Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: Thank you very much, Mr. Brown. I believe Senator McElman will start off with our questions this morning.

Senator McElman: First of all Mr. Chairman, I, as one member of the Committee would like to commend CFPL and the London Free Press for the amount of research, time and effort that has obviously gone into the preparation of these detailed and frank submissions. I know, speaking for myself, they have made my work much easier—they are terrific briefs, very good.

The Chairman: The foregoing was an untaped commercial announcement!

Senator McElman: Well, Mr. Chairman, I think it was quite appropriate.

The Chairman: That's fine, we take your point. Carry on.

Senator McElman: You are affiliated with the CBC with both your television and your AM stations?

Mr. Brown: Yes sir.

Senator McElman: How do you find your working arrangement in this affiliation—in programming for instance? Are you able to influence to any degree programming that comes on the network at the time that you are required to carry network programming?

Mr. Brown: Senator McElman, over the years we have had a good working arrangement with the corporation through joint committees established by the CBC. I think the short answer to your question is that the CBC will not change their basic programming approach which they feel is their interpretation of their mandate. However, they can be approached to change scheduling sometimes to make it more convenient for the affiliates. I was on the Affiliate Committee for several years and Mr. Wingrove and Mr. Knight are both on the Committee now. I think I would like to have both of them possibly speak to it now. They are actively involved in this work at the moment.

The Chairman: Mr. Knight?

Mr. C. N. Knight, Station Manager, CFPL-Radio: I don't think we attempt to influence specific programs. I have found, however, through working as a vice-chairman of the Affiliates Committee that the CBC are susceptible to suggestions with respect to the broad affiliates' arrangements and in our particular case they have demonstrated their willingness to seek out different types of arrangements by involving themselves with us in a specific experiment, the details of which are in the brief.

Essentially they are this: We have come up with a formula on an experimental basis under which we present their programming on both AM and FM—the only premise being that we try and select programming which is compatible with what we are doing on those two stations. The experiment has been going on now for a year and a half and I think rather successfully. We have demonstrated by audience surveys that we were able to create a wider CBC presence in our community than we had before. I don't want to prolong the answer, but I think fundamentally the answer is that we find them willing to experiment, willing to listen to suggestions with respect to the broad philosophy of broadcasting.

We haven't frankly attempted to influence them with respect to a framework of a specific program.

Senator McElman: How often does this Affiliate Committee meet?

Mr. Knight: The Committee itself meets when necessary and it has been necessary about four times a year. There is a total Affiliates meeting once a year.

The Chairman: Well, before we leave radio perhaps I might ask just a question. It occurs to me that there might be a slight error in Appendix "B" but perhaps I might be wrong. CFPL-AM—CBC newscasts carried by CFPL-AM—shouldn't that be 10:00 p.m. instead of a.m.?

Mr. Brown: Yes.

The Chairman: It should be 10:00 p.m.?

Mr. Brown: That's right.

The Chairman: If any of the Senators are interested it is Appendix "B"—the second line reads 10:00 a.m. to 10:00 a.m.—it should be 10:00 p.m.

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Chairman, may I ask a supplementary of Mr. Knight?

The Chairman: Yes, you may, but I have one more.

Mr. Fortier: Fine.

The Chairman: I just wanted to ask about the special arrangement you have with the CBC for FM programming. The brief deals with it adequately so I simply put the question—would you recommend this kind of arrangement for other FM stations in the country?

Mr. Knight: Yes, I certainly would and I think that perhaps as a result of the experiment this development may evolve. What it amounts to really is simply matching the best of CBC programming, because what they do they do well, with the particular programming of the station on which it is being aired. In other words we were airing drama on A.M. radio immediately following a teenage rock music show which was totally incompatible. On the other hand, it had a great place on FM within the framework of a total arts, letters and science package. So yes, it is working.

The Chairman: And it could work for other stations?

Mr. Knight: That would be my view, yes.

The Chairman: Is the CBC happy with the arrangements?

Mr. Knight: I think so.

The Chairman: Is the CRTC happy with the arrangement?

Mr. Knight: I can't speak for them, but I haven't heard that they are unhappy.

The Chairman: Mr. Fortier?

Mr. Fortier: Your AM licence is endorsed as a CBC affiliate. You have made an arrangement under which the CBC feed to both the AM and the FM stations. To what extent does the CRTC have to be consulted prior to this arrangement being finalized, if at all?

Mr. Brown: Well, to what degree they have to be I am not sure but they were advised.

We brought them into our original exploratory discussion and have their blessing.

Mr. Fortier: I see.

Mr. Brown: On an experimental basis.

Mr. Fortier: Is this the CBC-FM sound which is carried on your FM station or is it the CBC-AM sound which is carried on your AM and FM station?

Mr. Brown: It is a combination of both. The reserve time package, as the CBC call it, for affiliates is a package which constitutes roughly 25 or 26 hours. When we entered into this experiment we extended that. We took a look at the total spectrum of what the CBC were producing and found that there were 17 hours that were totally compatible with what we were doing on AM and those were essentially news features—news and information features. We found, however, that there were 33 hours of things that they were doing for themselves, essentially for AM, but which happen to fit our particular programming format on FM and we were able to select the best of what they were doing. The result is, of course, that we now carry 50 hours in our market place. It varies of course in the spring and summer, it could be 51 or 52 hours. The importance to them is that there is in fact a CBC presence in our community on both stations...

Mr. Fortier: Yes.

Mr. Brown: ... within every two hour period pretty well throughout the 18 hours from 6:00 a.m. to midnight.

Mr. Fortier: And to what extent has this affected your financial arrangements with the CBC?

Mr. Brown: It hasn't affected them at all.

Mr. Fortier: Not at all?

Mr. Brown: No.

Mr. Fortier: It is the same as it was when the CRTC endorsed your AM licence?

Mr. Brown: That's right.

Mr. Fortier: And yet you get more...

Mr. Brown: I should add that there is relatively no financial arrangement. These shows that we have been talking about are unsponsored shows of the CBC in the main.

The Chairman: I think we should perhaps get back to Senator McElman's question—has Mr. Wingrove forgotten the question?

Mr. W. C. Wingrove, Station Manager, CFPL-TV: No, I haven't forgotten the question. Senator McElman, if I recall correctly, asked whether the affiliates through their connection with the CBC were able to influence programming?

Senator McElman: Right.

Mr. Wingrove: Yes, to a rather minor extent. The Affiliate Committee is composed of six members representing Canada generally from coast to coast and through them we feed viewer reaction to some of their dramas that may border on the area that causes concern...

The Chairman: What area is that, Mr. Wingrove?

Mr. Wingrove: Well, some place that was very disruptive was Yorkton, as I recall...

The Chairman: Are they disruptive in London?

Mr. Wingrove: I think London is a little broader.

Mr. Brown: And there is a greater choice of viewing.

Mr. Wingrove: The people that don't care to watch the CBC plays have seven American stations to choose from.

I think also we are able to influence, to some extent, their broad approach to programming in certain areas. For example, over the years, I think starting when Mr. Brown was on the Committee, we influenced the CBC to place their public affairs shows later in the evening where they wouldn't deny children their normal viewing and where there would be more adults in the audience. It is clearly recognized of course that the Corporation have the clear right to program the network as they see fit. It is clearly spelled out in the Broadcasting Act but of course they do listen to suggestions.

The Chairman: If I may just put a supplementary question to Mr. Brown. As a CBC affiliate which do you feel most, loyalty to the Corporation or the traditional private broadcaster's cynicism and scepticism of the Corporation?

Mr. Brown: I don't think we feel loyalty, Mr. Chairman. We have been affiliated for a long time and it is an alliance and it has not been an unfriendly alliance. I think it has been a two-way street over the years and I don't have any scepticism about the CBC.

The Chairman: I was going to say hostility and I thought that would be unfair.

Mr. Brown: There is no hostility. I am sure the Corporation would be the first to say that, I am sure they have looked upon us as one of their favourite affiliates over the years and we have co-operated with them.

The Chairman: Well, we didn't ask them which was their favourite affiliate. Perhaps it might have been a good question to ask them!

Mr. Wingrove: I would share Mr. Brown's views. It is like a loyalty to a wife and to a mother, you know...

The Chairman: Do you have any comments, Mr. Fortier?

Mr. Fortier: None, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: Do you have a supplementary, Senator Smith?

Senator Smith: Yes, Mr. Chairman. I would like to know whether or not I could get an opinion from one of these gentlemen with regard to whether or not they agree with the submission of the CAB which was to this effect: That the CBC should get out of the business and they should be a programming corporation only.

The Chairman: I think we should put that to Mr. Brown because he is a past-president of the CAB.

Mr. Brown: Well, this is an old idea which was introduced some 25 years ago and has been updated. I think it is too late in time to reverse the function of the CBC. On the other hand, I think the idea needs to be looked at and maybe there might be some compromise. Personally, I nor my company favour this role for the CBC.

Senator Smith: Thank you very much.

The Chairman: Senator McElman?

Senator McElman: In a highly controversial situation—let us take "Seven Days" as an example—where controversy does develop within the CBC over a specific program, what reference, if any, do they make to the Affiliate Committee to determine the views of the affiliates on the matter of controversy?

Mr. Brown: They do after the fact.

Senator McElman: After the fact?

Mr. Brown: Yes.

Senator McElman: Then in effect you really don't take any part in the decision?

Mr. Brown: The decision to continue such a program?

Senator McElman: To continue it, to wipe it out?

Mr. Brown: We may suggest, if we don't like a certain series, that we don't think it is in the public interest and should be discontinued and then the CBC will make up its own mind as to what it wants to do. Again, I come back to my original answer to your question, Senator McElman, the CBC has its own interpretation of what its mandate is, what they should be programming. It is difficult to have them change from what they think they should be doing, which is a very comprehensive type of program to appeal to all people's knowledge. However, they are flexible in relation to not so much what goes into a program, but the scheduling of it. One of the things that we have, I think, successfully accomplished is to make the CBC network, particularly the television network, a viable entity. It can only be that with popular programming and a certain amount of American programming skilfully weaved through the total program schedule. The Corporation believes in this now and I think this was evident in Dr. Davidson's views before you. What is the point of having a CBC television network, if enough people don't watch it? Therefore, it has to have popular programs interwoven with documentaries and public affairs programs.

Now, in the case of the radio network, this is not so. It is more of a public affairs network and its whole approach is not to appeal as a popular network. I think the CBC is looking very carefully at its radio network wondering what its future role is to be. I am sure they are not certain themselves what it should be.

The Chairman: What do you think the future role of the CBC radio network should be?

Mr. Brown: I am not sure, Mr. Chairman. I don't think what they have today is right. I think there are too many sacred cows they are trying to appease.

The Chairman: Would you include Senators!

Mr. Brown: No. I am thinking for example of trying to please the Vancouver Symphony or the Halifax Symphony and so on and the end result is they are not getting very many listeners. You made this point very clear at the appearance of the CBC when you referred to the 8:00 o'clock news.

The Chairman: Yes. Did you have a supplementary, Mr. Fortier?

Mr. Fortier: Yes I did Mr. Chairman. It is again on this CFPL and CBC relationship. Mr. Brown, you seem to say that by and large the arrangement is working well—you are satisfied and the CBC are satisfied with you, according to what you have said. Now, you have a contract with the CBC—an affiliate contract—is this contract as you ideally would like it to be or would you like to see changes in it?

Mr. Brown: Well, dealing first with the television contract—no, it is not an ideal contract because everything is pretty well in favour of the Corporation. There is an omnibus clause in the agreement which really says that the CBC can do almost anything in the way of programming if they say it is in the national interest. They could in effect take over almost all of your programming under the agreement. It is a lawyer's nightmare, Mr. Fortier.

The Chairman: A lawyer's dream!

Mr. Brown: In the case of radio we don't have an agreement at the present time. We just have a letter of understanding because we have a letter of understanding because we have special arrangements with them.

Mr. Fortier: What about the division of advertising revenue for example. Do you find that this is a fair and equitable distribution or division which the CBC ask you to subscribe to?

Mr. Brown: Yes. I think the formula for splitting the commercial revenue is quite fair. I believe it is better than what the U.S. affiliates receive with their networks and as Mr. Knight said there is practically no revenue in radio so it is unimportant.

Mr. Fortier: In the non-network periods are you able to sell your own advertising?

Mr. Brown: Yes, that is most important.

Mr. Fortier: Satisfactorily? The network commercial time does not preclude you from selling advertising during the non-network time as you see fit?

Mr. Brown: No.

Mr. Fortier: There is no saturation which is reached?

Mr. Brown: No.

The Chairman: Senator McElman?

Senator McElman: Just on this last point. In some areas at least our information is that CTV affiliated stations have a greater listenership and are able to sell their commercial time much easier than the CBC affiliates. Do you find that as the CBC programming runs, the listenership drops and then you have difficulty getting back the listeners for your own program time that you want to sell?

Mr. Brown: We do on certain days, Senator McElman, yes.

Senator McElman: Is it a serious problem?

Mr. Brown: Not yet, but I think it is becoming increasingly more so with the growing competition from American stations. Yet we recognize the CBC's problem. They can't run popular programs all through the day. They have to have minority audience programs that they feel they must schedule. I can't quarrel with it because this is the type of service I think they are obliged to provide.

Senator McElman: And this is a problem that you are prepared to live with and overcome the best you can?

Mr. Brown: That's right, Senator.

Mr. Wingrove: Well, I was going to say at the practical programming level, it does pose the problem you mentioned Senator McElman. With the great deal of cable or American penetration into London—now 80 per cent of the homes are cable served and over half of the audience is watching U.S. on the average. It means that when we do hit a period where we are carrying, for example, a public interest program of the Corporation, our audience does drop substantially because it's only a flick of the knob to have a choice of eight American stations with three networks and I don't know how many movies and so on. This has come upon us rather suddenly, although it is more accelerated recently. We see this as a serious problem and particularly with the possibility of more restrictions on programming by CRTC regulations. It is a serious problem but we are managing to deal with it at the present time.

The Chairman: Well, I hope we can perhaps ask you some questions about cable in a few minutes but perhaps we can deal with other matters first.

Senator Beaubien: Mr. Brown, you said there was no advertising revenue in radio?

Mr. Brown: From the network.

Senator Beaubien: Oh, from the network?

Mr. Brown: Yes. The CBC radio network is virtually a non-commercial network. I think we only have one commercial program we carry.

The Chairman: And what is that?

Mr. Brown: "The Galloping Gourmet."

Mr. Knight: I was just going to say that, aside from that particular show, the types of things that may normally have some commercial content would be the Grey Cup game or World Series baseball games or special features like that.

The Chairman: What about the hockey broadcast on Saturday night?

Mr. Knight: On Sunday nights.

Mr. Brown: They are not commercial.

The Chairman: Well, there are spot announcements on them. Are they not national spot announcements on the network?

Mr. G. A. Bingle (Program Manager, CFPL-Radio): Yes, there are commercials in the hockey games as well.

The Chairman: Mr. Fortier?

Mr. Fortier: I would be curious to know which CBC program drives listeners off the air in Hamilton?

The Chairman: Well, first of all the witnesses are from London!

Mr. Fortier: Yes, I am sorry, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: And it may be that they can't discuss Hamilton!

Mr. Fortier: This was a statement we heard a few minutes ago so I think it would be interesting to hear...

The Chairman: Well, I will accept the question but I must say that Senator McElman has been very generous with us.

Senator McElman: No, go right ahead.

Mr. Brown: I think generally, Mr. Fortier, that any program which is of a documentary nature is not going to appeal to as many people as the "Laugh-in" show or others of that type. This is a fact of life. The words "drive the audience away" may be a rather harsh, but let us say they are less interested and they seek other channels where they will find something they enjoy.

Mr. Fortier: You are referring mainly to the public affairs programs?

Mr. Brown: Yes and some of the...

Mr. Bingle: And some of the dramas.

Mr. Brown: Not all the dramas, because some of it is very good.

Senator Smith: And some of the music is not so generally popular?

Mr. Brown: Yes, that is right, Senator.

Mr. Fortier: And yet throughout your brief you stress the CFPL accent on public affairs programming albeit from a local point of view. How do you reconcile your view now that those are not popular and yet you present them to your viewers and to your listeners?

Mr. Brown: Well, we feel that we present public affairs programming in a more palatable fashion than the Corporation because it is more localized.

Mr. Fortier: I see.

Mr. Brown: We also think that we have a little showmanship and we recognize as well that we lose some audience with that type of program but we do have an obligation to produce that type of program and we are pretty proud of some of the stuff that we have turned out.

The Chairman: Senator McElman?

Senator McElman: Speaking of "driving" your audience, Mr. Brown, do you subscribe to the CAB's philosophy that the more advertising you put on, the higher audience rating you get?

Mr. Brown: No, I certainly don't. I was shocked at that statement.

Senator McElman: So were we!

Mr. Brown: I know he quoted figures but I think he is completely wrong. I don't think that commercials enhance the value of the programme. I do think that programmes which are popular and which are good—if they have commercials, I don't think the commercials detract from the programme. This may be what the other spokesman was saying but I don't think that the inclusion of commercials add to it.

Senator McElman: Mr. Chairman, I would like to move to the cable area.

The Chairman: Well, I just have one area that I would like to ask about before we move to cable. I would like to know—perhaps I will put it to you Mr. Brown—are Mr. Laidlaw and Mr. Bremner, structurally in your organizational chart and so on, co-equal? One I understand is the TV News Director and the other is the Radio News Director?

Mr. Brown: Well, that has changed slightly in the last few months Mr. Chairman. Mr. Bremner was News Director of CFPL-Radio but he is Radio Editor...

The Chairman: I meant Mr. Whitehead, forgive me.

Mr. Brown: Yes.

The Chairman: Well, the reason I ask this question is the witness appearing next is from CHSJ in Saint John and hopefully we can put this question to them. I don't expect you to discuss their situation because we will put this question to them, but their television and radio news department is co-ordinated and yours very clearly isn't. You have separate TV news and Radio news groups I don't want to ask the question in such a way as to be critical of the Saint John situation but it did occur to me just this past week-end in re-reading both the briefs that here are comparable sized cities and they do in one way and you do it the other. What is your philosophy in divorcing the two operations?

Mr. Brown: Mr. Chairman, when television first came into being some sixteen years ago in Canada we had to make the decision as to whether we would go with an integrated or a segregated operation. After giving it a great deal of thought, we came to the conclusion that the two stations would be healthier if they were completely separate.

The Chairman: Has it always been separate from the beginning?

Mr. Brown: Yes.

The Chairman: Have you ever considered co-ordinating it?

Mr. Brown: Yes, but we still feel the same way. We think we have a healthier operation if they are strongly competitive and completely divorced from each other in their operation.

The Chairman: What if the radio news man comes up with a clear beat on something—doesn't he pass it on to the television people or do they find out when they hear the radio station?

Mr. G. A. Whitehead, News Director, CFPL-Radio: I think that is exactly the way it works.

Mr. Wingrove: We might get an exclusive story on television and because there is so much preparation to do in putting together a news story for television as opposed to radio we might hold it until our 6:30 show and then we might alert the radio people. Mr. Bremner's paid on a free lance basis to be our announcer on the major television newscasts so that when he comes to the station he is certainly going to know about that story in any case.

The Chairman: Are you genuinely competitive with the radio news people?

Mr. Wingrove: Yes, I would think so.

The Chairman: Mr. Bremner?

Mr. T. H. Bremner, News Editor, CFPL-Radio: I would like to say that we are certainly competitive on a feature basis and in the way of spot announcements, we do tip each other off when there is a story.

The Chairman: Senator McElman?

Senator McElman: What difference is there in your programming time of news? Your prime time news?

Mr. Bremner: Well, as to radio in basically what we call prime time hours, every half hour and on the hour.

Mr. Whitehead: Through the day it is on the hour only. In the late afternoon or early evening it is again on the half hour, whereas television has three major newscasts.

Mr. Wingrove: One at noon, one at 6:30 and one at 11:00.

The Chairman: Talking about editorial comments, your brief, at p. 18 states:

"Mr. Bremner is not required to check these commentaries with station management in advance of broadcasts nor does he ever receive a directive from management as to what he can or cannot say."

It says he never receives one. Is that true Mr. Bremner?

Mr. Bremner: Yes.

The Chairman: Then I read on the next page about your dissent. And then you say relating to the Free Press...

"In developing this new editorial approach for CFPL-Radio it was obvious to us that our stand on certain issues may be completely in conflict with the editorial opinion of the London Free Press. This fact is clearly understood by the newspaper and has the full approval of W. J. Blackburn, President and Publisher of the London Free Press and Chairman of the Board of CFPL broadcasting."

I wonder if you, Mr. Brown, or Mr. Bremner would give us some examples of editorial opinion expressed on radio which has been, to quote "completely in conflict" with the London Free Press?

Mr. Bremner: Completely in conflict—mainly on matters of local issues and conflict generally on issues such as the Vietnam War and some national things.

The Chairman: Well, let us take the Vietnam War as a case in point.

Mr. Bremner: I tended to be more dovish.

The Chairman: Well, what would be an example of a local issue?

Mr. Bremner: Well, we had some property called Broughdale which I thought should be sold to a Greek church and they took the opposite stand saying it should be parkland.

The Chairman: Senator McElman, if you would like to ask some questions leading in to cable perhaps now is the time.

Senator McElman: Mr. Brown, as I understand it London was the first city in Canada to have cable?

Mr. Brown: Yes.

Senator McElman: And now, approximately 80 per cent of the television homes are also cable homes?

Mr. Brown: Around 80 per cent.

Senator McElman: So that is fairly accurate?

Mr. Brown: Yes.

Senator McElman: You have gone into considerable detail in your brief as to the fragmentation of the audience as a result of this. Are you already suffering from the revenue standpoint or are the concerns you expressed here largely for the future?

Mr. Brown: Largely for the future, Senator McElman. I think we did indicate in our brief that fortunately up to this date we had not suffered financially.

Senator McElman: Your company—you have the saturation newspaper in the London area, the daily newspaper, you have the one television station originating in London and you have your radio station.

The Chairman: I just wish to interject before Mr. Blackburn gets up and marches to the front, that we should say "near saturation".

Senator McElman: Yes, I recall the half hour of semantics with Mr. Blackburn very well!

The Chairman: Please carry on.

Senator McElman: In such a situation do you feel that the fact of this ownership of the various media has been the factor in retaining your earnings situation. Does one assist the other? I am not speaking of any relation of rates or anything of that nature but does one assist the other in the marketing of commercials?

Mr. Brown: No, not a bit Senator McElman. We are completely autonomous in the free operation and we are highly competitive. When I say that the television station has not suffered, I mean it has been able to generate good revenues of its own. It hasn't required any subsidies from its sister company. I didn't know whether that was what you meant by your question or not.

Senator McElman: Well, let me put it another way, Mr. Brown. Your audience rating on television has obviously gone down because of the intrusion of cable. Your rates haven't have they?

Mr. Brown: No sir. I made the point in our brief that, whereas the audience has been fragmented because of the growth of cable, we still are the singly most listened to or most watched television station in the marketplace. Since London is a good market and national advertisers want it in their campaigns, they will buy CFPL-TV.

Senator McElman: It is still the best in the market?

Mr. Brown: Well, to a degree. I don't think it is possibly as much as it was a few years ago—we promote it as such.

Senator McElman: I am sure you do. You have gone into considerable detail in your brief as well, in explaining the effect of the American stations coming in and you have shown concern in the falling off of revenue looking to the future. Is there any recommendation that you would make to and through this Committee whereby Canadian advertising dollars could be prevented from flowing to those American stations. I am thinking of the provision that was made as a result of the O'Leary Commission. Is there anything of a similar nature that you have in mind in practical terms?

Mr. Brown: Well I think it is premature, Senator McElman, because at the moment, with the exception of places like Winnipeg, which was mentioned yesterday, and the Beltingham situation and Toronto there aren't too many Canadian dollars going into U.S. television stations. I suppose a similar provision to that which applies to the magazine industry might eventually be the answer. We made some comment about this in our answers to the guideline questions.

What could happen and Mr. Wingrove could speak to this a little more fluently, is that if the American stations begin to take more and more audiences away along the border, the American advertiser which has Canadian outlets could say "Well, we don't need to buy these Canadian outlets because we are getting enough overflow audience through all these border U.S. stations", and they could just quietly say to their Canadian subsidiary "You will put a little money into the American pot toward our advertising and we won't spend the money in Canada." This could happen but I don't think it has happened as yet.

Mr. Wingrove: Well, there is really no way of knowing when this happens but I would doubt if it is a serious factor in our area at present but there really would be no way of knowing. There has been no evidence of it except in one or two very, very minor cases.

Mr. Brown: Well, we know that the Buffalo stations get a fair amount of business from Toronto and you have heard about the Pembina-Winnipeg situation and the Bellingham-Vancouver situation. I think they are about the only three.

Mr. Wingrove: I believe Watertown into the Kingston area is another one.

Senator McElman: You suggest that that action might be premature, Mr. Brown, but could I remind you that with respect to Time and Reader's Digest now, there are those who are suggesting very firmly that it is too late, that action should have been taken earlier.

Mr. Brown: Well, as broadcasters who have been subject to a great many regulations, we hate to suggest that there be more introduced for other media or for other people. I think what we would really like is the freedom to compete. We would like less regulations so that we could compete more freely in the open market and I think this is all that broadcasters would really ask for. We don't ask that other people be regulated.

Senator McElman: Well, you are probably as well aware as we are of the ways in which national advertisers could get around a provision that is similar to that which is applied to magazines. This is why I am asking if there is something of an equally practical nature that you can suggest to us at this stage, to make you more competitive let's say. What regulations make you less competitive in a situation of this nature?

Mr. Brown: Well, we need freedom to program in competition with these American stations so that we can hold audiences and we won't have to worry about losing revenue. I wouldn't at this point in time favour any sort of tariff restrictions in this regard.

The Chairman: Perhaps I might ask you a question at this point on cable. You say in our brief at section 140 that "it seems inevitable that development into more extensive programming will follow"—that is originating programming by cable stations will follow.

Mr. Brown: Yes.

The Chairman: You say in section 164 of our brief, however, that:

21490-24

"There has been little, if any, fragmentation of audience as yet from the distribution by cable of programs originated by the Cable companies themselves."

Presumably you don't think the cable companies' originations as yet, are of sufficient quality. Do you think that is going to happen?

Mr. Brown: Well, I can't give you the timing, Mr. Chairman. They have only just started in the last eight months.

The Chairman: Well, let me put another question to you, and if I could detach you, at least for a moment, from your CFPL Broadcasting hat, I ask you to consider this question from the Committee's point of view. We have had a great many witnesses come before the Committee from various walks of life, organizations, groups, communicators and so on and there seems to be a view that at last with cable we will be able to provide, or there will be provided, to citizens in various communities a multiplicity of choice—that, for example, underprivileged or minority groups will have access. They will also have an opportunity to receive the kind of minority programming which interests them. The question I would put to you is this. Isn't this multiplicity of choice and the availability of minority programming desirable? And if you think it is desirable, how would you, if you were charged with the responsibility of directing or regulating the future of cable broadcasting in Canada—what should be done—(a) to facilitate this minority programming, if indeed you think that is a good thing; and (b) to protect the position of the conventional broadcaster?

Mr. Brown: Well, to answer question (a), I think we agree that it could be a good thing to provide these additional program services on cable. We have no quarrel with that. I think our prime concern is the importation of American signals which makes it difficult for a Canadian television station not only to continue to be viable but how does it contribute to the Canadian identity, which is part of its obligation under the Broadcasting Act?

The Chairman: You would have no objection if, for example, there was a cable in London originating from the University of Western Ontario?

Mr. Brown: Not a bit.

The Chairman: And if one was from City Hall—you wouldn't have any objection to this type of thing?

Mr. Brown: No. We have not objected to local origination. The only point we make is that they can grow from what they are now which is really programming designed for a multiplicity of small groups to more popular programming and then ultimately to commercial programming.

The Chairman: Your concern is primarily economics, and, I said yesterday, when you were here, and I have said many times before this Committee, I don't find that distasteful at all. I quite understand that, but you are also concerned, and I know you are, with the social problems, the social scene and cable, surely, is a great social potential. How can we most effectively realize that social potential, if you will?

Mr. Wingrove: I would agree that if cable continues to expand its minority local services—programming such as the Home and School meetings and so on—that this is an additional service like a weekly newspaper renders in a small town.

The Chairman: Yes.

Mr. Wingrove: And I believe it is good. It seems to me that with the high prices that are being paid for cable—I mean, it is the new Porcupine gold strike—everyone is rushing in and paying the prices—and already word comes from cable groups that to do this and that, they will need to sell advertising. I have heard it expressed that it would probably be a good thing that they sold advertising because, again like a weekly newspaper, they would sell the corner grocer and so on.

Now, we have the situation where cable people are really going into it to import American programs, and there is really no doubt about that and that the other services are an obligation. They will only provide those local services within their revenue means. If they feel that they are being crowded in to provide more than the old services in our city, some of those who are paying these big prices may not be able to afford to. Those are the ones that may feed back to whoever the appropriate authorities are at the time and say that if you want us to do all this we will need the advertising revenue. When that starts, that may not just affect television. In fact, it might be the least affected. It could affect the radio, the weekly newspaper and the daily newspapers because of the local advertising. So that as far as our own television station is concerned, I don't foresee any development in the cable service in that area and I don't see how it is going to bother us.

It might also occur to people that it would be wonderful to have first-run feature movies every day, because, after all, the Broadcast Act was passed by Parliament but the people of Canada by plebiscite didn't say that they would prefer all this kind of programming over American. We know, despite what the Broadcast Act says, that the people in their own voting, which is the turning of the knob prefer the popular programming. If you get to a situation where the people are crying and they have a right to see these and the technology is there, then you could have a serious undermining of orthodox broadcasting. We take seriously, I think, our responsibility which is not only to keep bring in the revenue but to serve the purpose that is required by the Broadcasting Act, a purpose which is being eroded by audience fall off. That is our prime concern.

The Chairman: Well, are you suggesting that it is to the detriment of the people of Canada. Let's say that there is a first-run movie in Ottawa. Would it not be in the public interest that the people could sit in their living rooms and watch this movie?

Mr. Wingrove: Well, it would be in the public interest if the simple view of giving the public what it wants, is the objective and I don't agree with that. We do try to give them what they want to a certain extent. However, suppose at the same time that Patrick Watson or whoever on CJOH was presenting a program as a result of months' research into the drug problem in Ottawa and this was of tremendous social importance...

The Chairman: Yes.

Mr. Wingrove: And people are sitting watching a Hollywood razzle-dazzle type movie...

The Chairman: Well, in answer to that, Mr. Wingrove, is it not true that if CFPL is running an invaluable documentary on whatever and one of your competing stations, let's say Kitchener, is running "Laugh-in" I guess they don't run that because you have it—or so other program, they will outdraw you.

The point I am making, perhaps not well that I think cable has great potential for people. I understand the concern of broadcasters.

Therefore, the other question I would put to you is that you fellows have come to us, as have other broadcasters, and said, "These are the problems". We understand the problems. You honed in and said, more directly, that it is the access through cable to all of these American signals which now saturate London, which is the problem. What would you do about that very problem?

Mr. Brown: Well, you can't hold back technology, Mr. Chairman. I think the use of advanced technology, where possible, has to be controlled or designed in the public interest. This is the only point that we make. There must be well thought-out policies to govern the growth of cable, so that it can be used in the public interest. We don't specifically have any suggestions—I know this is what you are looking for...

The Chairman: Yes it is.

Mr. Brown: And I am sure the Canadian Radio and Television Commission is looking for an answer and I don't think there are any pat answers. There is the other complication that cable systems have, as their planned source of revenue, subscription fees. Broadcasters don't have that. Their only source of revenue is through the sale of advertising.

If cable systems also got into advertising they would have two sources of revenue and not necessarily the same obligation under the Broadcasting Act to provide a comprehensive programming service. Also, the very nature of cable operation is such that it is much cheaper to operate a cable system than it is to operate a broadcasting station. Our television broadcasting station has roughly 100 employees and another 30 free-lance television people, whereas a cable system might have 25 employees. This could make it very difficult for a conventional television station or traditional television station to continue to serve the audience. And don't forget the audience in the smaller rural areas that will not have cable. Who is going to provide a service to these people if the cable companies just appeal to the lucrative metropolitan markets?

The Chairman: I am not disagreeing with you at all but we are just trying to come up with, as you have indicated, some answers.

Mr. Brown: Mr. Chairman, I haven't got the answer today...

The Chairman: Will you write us if you come up with it?

Mr. Brown: I will work on it.

The Chairman: And Mr. Fortier?

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Brown, Mr. Wingrove said a few moments ago that your viewers have access to these American programs and indeed these seven or eight channels that are available in London—through these they do. To what extent do you as a broadcaster, who happens to be a Canadian citizen, feel that a quasi-judicial agency such as the CRTC should impose Canadian content programs on Canadian viewers in the London market specifically?

Mr. Brown: Mr. Fortier, I think the CRTC as the regulatory authority is trying to or taking this approach under their interpretation of what they should be doing according to the Broadcasting Act.

Mr. Fortier: Do you think their approach is correct?

Mr. Brown: No one can quarrel with the objective that we want a greater Canadian identity.

Mr. Fortier: The objective as spelled out by Parliament?

Mr. Brown: No.

Mr. Fortier: Or the objectives as interpreted by the CRTC?

Mr. Brown: Both. I am not sure whether the approach, which is in a sense a restrictive approach, saying that you must have a minimum of so much Canadian programming, is going to achieve this. Mr. Juneau, shortly after he was appointed to the Commission, in an interview said something to this effect that rules will not produce quality; rules will not provide excellence. I don't know how we would achieve this. I sometimes think we have achieved it without knowing it. I think that our television station has a very distinct flavour.

Mr. Fortier: Is that because of the minimum content which exists now and which was imposed by the BBC back in 1959, or is it because of your own programming and policy philosophy?

Mr. Brown: I think it is a combination of our own programming philosophy and our affiliation with the CBC. Before the 55 per cent regulations came into effect, which was around 1960 or '61—I looked at a brief we filed the other day about that our programming was quite Canadian. There was no Canadian content at that time and I think it was almost 55 per cent at that time. We had a very distinctive Canadian flavour to our station without any regulations. I am sure that many other television stations did also.

Mr. Fortier: Do you think the Commission, the CRTC, is naive if they entertain the belief that by imposing this minimum Canadian content, they are going to force Canadians to look at those programs or do you think that this is a distinct possibility. In other words, not in spite of themselves, but because of this channelling of programming, that Canadians sooner or later will come to realize that we have something to preserve in Canada, we have something to encourage and that maybe we should look at these programs rather than "Bonanza" or "Laugh-In" or what have you. Is this a naive policy?

Mr. Brown: No, I don't believe it is naive Mr. Fortier, and I believe Mr. Juneau made the statement—it may have been said before this Committee—that he didn't agree with the statement that has he made that the quantity will not produce quality. I believe he feels and quite justly so that at least if you have some quantity there is a good chance that quality can come from it.

Mr. Fortier: Yes.

Mr. Brown: And I don't quarrel with this premise.

Mr. Fortier: Well, do you as a private broadcaster quarrel with the method which is now suggested by the CRTC?

Mr. Brown: Well, let me say this Mr. Fortier. It will not provide us with any severe hardship but I think we would have Canadian identity without it.

Mr. Fortier: Will you lose viewers in the immediate future?

Mr. Brown: We will lose some.

Mr. Fortier: Do you think you will get them back eventually?

Mr. Brown: Well, I come back to what I said a while ago. If we can have the flexibility to program competitively, I think we can do it. We have enough ingenious people in our organization but there is an inconsistency. As I mentioned in our brief, we want to fill our obligations under the Broadcasting Act as does the CBC network, and I think the CTV network, yet at the same time the Government of Canada through various authorities has licensed cable systems to bring in American programs to compete against Canadian stations. To me, that is a great inconsistency.

The Chairman: I believe Senator Kinnear has a supplementary question.

Senator Kinnear: Thank you very much Mr. Chairman. I wondered what opportunities you provide for Canadian talent—local talent?

Mr. Brown: What opportunities we provide?

Senator Kinnear: Yes.

Mr. Brown: Would you like a list?

Senator Kinnear: No. I don't want a list but I want to know the...

Mr. Brown: The sort of things that we do?

Senator Kinnear: Yes.

Mr. Brown: I wonder if Mr. Plant would speak to that. Mr. Plant is Production Manager for the company.

Mr. J. A. Plant, Production Manager, CFPL-TV: The concept of supporting Canadian talent varies with our program schedule. Our thrust, perhaps in the last two or three years, has perhaps been more towards public affairs. In the development of talent and at the present time, we are devoting a great deal of time and energy to a country and western program—which of course is a form of talent—and very popular in our area. That is our major project this season.

On the other hand, we are doing two other groups of public affairs programs with the Ecumenical Council and we just completed one with the University of Western Ontario Students' Council. Whether or not you would say that was talent development is a matter to be argued or discussed, but our thrust...

Senator Kinnear: Does it give you Canadian talent for your programs?

Mr. Plant: Oh yes, of course. We also feel a need in the community for these people to be heard. We also produce, three times a week, an afternoon program which varies in duration from 15 minutes to 30 minutes—weekly farm program largely on film, and, our most expensive public affairs proposition, the program The World Around Us which is seen weekly in prime time.

In addition we produced this year again, ten medical programs in conjunction with the University of Western Ontario and that is all included in our brief.

The Chairman: I was just going to say to Senator Kinnear that it is all in the brief.

Mr. Plant: Whether or not you would consider this talent is another matter.

Senator Kinnear: Well, I am interested in seeing Canadian talent develop and I thought it was going to be an opportunity to do it considering you are asking for more Canadian content.

Mr. Brown: We are aware of this and thinking along those lines, Senator.

The Chairman: Do you have another question, Mr. Fortier?

Mr. Fortier: Yes I have, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: Well, we have another witness, so as long as you are mindful of that—carry on.

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Brown, you said you can't hold back technology. I believe that you were addressing your mind to cable at the time?

Mr. Brown: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: And in fact you joined some years ago the cable fad in wiring up Chatham?

Mr. Brown: That is correct, sir.

Mr. Fortier: And yet last fall you applied to the CRTC for their blessing of the sale of your interest to Jarmain Cable Systems Ltd. Why are you getting out of cable? Why are you not expanding in this new technological field?

Mr. Brown: Mr. Fortier, I think the answer is, and Mr. Blackburn replied to this in a similar way during his appearance, that after the CRTC decision concerning one of the cable systems in Toronto in which one of the conditions was that Mr. Bassett would have to divest himself of his interest in it because of his ownership or involvement in both a newspaper and a television station, it became clear to us that our participation would probably not be considered too popular by the authorities...

Mr. Fortier: Well, I would suggest to you that yours was not on all fours with the Toronto situation. You were not wiring up London—you were wiring up adjacent communities.

Mr. Brown: Except, Mr. Fortier, that the Jarmain people, in order to clean up the situation of their involvement with Famous Players—Famous Players had to sell out some of their interest. When the Famous Players proposed public company fell through, Jarmain Cable then decided to proceed with its own public company and it has subsequently been approved by the Commission. In so doing, if we had been considered as shareholders in this new company, we then in effect would have owned a part of London TV Cable which is the cable system in London.

Mr. Fortier: All right. On the same note—you can't hold back technology—the CRTC, in its December the 3rd announcement on the microwave policy, seems to have suggested that technology could be held back and that in certain sections of Canada, there would be citizens who would not have access to the same type of programs which are available to you and I. You know 80 per cent of the Canadian population live that close to the border. What do you think of that decision on restriction of microwave systems?

Mr. Brown: Well, I can't help but feel, Mr. Fortier, and this is a personal view, that it is just a holding action. I think public pressure will be such that ultimately some device, be it microwave or something else, will be allowed to make cable systems possible in those cities in Northern Ontario and Western Canada.

Mr. Fortier: Once again do you feel that the goals of the CRTC are legitimate and laudable ones?

Mr. Brown: Yes I do. In fairness to the Commission they took over the jurisdiction of cable after the door had locked behind them. If these cable systems had been allowed to flourish and develop anybody could have got a cable system ten years ago and it would only have cost $25 a year for a licence...

Mr. Fortier: Yes.

Mr. Brown: So these things developed completely unregulated and the Commission took them over when it was formed and they had to deal with insurmountable problems which were inherent in taking over the system. It is easy to criticize the Commission and say that it is an unfair ruling in Western Canada and Northern Ontario when people along this gold coast from Montreal to Windsor have access to American stations. However, because something was possibly wrong at the beginning, I think that they didn't want to perpetuate it, so I am sympathetic to their decision. I don't think there was any other decision they could make under the terms of the Broadcasting Act.

The Chairman: I wonder—Mr. Fortier—do you have other questions?

Mr. Fortier: I will be very brief, Mr. Chairman. I just have two areas...

The Chairman: Two questions, not areas!

Mr. Fortier: Your viewers in London have access to all these channels and U.S. programs are imported by cable and there is this exposure to CBC English language programming but what exposure is there for those viewers in London who wish to have access to a French radio station or to a French television program and what policy, if any, do you have at CFPL in this respect?

Mr. Brown: Well we carry five 15-minute French programs Monday through Friday which are designed for pre-school children. We carry two half-hours between 11:00 and 12:00 on Sunday and those programs are originated by the CBC. It is not mandatory that we carry them but we do carry them because we feel for those who are interested in French, they should be made available. As well on CFPL-FM, we produce a one-hour French program on Saturday nights from 6:00 to 7:00. I feel that we are making a reasonable contribution to biculturalism and bilingualism in our country, in an area where there are relatively very few French speaking people.

Senator Smith: How many, Mr. Brown?

Mr. Brown: Pardon?

Senator Smith: How many would there be, do you think?

Mr. Brown: 150 families.

Mr. Fortier: I think I am equally concerned about the English speaking families who wish to learn French or listen to French programs.

The Chairman: Was that your second question?

Mr. Fortier: No.

Mr. Brown: I think there is an opportunity here for closed circuit television or for cable TV to provide some French programming.

Mr. Fortier: Has this been attempted at all in London?

Mr. Brown: Not to my knowledge. The cable company—London TV Cable, who is doing most of the production in London, has taken the stand largely that they are prepared to provide the programming time but they will not produce the program. They would like to have somebody else produce them and then they would put them on.

Mr. Fortier: My last question, Mr. Chairman, I will direct to Mr. Knight. CFPL-Radio has citizen panels, does it not, with whom it consults regularly to keep the station in tune with the community?

Mr. Knight: No it doesn't.

Mr. Fortier: It does not?

Mr. Knight: No.

Mr. Fortier: Well, we have been informed that it did. Consequently Mr. Chairman I have no further questions!

The Chairman: Well, we could ask these witnesses back this evening!

I do have a couple of questions and they are very short. I was interested in the TV Bureau survey which was taken February '68 and the results of which are Appendix "J" in your brief. I have three questions on it but they are all very short. One of the questions put to people was:

"Do you agree or disagree that having commercials on Canadian television is a fair price to pay for being able to watch it?"

Fifty-five per cent agreed with that statement. What do you think that percentage would have been had the question been worded differently and the question had been, "Would you prefer to see all the current television programming without any commercials?"

Mr. Wingrove: Well, all I can say is that we didn't do this survey at all. It simply came to us and we are a member of the Association that commissioned it and we put it in her simply for you to view as you like, except that organization is quite responsible.

The Chairman: Yes, I agree.

My second question is this. It is apparent from the findings that the people who ear under $6,999 clearly use television as their first source of news and presumably people who earn $7,000 a year and over preferred newspapers as their first source of news. Does this give you, Mr. Wingrove, the particular challenge in the area of adapting news—do you have a particular responsibility to people who earn under $7,000 who use television as their first source of news?

Mr. Wingrove: Well, we have never targeted our audience to that fine an extent. I think it has been generally known that possibly the lower socio-economic group spend far more time watching television and it cannot be conversely said, therefore, that the well-to-do people do not watch television.

The Chairman: We had a witness last evening and he made the point which some of us certainly hadn't thought about—certainly I hadn't—that television probably is the first really mass medium in history in terms of reaching people who earn under three or four thousand dollars a year. They probably wouldn't buy newspapers or magazines and they perhaps may have been reached by radio, but certainly they are reached by television.

Mr. Wingrove: Well, television certainly has the power and the ability to penetrate very deeply. That is people spend four to five hours a day watching television. To people in his room this would probably be an unthinkable way of spending this time but surveys consistently show this, so it is a mass medium.

The Chairman: Well, my final question is to you Mr. Brown. Is Mr. Blackburn concerned by this particular chart on page 4 of the ORC study which shows that television in all regions of the country, in all occupations, in all income groups, is considered more believable than the newspapers?

Mr. Brown: I haven't asked him but I am sure the newspapers have similar surveys which would show that newspapers...

The Chairman: Senator McElman?

Senator McElman: At page 70 of your brief, Mr. Brown, in paragraph 266 you say:

"In our view 'freedom of the press' in the broadcasting industry is not adequately protected."

In what additional ways do you feel it could be protected?

Mr. Brown: I would like Mr. Laidlaw to speak to that.

Mr. W. R. Laidlaw, News Director, CFPL-TV: Well, I think it is simply a matter, sir, of too many closed doors to our cameras.

Senator McElman: Oh, I see.

Mr. Laidlaw: This room for instance.

The Chairman: As Chairman I can only say "Amen". I agree with you.

Mr. Brown: That was a television answer Senator McElman to the guidelines and that is why I asked Mr. Laidlaw as our News Director to answer that.

Senator McElman: Fine.

The Chairman: Do you have another question, Mr. Fortier?

Mr. Fortier: Yes Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: This is the last question Mr. Fortier, no matter what.

Mr. Fortier: You were here yesterday Mr. Brown and you heard Mr. Mackay say, as President of Selkirk, that Southam had recently agreed to sell to Selkirk all of its interests in broadcasting companies, with the exception of their interest in CFPL. Do you happen to know why Southam have not included CFPL in this arrangement with Selkirk?

Mr. Brown: To my knowledge it has never been suggested by Mr. Balfour, the President of the Southam Company.

Mr. Fortier: Would you have any objection to the 25 per cent Southam interest being acquired by Selkirk—in other words going to bed with Selkirk?

Mr. Brown: I rather think that Mr. Blackburn, being the principal of the company, would have to answer that question. I am an operating man—not an owner.

The Chairman: Well, unhappily we didn't put that question to Mr. Blackburn when he was here and he is not here today as a witness and I am not going to ask him. Would you like to ask him, Mr. Fortier?

Mr. Fortier: Certainly I would!

The Chairman: Well, I think we have dealt with this. Perhaps Mr. Blackburn wishes to comment to us and if he does he can do it in private and if we wish it answered we can have it answered in private.

Certainly few witnesses have been as co-operative with the Committee as has been your organization—speaking particularly today of the broadcast and television groups. I am sorry that time is short because it is certainly obvious that there are other questions we would like to ask you. Simply put, but most sincerely, thank you.

Mr. Brown: It has been a pleasure, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: We will adjourn now until 11.40 and at that time we will receive the brief from New Brunswick Broadcasting Company Limited and CHSJ-Television.

Thank you.

Whereupon the Committee recessed until 11:40 a.m.

Wednesday, March 25, 1970.

Upon resuming at 11.40 a.m.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, if I may call the session back to order. The second witness this morning is the New Brunswick Broadcasting Co. Limited.

The chief spokesman in connection with this second brief this morning is sitting on my immediate right, Mr. George A. Cromwell, who is the General Manager of the New Brunswick Broadcasting Co. Limited. Perhaps I could introduce the people who are also with Mr. Cromwell this morning. On his right is Mr. W. A. Stewart, who is the Manager of CHSJ television, and then following along from Mr. Stewart is Mr. D. M. Burrows, who is the Manager of CHSJ Radio, and on the extreme right is Mr. W. K. Donovan, Managing Editor, News. Sitting on my immediate left is someone most Senators will remember, the President of the CDNPA, Mr. Ralph Costello. Mr. Costello is here, of course, this morning in his capacity as President of New Brunswick Broadcasting Co. Limited.

Mr. Cromwell, you may not be quite familiar with our procedure, but we provide for an opening oral statement of 10, 12 or 15 minutes and then following that we would like to ask you some questions on your oral statements, on your brief, and on other matters which may concern the Committee. It is my understanding that you do have a statement but it will be prefaced by a statement by Mr. Costello, is that correct?

Mr. Ralph Costello, President, New Brunswick Broadcasting Co. Limited: Yes Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: Well, would you please then just carry on, Mr. Costello.

Mr. Costello: Well, Mr. Chairman and honourable Senators. I think this will be the opening statement, so we can get right to the questioning. When I was last with you in this room, you were kind enough to grant me a few extra moments to make my opening remarks, and I think today I am in a position to return that time to you as my opening statement will be relatively short.

I am here, as you have suggested Mr. Chairman, as President of the New Brunswick Broadcasting Co. Limited, accompanied by the General Manager, the Manager of the television station, the Manager of the radio station and the Managing Editor of the News Department. I do want to say that I hope the French translation of our original brief arrived prior to today's hearing as we did have some difficulty in regards to time and a little difficulty in regards to the mail.

We also have provided supplementary material as a result of the second set of guidelines which were developed for radio and television a short time ago.

Mr. Cromwell, as you have indicated, is the General Manager of the Broadcasting Company and will answer questions dealing with both radio and television, or direct the questions to his associates.

All members of the group, myself included, will, of course, attempt to answer any questions which you may care to direct to us individually.

The Chairman: Thank you very much. I think we might as well turn right to the questioning this morning, and I believe Senator Smith is going to lead off.

Senator Smith: Yes Mr. Chairman. I have some notes on a few questions about programming and I would like my first question to be in that area as it follows along the events we have just listened to this morning on the management of the London situation.

The Chairman: I believe these gentlemen were all here for that.

Senator Smith: I believe they were, yes.

This question has to do with the evidence given that the London station found it possible and a very well received idea to program on radio for French-speaking families who may be in that London area of coverage. When the meeting was over I asked the witness who supplied the information about the 150 families. He said that their programming was really quite important not only to the French-speaking, but to English-speaking families. They are advised by one who is of French-speaking origin and who is anxious to promote bilingualism. They have news broadcasts and summaries of news, and so on, in both languages on a program. Now my question is this. Situated as you are and with considerable coverage of the Acadian people, do you do anything like that on radio or television?

Mr. George A. Cromwell, General Manager, New Brunswick Broadcasting Co. Limited: No, we don't do any mix at all between the two languages either on radio or television. When we first went into television which would be back in 1954 or 1955, there was some French programming done, but mostly of a religious nature. Since that time there has been no French programming as such.

Senator Smith: Which one of the Saint John stations is it that I used to listen to some years ago which every Sunday morning had a church service in the French language. It was not a Roman Catholic service—it was some kind of Protestant service. Was that your radio station?

Mr. Cromwell: Not to my knowledge, no.

Senator Smith: Your competitor then?

Mr. Cromwell: Very likely.

Senator Smith: Well, I will just leave it at that.

The Chairman: Would you like to comment on that, Mr. Costello?

Mr. Costello: Yes, Mr. Chairman. I think it should be noted that there is considerable French language radio and television in New Brunswick. I am not sure that a comparable situation exists in London.

Senator Smith: I thought that.

Mr. Costello: The need might not be as great or it might be greater. There is French radio and television in New Brunswick.

Senator Smith: Yes, that is quite true and I accept that. I was thinking more in terms of the education of the young English-speaking children who were growing up. One of the radio programs in the morning hours is directed to pre-school children. Their mothers are interested in it as well. I thought you might try something like this at some time as an experiment.

Mr. Cromwell: No, we haven't.

Senator Smith: I don't want to spend too much time on it.

Mr. Cromwell: If I might I would just like to make another remark. When we were an affiliate of the CBC network, at that time I think there was some French programming done as well in the direction to which you refer and it is still there, of course, with the CBC stations.

Senator Smith: At the outset, Mr. Chairman, I don't want to leave the impression with anyone that I was trying to compare, because you can't compare a giant sized grapefruit and one of these little tiny ones on the inside of a branch. Now, I also have another reference with regard to programming from information which I have been reading with regard to the London operation. This has to do with television programming and it is my understanding that London finds it possible with their resources to produce something over 50 hours per week of local content programs. I have a figure here and you can correct me if I am wrong that CHSJ television produces around 14 hours a week. Is that correct?

Mr. Cromwell: I would think that would be a correct figure, yes.

Senator Smith: Is this because of the lack of talent that you have access to, or is it the lack of other resources, such as finance?

Mr. Cromwell: I believe our program manager, Mr. Stewart, can answer that.

The Chairman: Mr. Stewart?

Mr. W. A. Stewart, Manager, CHSJ-TV, New Brunswick Broadcasting Co. Limited: I think I can clarify, and I don't want to speak for the London station but I don't think they said they produced 50 hours of local programming a week. I think that might be their total Canadian programming—not what they produce per week.

The Chairman: What is in their brief?

Mr. Fortier: That they produce 50 hours a week.

The Chairman: Of local programming?

Mr. Fortier: Of local programming.

Senator Smith: That's what I thought I read. I didn't have the reference in front of me.

The Chairman: I think that is in their brief as I recall.

Senator Smith: Well, let us not bear too heavily on the London situation.

The Chairman: Would you like to just get that reference, Mr. Spears, so we may have it on the record.

Mr. Stewart: We produce I think an amount of local production that is comparable to most stations our size. We have a little greater difficulty in producing local programs in the area in which we live because we don't have the talent pool upon which to draw. I think it is quite a fair statement to say that our record in local production is quite a good one on a comparable basis. As a matter of fact I think it is a damn good one on a comparable basis with stations our size in Canada.

Senator Smith: Well, Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask a few more questions and perhaps it might be appropriate that Mr. Stewart...

The Chairman: Just before you go ahead he might have reference made to this local broadcasting. Where is that, Mr. Fortier?

Mr. Fortier: A combination of pages 31 and 33. Page 31, CFPL television prime time 6 p.m. to 11.40 p.m.—total hours, 18 hours and 20 minutes, and on page 33, CFPL television daytime 33 hours and 25 minutes, but I understand this is divided as follows: Canadian source 25 hours and 26 hours from other sources. It would appear to be 25 hours of CFPL produced programming in any given week.

The Chairman: Well, I think the witness has given us his answer on it.

Senator Smith: I was interested, of course, in reading some of the material that was in the various appendices that were submitted to us and at first glance it looked rather impressive, the list of local programs and the kind of people that you give an opportunity to get on radio and television. I made the conclusion, after going over it the second time, that when you speak of thousands of people who have had a chance to develop their talent, you are speaking mostly in terms of children aren't you, with regard to music festivals, and things of this sort?

Mr. Stewart: I think that primarily we concentrated on children—that is quite true, Senator. There is a very good reason for this. As I said earlier, we don't have the talent pool. A person who is going to make it in show business, if I can use that expression, is not going to stay around Saint John long enough for us to really work with them. Most of the people that have made a career in this field have appeared on our television station.

The type of thing that we do and that we are proud of—you referred to children and music festivals. We do work very closely with the New Brunswick Competitive Festival of Music, but we are not presenting a talent show, for example, in the case of "Time for Juniors" which is one of our vehicles which is in prime time and that deals with this type of programming. We are presenting a show which encourages all children to participate. We do work with thousands of them but this is what the show is doing. I think it is quite unique in Canada that this type of show can be presented in prime time and has been for 15 years and has worked with approximately 30,000 children.

What we do with the show is this. They come to audition, sometimes 300 or 400 a week, and every child who comes to audition is given individual attention because the accompanist on the show is a qualified music teacher. The person who does the show has a great deal of training in music and we work individually with the children and the message that we are trying to put across is participate. Viewers don't realize this, but we quite often put on children who on the basis of their ability alone shouldn't be on the program, but they have worked and tried to do the songs and with our help they eventually get to the point where they are going to do that song as well as they ever will with their natural ability. You have to put that child on to prove to him that by trying he can achieve. I am sorry to digress on this but I feel very, very definitely that this is the type of thing that a television station can do. I am not terribly impressed with the statements that I hear from other stations and that we have probably made at times, that these now stars of show business—we helped them along in their early careers by putting them on television, et cetera. When they get to that stage we really have nothing to do with their development other than providing an outlet for them.

Senator Smith: Aren't you proud...

Mr. Stewart: But at the child stage we are doing something for their development.

Senator Smith: Aren't you proud of the fact that Don Messer got his start on your station?

Mr. Stewart: Well, I am not personally proud because I wasn't there then, but I imagine there are people at the station who are quite rightfully proud that Don Messer got his start there. Right now, we are working with Ned Landry who has a show on the station. I think our most important contribution is in the area working with younger people, particularly because of the area in which we are, where we don't have an adult talent pool to draw on.

Senator Smith: Mr. Stewart, what are the different circumstances around Saint John? It would seem that Halifax has been able to hold on to its talent. I observe many more local people getting on prime time programs over the Halifax station, one or the other, then getting a national network program, and so on. I don't want to start to name them, but there are quite a number that float across my mind. Don't you have that kind of a pool available to you in the Saint John area? These people haven't all gone up to Toronto. Max Ferguson came down for a while and visited and then went back to London.

Mr. Stewart: I think the fact that there is a CBC owned and operated station there is a factor in that regard.

Senator Smith: That is fine. I hope you don't mind if I do interrupt you when we receive a short answer because we are a little short of time and I apologize for that.

Mr. Stewart: Fine, Senator.

Senator Smith: I was also thinking about something else about the CBC which they are able to do and that is to search out for talent. I am thinking of all these talent-searching things from time to time. They advertise in even some of the local newspapers and weekly newspapers that on such and such a day a man will be in that district and he will listen and tape various people who think they have talent. Do you people do anything of that nature to ascertain what talent you have?

Mr. Stewart: Yes, we have done it in the past, but we were limited in our studio facilities for most of our years in the television business. We are now in very excellent facilities and we do hold auditions. In addition, to this, we have three full time producers on the staff who as part of their job feel an obligation to attend various entertainment things that are going on searching for talent.

Recently we attended a presentation in Saint John and saw a young singing group that was just starting and they became the basis for a half-hour television show. We intend to continue working with this group, and if they develop all well and good. But, if they do develop to the point where they are making a show business career they will not be in Saint John very long.

Senator Smith: I suppose with the new proposals with regard to Canadian content this sort of search and development would be a much more useful exercise for you, perhaps more so than it has been in the past?

Mr. Stewart: Yes. If we get better programming, Senator, it will be useful. I may say that we have had no great problem in adhering to 55 per cent Canadian content. I think at this time our station schedules closer to 60 per cent Canadian content. This becomes more difficult as the market becomes...

Senator Smith: You are speaking, of course, of television?

Mr. Stewart: Yes, I am not connected with radio.

Senator Smith: Yes, there is some other local talent that I see quite frequently up here and it is in the person of Senator Fournier. I saw his program one time and I thought he did a very fine job for you.

Mr. Stewart: We did as well sir.

Senator Smith: It is the kind of thing that...

Mr. Stewart: We are hoping to have him back. He is not on now at his request because he is quite busy. We had a high regard for the Senator and for the programs he did.

Senator Smith: He gave us an hour or so dissertation in the Senate not so many days ago on highway safety and so on which of course is a useful thing and it is good that you have found someone like that. There is another talent in that area of education and entertainment combined perhaps, in the person of a chap whose writings I have followed quite closely and I admire him very much—I find him amusing, perhaps a little more than that, and that is Alden Nowlan—you know who I am talking about, of course. He is associated with the Department of English at UNB and is a poet of some note in some people's estimation. Do you ever use a person like that?

Mr. Stewart: We haven't made specific use of Mr. Nowlan, but when you say a person like that—yes, we have used a member of the Faculty of Arts of the University of New Brunswick to present a series in prime time on basically how to draw, and we have used people who were connected with the university on several occasions. I am in the midst of correspondence right now with someone who is connected with UNB who is interested in doing a series of courses on management who wants to discuss with us putting six of these on television and we are very interested.

Senator Smith: I have a note here to ask someone a question with regard to the effect of whatever changes might be finalized with regard to the commercial rules.

The Chairman: I believe you could put this question to Mr. Cromwell, Senator.

Senator Smith: I think it was referred to in the brief, Mr. Chairman, in which they indicated that it might interfere, for example, with public service announcements if it came out the way it appears to be coming out.

Mr. Cromwell: Well, I would suspect that they are referring, those who do, to the limitation of interruptions in a program and coupled with this the limitation of 12 minutes per hour for commercial content. If you combine these two together, it would seem to preclude the use of public service announcements or promotion announcements in this hour. Because if they are to be considered as commercials—whether they are or not, restricts their use. I won't say it will restrict their use on television as such, because I doubt if there are very many stations who are sold out and who have all of their availabilities sold, but it might change the position to where we are moving public service to off periods, or mornings, or afternoons, or less desirable times. As it is now, we have good positions open in class A time and these are used for good purposes for service clubs, and so on.

Senator Smith: It has been brought to my attention—this relates to news and I don't know who would like to answer the question...

The Chairman: Well, if it is news we might perhaps put it to Mr. Donovan who is the news chief.

Senator Smith: It has been brought to my attention that CHSJ television carried very good coverage on the subject of pollution of the Saint John harbour—even went to the extent of naming what was in other news broadcasts in other parts of the country and the main source of the pollution. Was that a bold step in relation to what you have done before? I have also been informed that the Saint John newspaper didn't give the same coverage to it. I haven't checked my last statement and I would like to be corrected if I am wrong. Did you look over your shoulder when that was part of the news broadcast?

Mr. W. K. Donovan, Managing Editor, News, New Brunswick Broadcasting Co. Limited: I would say simply, Senator, it was a major story and was treated as such. It was as simple as that.

The Chairman: Mr. Costello?

Mr. Costello: Exactly the way the newspaper treated it, as a major story.

Senator Smith: I wasn't able to find the issue, but it was my impression that that was polarized...

Mr. Costello: Well, unfortunately, that was not the case and I believe tear sheets have been submitted to you...

Senator Smith: Well, they haven't come to my attention. It really was a minor point but there is a major point, of course, back of the whole thing which you will understand. I would like to follow this up just for a moment. I was invited some time ago to be one of the judges for this year's Gillin Award which as you know is sponsored by the CAB and given to the radio station which in the judgment of those particular judges in any year has performed the best community service. Last year it was won by a pair of Montreal stations who carried on a very worthwhile, apparently, campaign to make the people aware of pollution. Have you ever thought in your programming that this would be a subject of a special interest, as it would be in Halifax, to treat in depth and make the people aware of what the problem is now and can be in the future; also let these same people who complain about pollution in on the secret of how much it would cost and what the effect of the cost would be on those who are concerned with it. Have you ever thought of doing a story in depth for a series on radio and television?

The Chairman: Mr. Cromwell?

Mr. Cromwell: Well actually up to this point in time we haven't gone into programming in depth outside of the program which we call News-scope in which competent people and knowledgeable people are invited to discuss various subjects such as you are suggesting. We go into depth quite a bit, I think, in this area on various subjects and that certainly would be one of the subjects that would be covered by Mr. Donovan, who is the moderator of the show.

Senator Smith: What kind of subjects...

The Chairman: Well, Senator, I just had a supplementary question on that, if I may.

Senator Smith: Yes.

The Chairman: You listed in the News-scope area—I think there are probably 10 or 12 pages with 10 or 12 programs on each page—somewhere in the neighbourhood of 125 programs listed but I didn't see any of them on pollution. Have there been programs on pollution?

Mr. Donovan: I believe, Mr. Chairman, that that is a partial list. There is one program that comes to mind where it is in connection with the introduction of the Canada Water Act and the minister involved had to alter his scheduling and fly from Fredericton to Saint John specifically to do the program. We had the provincial minister of national resources in.

The Chairman: So there have been programs on pollution?

Mr. Donovan: Yes.

The Chairman: Thank you.

Senator Smith?

Senator Smith: I move from that to ask you whether or not editorial commentary has a place on your news broadcasts. When I listen to the news in Ottawa in the morning and, in fact, when I am back in my home town the national news or news of a natural nature is hooked into a program in which I get the commentary program. It is a free choice given to that person who has been selected to comment on what he thinks is the story of the day or what is happening today. Do you do anything like that?

Mr. Stewart: If I knew the programs to which you are referring, Senator, I could be more specific.

Senator Smith: Well, I am referring to what I listen to which is the eight o'clock news on the CBC followed by a commentary. They used to call it "Preview Commentary." It is now just a commentary.

Mr. Stewart: Not as such. You would be I think asking me if, for instance, a freelance broadcaster would be given five minutes to discuss a certain topic?

Senator Smith: No, not necessarily freelance.

Mr. Stewart: Not as such. We use our own staff for this. But with regard to editorial comment within the news, definitely no. We try to interpret the news within our news broadcasts, but we do not want editorial comment on either radio or television. This is partly station policy which is made above my head and perhaps Mr. Cromwell could answer that better than I could.

Mr. Cromwell: I think perhaps we certainly would consider it. I think our news operation is an evolutionary process, if I may go back because I have been there for 32 years and I have seen the way it has progressed. If I go back just prior to the fifties a news department as such in our radio operation just did not exist. It was an announcer who was handed a sheet of paper or reading the back page and I suppose this was similar to many stations. However, when we became involved in television within about the second year of the operation, we started to develop a news department of our own; one where we attempted to get competent people. We felt that in television and radio, the approach was different from newspapers and that it was not exactly the same type of news reporting. From that point, we have developed a news department which started off with two men and has approximately nine, I would say, now and a half a dozen correspondents around the province, and cameramen. This is an autonomous unit within our organization that has developed to a point where I think it is very efficient now.

The Chairman: Mr. Cromwell, what do you mean by autonomous?

Mr. Cromwell: Well I mean it functions as a unit within the organization and serves both radio and television. We don't have a separate news department for radio and television as such. This is under the direction of Mr. Stewart and Mr. Donovan. This operates without any influence from management.

The Chairman: Why do you combine the operations?

Mr. Cromwell: Well, this is an evolution of experiment. We have done it both ways. I started to describe the way we developed the news department. At first, it was a single unit and then we looked at the situation and separated radio from television. I just can't remember the years, but for a period of two or three years the radio was separate from the television department. They were in separate buildings which, of course, was part of the reason that we had separate people and there was very little interchange between them. When we got into our new plant in 1967 or 1968 we started to bring it together and frankly it has worked out very well. It is much more efficient, we have a better news service and we are able to give radio what it requires and television what it requires.

Now, we do have people in that operation who work exclusively for radio, such as reporters and writers, and we do have people in that operation who write exclusively for television, but the basis of the news operation as far as the city hall reporting, and this sort of thing, actually comes under one department.

Senator Smith: Mr. Cromwell, what connection, if any, would you have in your news department with the Saint John Telegraph-Journal Evening Times Globe.

Mr. Cromwell: The only connection we would have with it is what we read in the paper. Frankly, we have no direct connection.

The Chairman: Why?

Mr. Cromwell: We feel that we are competitors to the newspaper. We feel that we have a different purpose. Radio serves it a little differently and it complements newspapers. Very often newspapers will develop a story which is continuing and radio picks it up and carries it through. You turn to your radio to find out what is going on. Conversely, radio or television might develop a story and if you want detail in depth I think you have to go to the press for this, but we do not have any direct connection between the two news departments.

Senator Smith: I have never had any experience in the media except in the early days of formation of a radio station in my own district down there, but it does seem to me that there must have been lots of news sources and people who write well who are employed by a newspaper owned by the same company or published by the same company which is your ultimate boss, and isn't it in the interest of your viewer to get the best team you can? I just don't follow the reason that you gave.

Mr. Cromwell: I didn't necessarily...

Senator Smith: To get their business because they are competitors...

Mr. Cromwell: I didn't necessarily mean it wasn't a good thing, but I think they are probably pretty well concerned with their own operation. If I may go back to the time earlier when we were getting news from newspapers—and I don't know whether Mr. Costello would like to hear this or not—we found frankly that a newspaperman is more interested in newspaper than he is in radio or television. We felt if we had our own people concentrating in our own media. The way that we felt it should be operated—I would say if we were unable to get competent people and we didn't have this field we have of good people, we might very well have to rely on the newspaper.

The Chairman: I believe Mr. Costello would like to add a comment.

Mr. Costello: I will just make a very brief comment. It is quite possible the radio and television station might like to have access to some of our writers, but frankly our people on the newspaper are extremely busy and their first responsibility and continuing responsibility is to the newspaper. A good competitive situation has developed, and I think that is the way we would like to keep it. We think we are serving the community better now with competition than we were previously. That is the newspaper and radio and television.

The Chairman: Mr. Costello, let me put a question to you which is not entirely hypothetical.

Mr. Costello: Fine.

The Chairman: Suppose you personally had access to a very significant news story—a major event national or local, or whatever it is, but you were the first person to hear of it—somebody came to you and said “Here is a good story.” What would you do with it? Would you give it to your television-radio news director or would you take it to the newspaper?

Mr. Costello: Well, the newspaper has had a good number of stories develop over the years and I can’t remember calling the radio and television and saying “Here is a story that you should be on or you should be on it before the newspaper.” However, that does not suggest that I would not do this.

The Chairman: But you are the President of the broadcasting company.

Mr. Costello: That is correct.

The Chairman: I dare say that the presidents of most other broadcasting companies in Canada in a similar situation—I spy Mr. Waters—he is coming before the Committee after Easter and I am sure if the same thing happened to Mr. Waters he would immediately phone his news director. You wouldn’t?

Mr. Costello: No, I didn’t say I wouldn’t.

The Chairman: Oh, I am sorry.

Mr. Costello: I said that I can’t recall. Now, perhaps Bill Stewart or Bill Donovan can recall...

The Chairman: I realize it is a hypothetical question.

Mr. Costello: But that is not to suggest that I would not and certainly if it were the type of developing story which television should be on with the cameras or radio should be on with a mobile unit, I hope that I would follow it up, yes. It just doesn’t come up very often.

Mr. Stewart: You haven’t been a great deal of help as yet.

Senator Smith: Well, we will leave it at that, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: Senator McElman?

Senator McElman: Have there not actually been occasions, Mr. Costello, in the broadcast stations plus the print media where they have been co-ordinated on a large story or in a specific local issue?

Mr. Costello: I don’t think so. If there is anything that would refresh my memory—but I don’t think so.

Senator McElman: The bridge throughway?

Mr. Costello: No, there was no co-ordination there.

Senator McElman: None whatsoever?

Mr. Costello: None whatsoever. I think I did touch on that when I was here previously and my statement was quite an accurate one. Brigadier Wardell was under this impression living in Fredericton. The bridge throughway was covered. It was a major event taking place in the community, strongly opposed by certain people and strongly supported by others, and the news media as such, radio and television, were reporting what was going on as was the other station located in Saint John.

Senator McElman: There was no conflict though in the approach of the media?

Mr. Costello: There was absolutely no conflict and I hope there will never be any conflict in accurately reporting the news.

Senator McElman: Another occasion I recall was at the time of the breaking of the news on the rather vast conglomerate development of Brunswick Belledune and so on. There was a co-ordination at that time wasn’t there?

Mr. Costello: No. What is the co-ordination that you are referring to?

Senator McElman: The co-ordination of each and all of the media on the same story. They were working together on the same story.

Mr. Costello: Not to my knowledge and I am sure not to the knowledge of anyone here. If an event takes place, if city hall blows up I hope that radio, television and the newspapers will all go and report it, but if you are suggesting that there is some co-ordination beyond this, not that I know of. If reporters are there from radio, television and the newspaper, I think that is a natural event.

Senator McElman: Were you not present yourself as the President of—in both broadcasting and print?

Mr. Costello: On what occasion?

Senator McElman: The last one I was speaking of—Belledune—the Brunswick story.

Mr. Costello: The Brunswick?

Senator McElman: The Brunswick smelter.

Mr. Costello: No.

Senator McElman: Sir, I was there with you.

Mr. Costello: You were not there with me because I was not there. Where did this take place?

Senator McElman: It took place in the office of E.C.L. next to the drydock.

Mr. Costello: No, I was not there.

Senator Smith: What is E.C.L. for our benefit?

The Chairman: Yes, I was going to ask that.

Senator McElman: Engineering Consultants Limited.

Mr. Costello: And the point is no, I was not there and I am very much surprised that you would suggest that I was, and I am very much surprised about your memory of the event.

Senator McElman: I am very surprised too.

The Chairman: Well, I am also surprised!

Mr. Costello: I think this should be clarified. If there is some inference being made—because I just wasn't there.

Senator McElman: Well, I am not making an inference because I am simply asking you of a specific occasion...

Mr. Costello: Well, Senator, you said I was there with you...

Senator McElman: And as to whether there was a co-ordination of the media on that occasion to present the story.

Mr. Costello: The answer is no, and the answer to whether I was there with you is no.

The Chairman: Well, I don't know how, as Chairman of the Committee, I can resolve who was at this meeting...

Mr. Costello: I can only assume that it must be a misunderstanding on the Senator's part, because I don't suggest he would say I was there, if he didn't think I was there.

Senator Smith: We may turn up a picture and that will solve it!

The Chairman: Well, I would like to...

Mr. Costello: I would like to have it clear in his mind that I wasn't there. Was there anyone else there?

Senator McElman: Yes. Mr. John Park, Jr., and Premier Robichaud.

Mr. Costello: Well, I was not there.

Senator McElman: Well, I won't pursue it.

The Chairman: Well, I don't think there is any point in pursuing it because we have a situation in which two men of admitted integrity have a clear misunderstanding. I think the Committee would be interested in resolving the thing ultimately, if we can, either through some source that you may have or through some source that Senator McElman may have...

Senator McElman: Mr. Cromwell perhaps may remember the occasion.

The Chairman: Mr. Cromwell?

Mr. Cromwell: I can say...

Senator McElman: But not necessarily the meeting.

Mr. Cromwell: I can say this that there has been no directive ever issued to me or to any of my people to my knowledge indicating in any way that we should get together with the newspaper or anybody else on the coverage of any story. I just do not receive directives like that.

The Chairman: Mr. Cromwell, let me ask you a question so that we can get away from the point. Your supplementary question, Senator, and I say again to Mr. Costello and to you that I would be most interested in having this followed up, but I don't think we can sit here until one o'clock discussing who was at a meeting, which I don't know about. I hope we can follow it up, however, because I would like to know.

Senator McElman: Yes, I would like to know myself.

The Chairman: Back to you, Mr. Cromwell. You say that you don't receive any directives, so let me be the devil's advocate for a moment. Are directives necessary? You know that Mr. Costello is in the newspaper, you know of his interest, and you know that while you are in competition with the newspaper, and I am sure you are, you know also that Mr. Costello has a responsibility, so would directives be necessary for you to know?

Mr. Cromwell: If you are speaking of specific directives, no. I am aware of the situation there, but I will tell you this. I have been with this station during the time of the present ownership, I was there prior to that, and I have never been inhibited in any way or given any indication that I could not operate the broadcast station in the best interest of the community, or in the best interest of the directors of the CRTC, or the regulatory body, or these associations with the CBC. There has never been any indication implied or direct, or in any other way, of how to program or how to run a news operation, or anything. The only message I get is that we operate a good broadcasting service; that we try to be the best; that we are capable and try to get the capable people to do this, to be responsible and to be fair. I receive no other messages whatsoever.

The Chairman: Well, we are all trespassing on Senator Smith's path and I would like to turn to him shortly. However, I would like to ask one very fast supplementary question. It wasn't clear from the brief when New Brunswick Broadcasting Co. Limited was taken over or purchased by New Brunswick Publishing Limited.

Mr. Cromwell: Well, Mr. Costello could answer that question.

The Chairman: Mr. Costello?

Mr. Costello: That was at the time of the original purchase.

The Chairman: Well, that was what I thought, but I was curious—when did Mr. Irving come into the picture?

Mr. Costello: Well, that was at the time and he purchased...

The Chairman: I was interested in the phraseology that you used.

Mr. Cromwell: Well, I understand that Mr. Irving was connected—26 years...

Mr. Costello: You were talking about going back prior to...

The Chairman: Well, you made the statement that you were there under the other owners.

Mr. Cromwell: Yes, that is correct.

The Chairman: Who were the other owners?

Mr. Cromwell: At that time it was the publishing company, but the people I was involved with at that time had a direct connection with programming...

The Chairman: Well, I am not interested in that for the moment, Mr. Cromwell.

Mr. Costello: The answer is that Mr. McKenna, Mr. Robinson and Mr. McLean were the owners and they also owned the broadcasting company of the day. I think the point that Mr. Cromwell was about to make is that they did take a personal and definite interest and it was more difficult to broadcast professionally at that time when non-broadcast people were involved. May I just add one more thing.

The Chairman: Sure.

Mr. Costello: May I just ask one more question of Senator McElman because this obviously bothers me as it must bother him. Is there any possibility that this was Burgoyne or Hazel or someone, because it bothers a person when you say "You were there" and I wasn't there, and one of us has to be wrong and I don't think Senator McElman would make that statement if he didn't believe it. Is there someone else that could have been there?

Senator McElman: Not to my knowledge.

The Chairman: Why don't you fellows have lunch and thrash it out there.

Mr. Fortier: I just have one question, Mr. Chairman...

The Chairman: Is yours a supplementary?

Mr. Fortier: Yes it is.

The Chairman: Well, Senator Smith has been very patient, but go ahead.

Mr. Fortier: Well, it is very supplementary to everything that has been said for the last 15 minutes, Mr. Chairman. Mr. Cromwell have you ever met Mr. K. C. Irving?

Mr. Cromwell: I would say yes. I have met him at a social function but I have never had any dealings with him with regard to the business at all.

Mr. Fortier: Do you have meetings with Mr. Costello with regard to the broadcasting business?

Mr. Cromwell: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: How often?

Mr. Cromwell: I report directly to Mr. Costello now since he is President of the operation.

Mr. Fortier: How often do you meet with Mr. Costello?

Mr. Cromwell: On quite a regular basis.

The Chairman: Would you meet him every day?

Mr. Cromwell: Oh no, not necessarily.

The Chairman: Every week?

Mr. Cromwell: It could well be.

Mr. Costello: It would be likely that we would talk on the phone but there would not be weekly meetings. We would talk on the phone.

Mr. Fortier: What would you talk to Mr. Costello about, the programming of TV or a radio station, news content, economics, or what?

Mr. Cromwell: Mostly economics that has to do with the business. I think that I am charged with operating a viable operation and nobody likes to go into red figures. These things are of concern today because expenses are creeping up and revenues are going down and these are factors which we must look at. We have just embarked on a rather extensive expansion program to the alternate service system in New Brunswick and we are faced with this, and we are faced with things such as how fast do we expand our colour operations—what is the right time to do it? These are all financial problems which we have to look at.

Mr. Fortier: Does the board of the broadcasting company meet very often?

Mr. Costello: Not as such.

Mr. Fortier: So that all corporate decisions are, in the end, made by Mr. Costello?

Mr. Costello: I think that would be a fair assessment.

The Chairman: I think, Mr. Fortier, we should perhaps return to Senator Smith and I will return to you subsequently. Is that agreeable to you?

Mr. Fortier: Yes, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: Senator Smith?

Senator Smith: Mr. chairman, I have several areas which I think someone should enter before we run out of time. We can't deal with everything in great depth, but I will try to be as concise as I can.

The Chairman: My intention is, for the benefit of all concerned, to adjourn at one o'clock.

Senator Smith: In some of the material which you sent us which is headed Supplementary Material, I read a paragraph or so that referred to your use of the Bureau of Broadcast Measurement and I suppose that simply indicates to you the size of your audience at any given time?

Mr. Cromwell: I think it is a device for measuring audience or program preferences. I think it is relative. I don't know the accuracy of it, but all stations are measured by the same yardstick so it is a guide.

Senator Smith: That particular organization does indicate to you what preference people have for programming. Would that be relevant to your situation—well, it was only recently that you have had two channels there—would it be relevant for you to know...

Mr. Cromwell: No, it really isn't. It hasn't really given us very much of a clue because at the time if you only had one channel you may very well show a program of minority taste and show very well in it and the minute you introduce competition the whole situation changes. I think what it did do is it did give us some indication as to how many people or how many homes were viewing at a given time.

Senator Smith: Well, I didn't think that the Bureau of Broadcast Measurement did anything else. My association with a small broadcasting station was so long ago that their function may have changed some, but I know we were interested in the figures in those particular areas for commercial reasons only.

Mr. Cromwell: I don't know if a figure from the BBM would indicate a program preference. I think what it shows you is how many people watch a program at a given time.

Senator Smith: That is right. In that same material you also referred to polls taken which indicate the audience demand and the audience reaction to your programs. Do you yourselves run other polls to get this information as to the audience preference?

Mr. Cromwell: Well, I think probably what we are referring to is that there are other sources other than BBM which gives us some indication as to program popularity. You get it from various publications.

Senator Smith: This reference was on page 6 of the Supplementary Material in paragraph 19. It states:

Our programming is done on the basis of our own experience in this field and we are guided by audience demand and audience reaction. Polls on programs are taken into consideration.

Do you yourself take those polls or do you hire other services?

Mr. Costello: I believe you are referring to the Bureau of Broadcast Measurement.

Mr. Cromwell: Basically we are influenced by reaction and we get reaction through our base switchboard and get it by mail. Mr. Stewart could answer this question because he is directly involved with out programming schedule.

Senator Smith: Well, I don't think it would be necessary to take the time because some of our people, I am sure, know about the operation of the Bureau of Broadcast Measurement.

Mr. Cromwell: Yes, it is quite an operation and I am sure your researchers would know about that.

Senator Smith: You don't have any other way to take a sample as to whether a certain program or a certain group of programs are receiving a good audience, or received well by your audience? Do you give your listeners a chance—apart from their fundamental right of putting a letter in the mail of course—to make suggestions on programs, and do you let suggestions from your audience?

Mr. Cromwell: I would say that we do get a considerable number of suggestions and if there is something they don't like we certainly hear about that. I will say that we very rarely hear about something that people do like. If they don't like it, we hear about it quickly. We are running a program now—it was mentioned earlier when the Don Messer singing came up—we have another group of people on Saturday afternoon at a time which we thought perhaps wouldn't get very exciting results, but the mail from this is surprising. This is coming from all over the area. We have a woman's program on at 12.30 that we invited somebody from the Government to talk about safety, or something, and we happened to mention that if our viewers would like a little booklet on this that we would be glad to send it out and 350 letters came in within two days. It was a surprising response. So these sort of things give us indication that there are people who do watch and if they are interested enough to write a letter requesting a pamphlet, they are obviously interested in the program.

Senator Smith: Mr. Cromwell, now that you have the competition for listeners coming from the CTV network by the Moncton system, are your people trying to pay a little more attention to your kind of program to make them even more attractive than they have been in the past? In other words, has this been good for you yourself in running an operation?

Mr. Cromwell: I would say yes. I think competition is a good thing and I think we have always tried to do a good job. We can get a little complacent and a little self-satisfied with what we are doing. I am sure they have helped our programming, and I know we have helped their programming, because I can see the improvement.

Senator Smith: I would think it would be the most natural thing in the world for complacency to set in. I might even suggest, to make you feel better about it, that some of us perhaps feel a little too complacent because of our life tenure.

Mr. Cromwell: It also makes it much easier to program. It is very difficult to program a station when there is no competitive signal because you cannot please everybody at the same time.

Senator Smith: Yes.

Mr. Cromwell: No matter what we did we seemed to be wrong because there was always somebody who didn't like it. You might think that hockey is a very popular sport, but I wish you could get at the end of my telephone when we ran a hockey game—you wouldn't believe it.

The Chairman: What would happen if you left the hockey game off?

Mr. Cromwell: The same thing.

The Chairman: You just can't win?

Mr. Cromwell: No, you can't win.

Senator Smith: They would tear the station down!

Mr. Cromwell: That is right.

Senator Smith: This leads me to another area which I don't want to spend too much time on, but perhaps someone else would like to. You indicated in your material that you feel that service to the metropolitan area of Saint John by cable would be, indeed, a very dangerous thing to the welfare of your company, but also because of the side effect it would have on the inability of some of your rural audience to be served at all.

Mr. Cromwell: Well, I think what we are suggesting is that I think it is inevitable that there will be a cable system, but I think there should be caution and we are talking about different areas. When we are talking about Saint John we are talking about a very small area. There are 28,000 homes served by two television stations in metropolitan Saint John.

Senator Smith: Yes.

Mr. Cromwell: And these are the areas where cable will first enter. This is the area where they will make money. Obviously there is no point or commercial value in going up country with the scattered population that you have. So Moncton and Saint John would be the first areas where this penetration would occur. This would be a fragmentation of audience and when you fragment this fewer number of homes and these metro pockets, I think you dilute the viability of the media as an advertising medium. Perhaps if we don't have commercial revenues, and we don't have the funds to operate it could very well be that we would be unable to bring the service that we do. I think right now that we are serving a great area of New Brunswick which is not necessarily economically viable. We have a very powerful transmitter at full power at Bon Accord serving the north part of the province, but frankly there are only 18,000 homes in the whole area that that transmitter covers. I am sure that no commercial entrepreneur in his right mind would ever build a television station to make money on a thing like that, but it is part of the expansion of our operation. If we are hindered too quickly or too rapidly in our ability to continue this kind of service, it could have an effect. This would not happen with large metropolitan areas, but we are dealing with very small population centres.

Senator Smith: Mr. Chairman, just let me ask the question in the same area of Mr. Costello. If my memory serves me correctly, and I am just going on memory—I have no note on this—one of the companies with which you are associated, and I don't know which one, did make an application for a cable TV licence...

Mr. Costello: That is right. There was an application about two years ago, I believe. There was some concern about the future, the same type of concern which is held now. There was concern about what would happen if cable television came to Saint John and fragmented the market. It might be suggested that it was a precautionary application. I believe that would be a correct statement Mr. Cromwell?

Mr. Cromwell: I believe so.

Mr. Costello: I think we would have the same concern now. In fact, a greater concern as cable television seems that much closer, and I think our brief expresses our position. We are quite concerned. If the regulatory body decides after encouraging our company to expand into areas which are not profitable for us, if that same regulatory body then decides that cable television should come at this time to Saint John and Moncton, I think this would be a matter of concern to us.

Senator Smith: Mr. Costello, what you have just said seems to me that your entry into the Moncton market up to this time at least has not been profitable with the capital you had to invest, and so on. I think you make mention of that in some other terms in your brief.

Mr. Costello: Yes.

Senator Smith: What are the prospects for that?

Mr. Costello: I don't think they are bright. I hope the gentlemen over here disagree with me, but I don't think they are very bright. It was not our belief at the time that this was going to increase our revenue and the opposite has been the effect up to now. I don't see any great change in the immediate future. Now, Mr. Cromwell or Mr. Stewart might have some other views on that, but it was a matter of—we are there, we do have the existing station, so this was required and demanded by the public, and I think it was a matter of taking some of the bad with the good.

Senator Smith: What did the CRTC have to do with your decision to move in there?

Mr. Costello: The CRTC suggested that—and that may be too mild a word—it would be an excellent idea if we went to Moncton and Moncton came to Saint John.

Mr. Fortier: Well, they forced you to didn't they?

Mr. Costello: Well...

Mr. Fortier: Let's call a spade a spade. They forced you to do that.

Senator Smith: Well, I was just wondering...

Mr. Costello: Well, I am speaking from memory, but I don't think we were forced.

Mr. Fortier: They forced you to provide what they call the alternate service theory?

Mr. Costello: They came up with a formula and said this would be the directive. I don't think they said "This is the requirement. Do it or else." As a matter of fact, the point I am making is that they did not have to. We were quite happy to go in and do this as part of our service. As part of our service in New Brunswick.

Mr. Fortier: But you hadn't done it until the CRTC suggested you should?

Mr. Costello: As a matter of fact there is nothing you do without CRTC approval, and there were a great many proposals about what was going to happen in Moncton and along the north shore and our section of the province. The CRTC took these various suggestions and had a meeting and said "Here is a formula." This is the way we believe it should be done, and we said "You have hit it right on the nose."

The Chairman: Senator Petten?

Senator Petten: Mr. Costello, I am not as familiar with your native area as I should be for which I apologize, but when you talk about cable television coming in, does this mean they will be picking their signals up from the air from our neighbours to the south, or are you referring to American signals coming in?

Mr. Costello: I think we are basically concerned about the fragmentation of the market no matter how this is done.

Senator Petten: As I say I am not as familiar with this as I should be. Can you pick these signals up from south of the border?

Mr. Costello: Well, I don't think we can at the present time.

Mr. Cromwell: At present a direct pickup is very difficult. I think that technically anything is possible, but economically it is not practical. There are people with schemes to get around it, but...

Senator Petten: Well, I was not referring to North Bay couldn't they bring it in to the Saint John market?

Mr. Cromwell: Well, they could by microwave.

Senator Smith: Yes, that is what I am saying, and of course the present policy of the CRTC...

Senator Petten: Well, I was not referring to the microwave...

Mr. Cromwell: Directly, no. We are just too far away for any practical purpose.

The Chairman: Senator Smith?

Senator Smith: Mr. Chairman, I just have one other area of questioning and I don't think it would take too long. This is with regard to the CBC affiliation. In your judgment and experience over the years has that been a satisfactory arrangement both for your viewers and for your operations?

Mr. Cromwell: I think by and large it is. I think there is a good mix, a good balance, and I think the program content of national interest and concern is good balance. I have been on various committees in the early stages and they will listen to the problems of the private stations.

Senator Smith: The people from London this morning, and you probably heard them, referred to the contract—the back page or the fine print being very tough and that they had you over a barrel...

Mr. Cromwell: I think perhaps there are terms in effect which say that if it is in the national interest they can pre-empt anything that we are doing at any time. In other words, let us say we are operating between five and eight o'clock where we are programming our own station before we join the network and it is conceivable that they could demand that time for any emergency.

Senator Smith: Has anyone from your company had an opportunity to be a member of the advisory committee of the network or the rates committee?

Mr. Cromwell: Yes. Mr. Stewart is on it now and I have been in the past.

Senator Smith: What opportunities do you have to make beefs and can you get anywhere if you have beefs over programming or rates?

Mr. Stewart: There have been times when we have made points, Senators, but they don't come easily.

Senator Smith: Was your station, or did you happen to be a member of the advisory committee at the time the CBC, according to something I read, did do some consulting with member stations of the network on the program "This Hour has Seven Days." Were you people consulted whether that program should remain on or be taken off?

Mr. Stewart: No. I think I had discussions with the relations department of the CBC, but they did not sound us out for an official opinion on that, no.

Senator Smith: Does this sort of thing happen very often when they would even sound you out? Do they regularly or even occasionally ask you for your opinion on certain kinds of programs?

Mr. Stewart: Yes, occasionally, would be a fair statement.

Senator Smith: Do they ask you questions on the subject of good taste whether your audience thinks that a certain kind of programming is or is not in good taste?

Mr. Stewart: Not formally. In an informal way I have even had discussions with the President of the CBC. When he visited the area he wanted to discuss his programs with us and we had a very good discussion. We did tell him at that time that there were things that they did which did not sit well with our audience. Part of the problem is because we are in a different time zone and some programs that may make sense at a certain hour in a more metropolitan area we don't believe is the type of program which should be presented at the time we receive it. At lot of this has improved since they instituted the pre-release which in effect puts the programs an hour earlier on the same clock hour as they are in the central time zone.

Senator Smith: Mr. Stewart, do you carry the CBC national news every night?

Mr. Stewart: Yes, sir.

Senator Smith: And what hour would you get it?

Mr. Stewart: We now get it at eleven which is the result of the pre-release which is an improvement, because we used to get it at midnight. It was just too late.

Senator Smith: As I can remember the programming that comes on the network, on occasions the national news on Sunday is followed by a free time political broadcast?

Mr. Stewart: Yes, sir.

Senator Smith: Have you ever had your audience measured to see who stays up that late in the Saint John area to listen to a political broadcast at 11.15 or 11.20, or whatever it is?

Mr. Stewart: Yes. Most of our measuring comes through BBM. But just to clarify our point that was made earlier we have circulated our audience with a form they could report back to us on the program and Mr. Cromwell doesn't do it now, but there is another one on my desk where I am proposing we do this type of sample. I would think that the watchers on Saturday night—this pre-release doesn't apply Saturday night and there is one of these programs on Saturday night and one on Sunday. The one which is on Saturday night—pre-release can't do anything with Saturday night because the hockey is live and it comes on after midnight. The only thing that saves it or which keeps the audience there at that time is the fact that we play a feature movie immediately after it. If we were signing off after that and not playing a feature movie that late at night, our experience is that the audience would drop down to something like 7 or 8 per cent.

Senator Smith: Do you ever get complaints from people that they are unable because of the nature of their employment—they have to go to work the next morning—that they cannot stay up even for that eleven o'clock news and certainly not for the free time political broadcast, which many of us think is in the national interest for a great many people to listen to, whether they agree with it or whether they don't agree with it?

Mr. Stewart: Candidly, Senator, I can't recall ever having anybody tell me that they watched either of those political programs.

Senator Smith: Well, perhaps they would never watch if it was on at that hour.

Mr. Stewart: The last time that we presented these programs we presented them on Sunday afternoon. I would suspect—as a matter of fact, I am certain there are more people who would watch them at that time.

The Chairman: Did you carry on radio a report from the local member?

Mr. Donovan: No, not apart from the news.

The Chairman: Has he ever asked you to do this?

Mr. Donovan: Not to my knowledge.

The Chairman: Would you do it if he asked you?

Mr. Donovan: Well, you would have to tell me which local member you are talking about because there are several.

The Chairman: Would you differentiate?

Mr. Donovan: No. But I would think if you do it for one you would have to do it for them all.

Senator Smith: I think what the Chairman is likely referring to is the system that was developed by CAB some years ago, indeed it was more than 20 years ago when I was in the House of Commons. Every member from the House of Commons from that day on would go downtown and put something on a tape and they would be played automatically over their local radio station all across this country. I am surprised that your station hasn't been in that scheme because I thought they all did it.

I think I will wrap up my reference to the CBC affiliation by one final question.

The Chairman: Fine.

Senator Smith: The CAB made a suggestion to us that the CBC—as a matter of fact they actually recommended to us that the CBC should be nothing more or less than a programming organization. Do you agree with that?

Mr. Cromwell: I don't know if I subscribe to it entirely. I think it is perhaps a little late to be talking about that. This is nothing new, of course, in the Association of Broadcasters. It would seem that it takes such a great deal of capital and a great deal of money to develop Canadian talent, to produce Canadian programming, and this money must come from some source. I think the basis of their suggestion was that the money that was funnelled into the actual physical operations and the hardware of broadcasting might well be better spent funnelled only into production of programming and development of talent. Whether this is a practical scheme at this point in time, I don't know.

Senator Smith: Could your company get along under the present circumstances without CBC affiliation?

Mr. Cromwell: Well, I wouldn't envisage—to get back into the former question—that the CBC would cease to exist. I don't think it is the Association's impression or intent that there be no CBC. I think it is just a different function of the same organization and whether it actually operated transmitters or just operated as a program source, I don't know. I think it is a condition of the licence of various private broadcasters that they carry as much or if not more than we carry now originating from the CBC, except that conceivably it would be better quality because there would be more money available to be spent on it. It wouldn't affect anything in New Brunswick because the transmitters are in existence now and they are not CBC transmitters—they are privately operated. So as long as the program material is funnelled through it by no matter what means it would make no difference.

Senator Smith: Well, the answer then to my last question is that you think there would be a difficulty to get along without the affiliation with the CBC?

Mr. Cromwell: Yes, you have to have some source.

Senator Smith: The CTV is right in your area as well?

Mr. Cromwell: Of course.

Senator Smith: That is all I have, Mr. Chairman. Thank you.

The Chairman: I wonder whether Mr. Costello could tell me whether or not he belongs to the Canadian Association of Broadcasters?

Mr. Costello: I think Mr. Cromwell could. Do I belong George?

Mr. Cromwell: Well, the station does.

Mr. Costello: Well, I get the material but I am not an active member.

The Chairman: You are not an active member of the Canadian Association of Broadcasters so really my next question is perhaps an unfair one. I was going to ask you which organization does the best job for its medium—the CDNPA or the CAB. You have disqualified yourself. You may comment if you wish but you have said that you are an inactive member.

Mr. Costello: The only comment I would make is that you are right, it is a terribly unfair question and I am delighted that I am disqualified.

The Chairman: Are you active in CAB activity, Mr. Cromwell?

Mr. Cromwell: Yes, I am on the board of directors at the present time.

The Chairman: But the actual member of the CAB—how does it work?

Mr. Cromwell: Well, the station is the member.

The Chairman: And how many people go from the station?

Mr. Cromwell: Each station has one voting delegate.

The Chairman: And you are it?

Mr. Cromwell: I would be it or I could designate someone else.

The Chairman: It is not Mr. Costello?

Mr. Cromwell: Well, it could be.

The Chairman: He could be?

Mr. Cromwell: Yes.

The Chairman: But he doesn't wish to attend.

At page 3 of your brief, Mr. Costello, you say:

"We do not know if there will be further concentration of ownership, but it seems likely."

Does it seem likely in New Brunswick that there will be a further concentration of ownership?

Mr. Costello: Somehow I doubt it.

The Chairman: You were referring to other provinces other than New Brunswick?

Mr. Costello: Yes.

The Chairman: Mr. Fortier?

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Cromwell, what tangible benefits, if any, flow from the fact that your broadcasting company is owned by a conglomerate?

Mr. Cromwell: I think there are many benefits. I think this has been the reason why we have been able to develop broadcasting to the state it is in in New Brunswick. I might point out that if it was not this way I would think we would be much slower in developing television and colour and the various other things.

Mr. Fortier: If what would not be what way?

Mr. Cromwell: I mean if we were owned by a single person, a single owner—I just don't think...

Mr. Fortier: Are there any disadvantages which you have experienced over the years in being a member of a conglomerate, a company amongst many belonging to Mr. K. C. Irving?

Mr. Cromwell: I have not experienced any difficulty because of the fact that there has been no interference or any direct operational interference with any of the other companies. We have operated as a broadcasting unit and we always have. I would suppose, if I may go back a number of years, that if this thing were a fact and it were happening I wouldn't be with them. I think it is a very healthy situation as far as we are concerned and I think through this whole ownership system we were able to bring to New Brunswick a television system and the whole thing.

Mr. Fortier: You seem to paint a very positive picture. Surely all cannot always be roses?

Mr. Cromwell: No.

Mr. Fortier: Have you had any complaints at all to ever direct to Mr. Costello?

Mr. Cromwell: Complaints in what area, Mr. Fortier?

Mr. Fortier: In the way that the company was managed; in the way that funds were made available or not made available?

Mr. Cromwell: I have never had any complaints. The only complaints that I have ever received that I can remember have been about programming problems. If somebody doesn't like something...

The Chairman: No, I think the point Mr. Fortier is making, Mr. Cromwell, is complaints that you have made to Mr. Costello.

Mr. Fortier: To the owner. Have you ever said to the owner through Mr. Costello, I wish to heck this would happen, or I wish I had that money, or I wish this had not happened?

Mr. Cromwell: Well, my experience is that every time we have gone into any exercise that has to do with the enlargement of the operation or the improvement of it, I receive a very receptive reception.

Mr. Fortier: So you have no beef to take with the owner at the moment?

Mr. Cromwell: Not at the moment.

Mr. Fortier: All is well in the best of all worlds?

Mr. Cromwell: I think we are very fortunate that we have this system.

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Costello, what benefits, if any, exist from the fact that your company owns and publishes newspapers as well as owns and operates broadcasting stations?

Mr. Costello: I don't see benefits, tangible benefits. I see the type of benefit that Mr. Cromwell refers to. That is that the primary objective is not simply to make money, its to provide a service. I think that is a benefit in New Brunswick. In the physical sense we have excellent facilities for the newspaper and the radio and television station. Beyond this we are developing the type of professional broadcasters we are capable of developing.

Mr. Fortier: Are there ever any horizontal moves between, say, employees of a newspaper who would move to the broadcasting operation or vice versa? Has this ever happened?

Mr. Costello: It doesn't happen as a rule.

Mr. Fortier: Has it ever happened?

Mr. Costello: Yes. I think people have gone from newspaper to the broadcasting company.

Mr. Fortier: Supposing, Mr. Costello, that you were the owner—supposing that you were Mr. K. C. Irving whom you represent here today and you were asked to divest yourself of either your print media interest or your electronic media interest, which one would you sacrifice?

Mr. Costello: Well, if I were asked I would not divest myself of either.

Mr. Fortier: Well, I am asking you to answer just a purely hypothetical question. Which one is most important to you as an owner, the newspaper or the broadcasting?

Mr. Costello: To the owner—I don't know what the owner would answer to that.

Mr. Fortier: Has he ever mentioned it to you?

Mr. Costello: No, I don't think that he plans on divesting.

Mr. Fortier: No, but has he never said that he took great pleasure from the fact that he owns newspapers and that he took less pleasure from the fact that he owns radio and television stations?

Mr. Costello: I think the pleasure that is derived is the same pleasure that I would have if I personally produced a better newspaper, and I think the pleasure that Mr. Cromwell will have if he produces better radio or television. There is an emotional pleasure or some satisfaction I think it would be in this area. I think Mr. Irving is pleased to see the physical development of the plants. I think he is pleased to see the type of improvement which we maintain in both the television and radio and in the newspapers.

Mr. Fortier: What about the economic pleasure or economic satisfaction? Which one is a more viable economic entity? The newspaper side of the business or the broadcasting side of the business?

Mr. Costello: Well I think at the moment that the newspaper is in a little stronger position than the broadcasting.

Mr. Fortier: Again I am assuming that you are the owner. Mr. K. C. Irving has invested you with all his interest in the New Brunswick Publishing Company Limited and you are forced to take this decision for whatever reason it may be—not necessarily governmental interference, but you are forced to divest yourself. Which one would you let go?

Mr. Costello: Frankly, someone else would have to decide. I would not decide.

Mr. Fortier: You mean the owner wouldn't decide?

Mr. Costello: I don't know what he would do but if it was me, someone would have to say—you would have to say, you are going to get rid of this or else.

Mr. Fortier: Well, I am saying it.

Mr. Costello: Well, then you say which one.

The Chairman: Well, Mr. Fortier, I think the witness has answered.

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Cromwell...

The Chairman: Well, before you go on, Mr. Fortier, may I say it is three minutes after one and I have Senator McElman wanting to ask a question and Senator Smith. I would like to ask one question and we have to be back at 2.30 p.m. to meet Mr. Berton—I can't let this thing spin on endlessly, so would you complete your line of questioning?

Mr. Fortier: All right, Mr. Chairman. Just one last question.

The Chairman: And then I will ask for Senator McElman's question, then I will put my own and then Senator Smith may have the final question.

Mr. Fortier: I will pass, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: No, please go ahead.

Mr. Fortier: No, Mr. Chairman. I will pass.

The Chairman: You are seldom so easily intimidated. Please go ahead.

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Cromwell, you said earlier that you read Saint John newspapers. How do you regard them?

Mr. Cromwell: I find them good papers.

Mr. Fortier: What do you think of the Telegraph-Journal? Is it a good paper or a bad paper?

Mr. Cromwell: I think it is a good paper. I don't know whether or not I have actually had an opportunity of comparing it with other newspapers. I know that when I am in Toronto I try to buy the Telegraph-Journal and I think it covers the provincial and local scene very well.

Mr. Fortier: Is the Telegraph-Journal the only paper you read in New Brunswick?

Mr. Cromwell: Well, the other is the evening paper and I also read the Gleaner. I also read the Moncton Times-Transcript.

Mr. Fortier: Do you think these are good English papers?

Mr. Cromwell: I think they do a good job, frankly, yes. I think there is an improvement every year.

The Chairman: Senator McElman?

Senator McElman: Just two brief areas, Mr. Chairman. Mr. Costello, we have had several witnesses of late who have touched on the same point. One of those was here last evening and I think it is almost a direct quote—it is very close in any event, but he suggested that the mass media has the power of deciding which issues become public issues. That is the media can lead in making them public issues or conversely by non-treatment of a social or local issue, they can retard any real possibility of their becoming public issues. Would you agree that the mass media has such a power?

Mr. Costello: I don't know how great the power is but I think in general terms the answer would be yes. The mass media does have some power to influence by what it does and by how it performs, yes.

Senator McElman: Would you agree that that power to influence would be greater where there is a control of a large element—a concentration of ownership of a large element of all the media available in an area. Would there be power to influence—would it become greater or could it?

Mr. Costello: I think you are asking if there is a potential power in existence and I think the answer is probably yes. There is the potential power. I think I would like to add a well, insofar as New Brunswick is concerned that the thing that has been a protection to the company is the responsibility which has been taken by the individual newspaper and by the broadcasting company. This protection is much more apparent, and has been in recent years, than it was years ago. If you would allow me to relate to my own period on the newspaper as publisher—it is about nine years I think—there has been no attempt to use any potential power which might exist. I think it would be ridiculous for me to attempt to argue that if there is some power or some potential power that it is not greater until it extends to a larger field.

Senator McElman: It would accelerate the degree of concentration?

Mr. Costello: It would not necessarily accelerate...

Senator McElman: We are talking potential.

The Chairman: Yes, potential.

Senator McElman: The potential would accelerate?

Mr. Costello: Well...

Senator McElman: With the degree of concentration?

Mr. Costello: That is correct.

Senator McElman: The other area, and believe me Mr. Chairman, I have no intention of trying to convince Mr. Costello that he was at a meeting.

The Chairman: Are we back to the meeting?

Senator McElman: Yes.

The Chairman: O.K.

Senator McElman: I would simply like to recall—Mr. Cromwell, you were the head of the broadcasting operation in October of 1964 were you not?

Mr. Cromwell: That is correct, yes.

Senator McElman: Mr. Costello, you were involved also at that time in broadcasting directly, were you?

Mr. Costello: No.

Senator McElman: But you were president of N.B. Publishing?

Mr. Costello: Correct.

Senator McElman: And in charge of the print media?

Mr. Costello: Correct.

Senator McElman: This is the front page of our newspaper. Do you recall this?

Mr. Costello: Yes, I recall it. I recall every front page.

Senator McElman: Well, I would dispute that you recall every front page. This was a rather extraordinary front page. Banner line—red lead above your own staff—Premier announces a $117 million industrial development program for New Brunswick. Then the black banner line below your own staff—steel mill to cost $64 million—$90 million a year benefit to New Brunswick. And the photograph shows the Premier and John Park, Jr.

standing in front of a chart of some sort showing a part of this projected development.

There is a great editorial on it which sets out how extraordinary this whole thing is—two complete new steel mills, two new mines, concentrator, an acid plant, one of the largest in the world—largest fertilizer and manufacturing plant in the world—all year round shipping harbour on the north shore, new 30,000 ton ore carrier to be built in the Saint John drydock in Saint John which is a $12 million thing in itself. And then we get to page 3—the same day—the whole page, complete again, with a photograph of Mr. Park who was President of Engineering Consultants Limited at that time, I believe, which was a wholly-owned subsidiary of the Irving interests which also owned the newspaper and the radio and television. Here again the charts and again the great reactions, and so on. You recall this event, do you?

Mr. Costello: I recall the event, yes.

Senator McElman: Do either you or Mr. Cromwell recall the event previous to the publication of this?

Mr. Costello: No.

Senator McElman: The meeting?

Mr. Costello: No, I don't recall a meeting. A meeting involving you and myself and...

Senator McElman: John Park?

Mr. Costello: No, I don't recall that.

Senator McElman: Then could I ask would it surprise you—and I am not disputing you—I won't dispute you—if I made a mistake I will certainly retract it, but I must admit I would find it hard to confuse Bert Burgoyne with yourself.

Mr. Costello: So would I.

Senator McElman: In any event, let us forget that aspect of it if we may. Would you find it surprising if I recalled that on this occasion representatives of the broadcast media and of the newspapers did take part in the preparation of this whole production in advance and as Michael Wardell said in his editorial covering this same thing:

"The prime mover in this great new development is, of course, none other than K. C. Irving who stands like a magician, has galvanized a great variety of industries in this province over the past 40 years."

I simply remind you of this. I don't dispute them in any fashion. Would you be surprised if I recalled that, let's say, senior representatives of both broadcast and the print media were brought in to discuss this and the whole thing was laid out. The charts were prepared with the assistance of art staffs so they would show up well on TV and this sort of thing, as well as reproductions in newspapers, and that the whole effort was co-ordinated well in advance. The only flaw, as I recall Mr. Costello, was that although there was a break time on it somebody busted it in Halifax in advance. You may recall that.

Mr. Costello: No.

Senator McElman: You don't recall that either?

Mr. Costello: No.

Senator McElman: Even though they had a break on your paper, you don't recall it?

Mr. Costello: Well, I will answer the question if it has been completed.

Senator McElman: Would it surprise you?

The Chairman: Well, I am not sure what the question is?

Senator McElman: I am asking if he has any recollection of the co-ordination that took place?

Mr. Costello: No. I will try to answer that one as well, but the question which you asked me was would it surprise me if this sort of thing did take place and the answer is no it would not surprise me. It could take place at any time. If a press conference was called, if that's what it was...

Senator McElman: Well, it wasn't really a press conference.

Mr. Costello: Well, whatever it was to arrange for the release of information and the radio and television and newspapers were called in—no, that would not surprise me at all on a thing of that size.

Senator McElman: Any comment, Mr. Cromwell?

Mr. Cromwell: I have no recollection of it, but I would suppose that if anybody were called in, it would be on a program level, but I wasn't connected with it so I really don't have any knowledge.

Senator McElman: You don't recall it?

Mr. Cromwell: No, I don't recall it.

Senator McElman: Were there not preparations in your studio? This was your old studio?

Mr. Cromwell: There very well could have been, but since I wasn't involved with it I don't recall.

Senator McElman: You weren't involved?

Mr. Cromwell: No, I wasn't involved but perhaps Mr. Stewart recalls this.

Mr. Stewart: Yes, I recall some preparations. There were preparations made for paid broadcasts and we were asked to arrange a network of stations, if I remember correctly, which we did. I produced a program and the only other thing that I know, that I recall, was that there was great secrecy about it. The talk was put on teleprompter, I believe, and that was delivered to me a matter of an hour or less before the program went on the air in order to safeguard against a premature break on the thing. The program, I think, went on the air somewhere between 6.30 and 7 and I produced it.

Senator McElman: Well, you recall, Mr. Stewart, that it did break in Halifax?

Mr. Stewart: I recall hearing, but I wasn't sure—I don't recall that it was a newspaper—I was under the impression that it was broadcast.

Senator McElman: That it was radio?

Mr. Stewart: Yes.

Senator McElman: Well, the point of the whole exercise is that I do recall it very clearly that there was co-ordination. There was no press conference as such. There was a co-ordination. The co-ordination was done not at the insistence of government, but at the insistence of E.C.L., a wholly-owned subsidiary, under the direction of Mr. John Park.

Mr. Costello: Well, that is information that you have and I am not familiar with it.

Senator McElman: Fine.

The Chairman: Do you have a question Senator Smith?

Senator Smith: Yes, Mr. Chairman. I would like to wind up this questioning if I could on the same general area that I started out on and that is programming. I would like to ask Mr. Stewart for his comments on this particular information which I had a note on but I haven't turned it up in time to ask the question before. You give a list—a rather lengthy list of, say, eight, or nine, or ten pages of the subject and the names of those who participated in your various "Newscope" programs over a certain period of time. The first one on the list of subjects is "controversial organization opposition to bilingualism and biculturalism." Participating—Elton, Killam, Vice-President of Maritime Loyalists Association. On the last page of this summary of participation, and so on—at the top of the last page you have under the subject heading Maritime Loyalists Association; Participating—Elton Killam, Moncton.

I fail to find any reference at all in the Newscope program on the other side and the generally accepted side that biculturalism and bilingualism is a potent force in this country today supported by all the political parties in the House of Commons. Have you any comment to make on that?

Mr. Stewart: Mr. Donovan is more qualified, Senator, but one comment I would like to make—I think the fact that that is there twice is a duplication. I don't think Mr. Killam went on the air twice and I am quite sure that we have had a number of people on a variety of programs speaking on biculturalism and bilingualism and Mr. Donovan may recall exactly who they were.

Mr. Donovan: Senator Smith, Senator McElman may have seen the program or heard of it—the Maritime Loyalists Association with Mr. Elton Killam?

Senator McElman: I have seen all I want!

Senator Smith: I have heard about it as well.

Mr. Donovan: The one on the last page was simply a duplication. The other side has been explored and if it will ease your mind I think most people thought it was critical, a critical interview with Mr. Killam.

Senator McElman: I would like to say that at that instance, as in most instances, Mr. Donovan did a tremendous job of exposing extremists to the people of New Brunswick and thereby, I think, played a part in disposing of them.

The Chairman: I wonder Mr. Costello—you were the first witness we had before this Committee, so just before we adjourn do you think this has been a full study of the media and a professional examination?

Mr. Costello: I hope it has been. I fear it may not have been. I fear you may not have had enough time, I fear you may not have had enough money, I fear that you may in some areas be examining past history which is perhaps all part of the inquiry. So these are my fears, but I would also like to say that yesterday I was in Quebec City and was asked to speak at a service club. I said then and I say it again that I believe that the newspapers of Canada—perhaps I am a little bit oriented towards the newspapers—but the newspapers of Canada should benefit and I believe will benefit from the inquiry which has taken place. I think it has been a very strong reminder to the media of our responsibility. I also said that I do not envy you or your colleagues the chore which you now face.

The Chairman: Which awaits us.

Mr. Costello: Yes.

The Chairman: Thank you. I should say that we are grateful to you and your broadcasting colleagues for coming to the Committee. It has been a helpful presentation. Much has been said at these hearings about the media in New Brunswick, as I am sure you know, and the contribution today will be useful in helping us prepare the ultimate report. I can assure you we do not minimize the task which is in front of us.

Thank you very much.

The Committee adjourned at 1.20 p.m.

Upon commencing at 2:30 p.m.

The Chairman: Honourable Senators, if I may call this session to order. The witness this afternoon, as I am sure you will realize, is Mr. Pierre Berton. I was just mentioning to Mr. Berton that the last time I introduced him I attempted to give a humorous introduction, which I thought I did, but he one-upped me so completely in his opening remarks that I decided to play this one perfectly straight.

I will tell you that he was born in Whitehorse, July 12th, 1920. He was educated at Victoria College, Victoria, British Columbia, and the University of British Columbia. There is a long list of things he had done since and is presently doing and I am sure the Senators are more than familiar with Mr. Berton's involvement with many phases of the media.

I should say to you, Mr. Berton, that what we try to do in these hearings is have a mix. We have attempted, of course, and understandably so, to have a representative group of media publishers, and owners, but we have tried to liven the mix with organizations such as the Canadian Consumers' Association, the Canadian Labour Congress and many other organizations. As well we have tried to bring nationally-known communicators from Gerry Goodis to Douglas Fisher, including Mr. Charles Templeton and yourself.

We are grateful that you have found time to be here and I for one realize, and I am sure that most of the Senators do, that you really are one of the busiest people in Canada. We think there is a great deal that you can contribute to this study.

Having said those things I will turn it over to you, but I would like to suggest that perhaps you begin with an opening oral statement. You may take as long as you may feel is required and following that we would like to question you on things you say and perhaps on things you don't say.

Mr. Pierre Berton: I would be delighted, Senator Davey, and Honourable Senators. Thank you very much for having me; it is a pleasure to be here. I represent, as I am sure you know, nobody but myself; therefore, perhaps my remarks won't carry too much weight. I would like to say a few things verbally and informally on both newspapers and broadcasting, both of which I have been associated with, but first on the press.

It has been thirty years since I started in the business of journalism as a cub on the Vancouver News-Herald and I can't really remember a time when the press of this country has been threatened as it is threatened today. I think the threats are both exterior and interior because I think the newspapers themselves contain the seeds of their own demise. They are often enough their own worst enemies. But I want to talk first about the exterior threats because I think they are profound and dangerous.

I have never seen in all my years, and wouldn't have believed it when I began, having listened to so many luncheon club speeches about freedom—I have never seen so many attempts at censorship of the press by the police and the municipal authorities of this country. Now, I am not talking about the daily press which doesn't get censored in that way—I am talking about what we call the underground press and you have already heard from them in a discussion which I think is a very healthy manifestation.

It is the first time I have seen really an alternative to the large established publications of this country. I think what we want and desperately need in this country is this kind of alternative. This alternative, which is in generally the form of a weekly informal newspaper published by young people, has been subjected to what I can only describe as unbelievable, scandalous and continual harassment by the municipal authorities and police of several cities in this country.

One thing that concerns me is that although some individual newspapers have written some editorials about this, the press of the country as a whole, the established press, have really not said nearly enough about this, they haven't got nearly as angry as they do when much more minor aspects of the freedom of the press are raised by the community as a whole. As you know because you have been told by the Georgia Straight, we have seen the business licence technique used right across this country from Montreal to Victoria and New Westminster to stop the publication and the distribution of newspapers. I don't really want to repeat what has been said here already, but when the Mayor of a city takes it upon himself to censor papers that he doesn't like, simply because he doesn't like them, by refusing them a business licence—there must be something very, very wrong especially when he seems to have the support of a large section of the public and the tacit support of some daily newspapers.

The situation that existed in Vancouver and New Westminster has also existed in other cities as you know, in Montreal and in the city of Ottawa. I find the remarks of the judge who sentenced eleven vendors of Logos in June of 1968 almost unbelievable in a democracy. Now, in Montreal as you know in 1968 there were about thirty-five arrests of vendors of Logos.

It is clearly established in Montreal that a newspaper does not need a permit to be sold. They got around this by saying that Logos was in the category of books, circulars or brochures, which is absolutely pure nonsense—it is a newspaper in every sense of the word. However, there were eleven vendors arrested, found guilty and fined for the heinous crime of distributing the free press of this country and they were fined $40. each by Judge Gerard Tourangeau on June 16th of 1968. This is what the Judge said—and this is really the crux of the thing—he said, “I would like to assess each accused...” He couldn’t—he had to give them the maximum—“I would like to assess each accused $100 and costs”—and get this—“for, in my opinion, the newspaper in question is of a revolutionary nature, the purpose of which is to spread dissension and dissent.”

Well, as you know, the history of journalism has been to spread dissension and dissent from time to time. If it didn’t do that, it wouldn’t be worth its salt. I was interested that the Judge—having fined these people for selling something that the city insisted were either books, circulars, or brochures—used the word “newspaper” to describe it when he made this totally uncalled for remark. It indicates exactly what was going on—that the business licence was only a device to stamp on, to trample on, the rights of freedom of expression in this country and to put people out of business for publishing remarks which the authorities don’t like because they don’t agree with them. The previous month in Montreal another Judge had three newspaper vendors up before him.

Now you know if you infringe a business licence in a community you don’t get usually hauled and thrown into jail. They issue a warrant for your arrest, a summons is issued and then when the time comes you go before the Court. These are just misdemeanors but these kids are always put into jail and they have to raise bail. Two of these kids who had long hair had to raise $25 bail and the Judge let the kids who had the short hair go away with just paying $20 bail. This often indicates the attitude towards the press and this kind of press in this country.

Often in my dreams—I have a picture of John Bassett putting out a new newspaper in Montreal—he puts out this new newspaper in Montreal and immediately the police pounce on the younger Bassetts who are out selling it and they haul them off to jail saying that you haven’t got a business licence. Can you imagine the row that would be raised by the established press of this country? “Freedom of the press” they would shout, which they often shout when someone says that a boy of fourteen shouldn’t have to get up at six o’clock in the morning to sell newspapers.

Now, the same thing has happened here in Ottawa. I don’t want to really go on too long about this, but I must say I find it unbelievable that police should jump on kids selling newspapers, that they should tell them lies, they should confiscate not just one newspaper as evidence but in some cases three hundred and fifty which is the entire production of the plant, that they should demand bail, that they should obviously attempt to force newspapers out of business.

There were two or three kids who didn’t have a lawyer at this time before it was ruled in the Court that the by-law about licences did not apply to newspapers. As I understand it, the by-law—and my information comes from the Civil Liberties Association of which I am a director and a branch of which was started in the city because of this—is that a minor in this town can get a licence to sell a newspaper for ten cents, but these kids who were selling newspapers were told by the police first that what they were selling wasn’t a newspaper; second that they weren’t minors and third that the licence would cost fifty dollars. Patently untrue. I learn that on the mall here—the Sparks Street Mall—they still can’t sell their newspapers although now there is this documentary evidence in the form of tape recorders and photographs showing that the Citizen and the Journal have been sold on the Mall and nobody has prevented that from being done. I think this is patently unfair and unjust.

In March a newsboy selling not the Citizen or the Journal but an underground paper here was told by the police that he couldn’t shout aloud the headlines. I never walked down the street in any Canadian city where newsboys haven’t shouted the headlines for years and years and years and why is it suddenly...

Senator Beaubien: Would it depend on the headline, would you think, Mr. Berton?

Mr. Berton: I have no idea.

Senator Beaubien: If the headline was a little rough?

Mr. Berton: If the headline is a bit rough and it is against the law, surely the police will arrest that man for obscenity and if it is found obscene, put him in jail. The police have no right making the laws—they only have the right to enforce the laws and if they think the law has been violated, they have a perfect mode of procedure. Now, the obscenity laws have been used, as you know, in many of these newspapers. In Vancouver, the case of the Georgia Straight is perhaps the most famous one—it was found innocent as a matter of fact, but only after so much harassment that one of the Judges said that it seemed to him that this particular publication was being singled out in these obscenity cases.

There are many other papers with an equal number of words, books and magazines of all kinds on sale at the newsstands, but only a certain kind of paper has been singled out. That is as much as I want to say at the moment, but I hope that the Senators on this Committee will take cognizance of this situation because I think it is very dangerous. I think this whole business of freedom of the press has to involve allowing people to say things that we don't like; otherwise we had better stop telling the Russians how much freedom we have.

Now, there is another serious threat to the press which I think is dangerous and that is the threat inherent in the educational system in the high schools, and in fact in some of the universities, where the concept of censorship by the authorities seems to me to be inculcated in almost every student in this country by the example set by the school authorities who insist on censoring, moulding and changing the copy in high school—and in some cases even the universities' papers. If you are a student editor in this country unless you belong to a very enlightened high school which I am quite sure are in the minority, you can't put out a newspaper which is in any sense free. You can't say what you want. You can't say what you think as the editor, you can't say what other kids think in the editorials and sometimes you can't even report what they think. Now, this situation varies from school to school and from city to city. I see a lot of these kids during the year and this is the first complaint they make to me, that they have no freedom to run a newspaper.

Now, if the schools are supposed to be teaching freedom then surely the first place to teach it is by example. Now, sure you will get a lot of lousy newspapers—a lot of them aren't any good anyway and they say a lot of idiotic things but surely the essence of freedom is to be allowed to say the idiotic things and then be attacked for it, but you have the right to stand behind what you say, what you think.

I would hope that the schools over the next few years would become enlightened enough to let the students experiment with newspapers freely. They shouldn't be telling them—in schools that I know about—that they shouldn't be writing about the war in Viet Nam—they can only write on school topics.

To me I think one of the most refreshing things about the students today is that they are not confined in their own minds to the little world of school but they are interested in the world outside them and so often when they try to discuss the world outside them they are not allowed to. In many cases they are not allowed to even discuss the most innocuous things in the school and if the kids are in the schools and they are attacking the school systems by saying this is wrong, they are not allowed to print this type of material. A kid in one of the high schools in Montreal this year—I read a report in the Montreal Star where he had been hitting the curriculum. Nobody stopped him from writing about this, but they wouldn't let him be editor of the student paper anymore and they wouldn't let him lead the student council. I guess he really got under their skins.

So much for exterior problems and exterior pressures in the press. I would like to talk now about the interior pressures which are within the press and within the press's ability I think to solve. They all come really under the heading of alienation of the public. It is my observation that large numbers of people in this country are suspicious of the press. Large numbers of people fear the press, and I think rightly, and there is a goodly number that really hate the press. It is ironic that this should be so because I think that probably most of the newspapers in Canada now are better than they have ever been before. What they are reaping is a legacy of distrust and they are also reaping the fact that the public are also a little bit ahead of them.

It is not the fact that they haven't improved but it is the fact that the public's taste and the public's suspicion has grown sharper. It is not that they are not fairer than they used to be—I think they are and they are more comprehensive—but they are not fair enough and they are not comprehensive enough and they are not good enough and what we are really talking about here is ethics and professional standards.

We hear a lot of talk about ethics in the newspapers and I have heard this talk all m life as a newspaper man, but I have never seen a code of standards—really a code of ethics—there are codes of standards—the kind the medical profession or the legal profession and the other real professions have—exist for the newspaper business in this country. I can cover a lot of ground that has been covered here before about the need for professional associations and if you ask me about that, I will talk about it, but it has been said here already.

I have only three suggestions to make in this area. They deal with journalism schools, with the whole business of newspaper headlines, and with the newspaper Court of Appeal. I don't think the journalism schools are nearly tough enough on the newspapers and I don't think that the newspapers are nearly tough enough on the journalism schools.

I think in the journalism schools even today, and they have improved over the years, there is more emphasis on technique than there needs to be and not nearly enough on philosophy and ethics. I don't see in any of the journalism school calendars a course on ethics and I think the time has come where there ought to be a good one. I don't mean by that that ethics and philosophy are not discussed in the journalism courses; I know that they are because I have been in touch with some of the heads of the schools recently, but they have been discussed in passing on side issues within the context and framework of another course; but really if newspapers are going to change their image in the country, they really have to establish really strong ethics.

I think it is obvious that some of the things that are being discussed now at random in journalism schools are things that have to be codified—things like what actually do you mean by fair reporting? What do you mean by objectivity and can it be achieved or is there too much? What is a reporter's relationship to a subject? What are his duties and responsibilities to his readers as well as to his boss? What is a newspaper's responsibility to its readers as well as to its advertisers?

For instance, in the field of consumer goods a newspaper as far as I can see has very little responsibility to its readers—its responsibility is totally to its advertisers. There are whole editions of newspapers published on Saturdays and week-ends throughout the country which are almost useless and unreadable because the only responsibility is to the advertiser. If you want a good example, I will give you the example of the travel section of the newspaper or what they call a better living section, whatever that means, which really are vehicles for ads for travel agencies and airlines and home appliance firms.

There isn't one line of critical comment in any of these sections and you would think from reading the travel section of any major newspaper that every place in the world is wonderful, that all hotels are great, that every airline is superefficient. I made a study of these and I couldn't find anything but labelled photographs and I couldn't find anything that would deter me from going anywhere.

Now, that's how the entertainment pages were when I began this business. Every movie was great, every movie was wonderful. The reason they were wonderful was all movie reviews were annexed to movie advertising and the newspapers thought that if you ran down a movie, the advertising would be withdrawn and it took a long time for them to discover that the one thing that the movie had to do was to advertise, and you can now in the major papers of this country—it is not true with some of the small ones—but in the major papers of this country you have what I would call honest movie reviews. That is to say, the opinion of a man who has gone to a lot of movies telling you what he thinks about the movie. I guess maybe the first to do this was Mr. Clyde Gilmour of the Province and Sun—he is now with the Telegram as a movie critic.

The Chairman: In some papers you never get a favourable review?

Mr. Berton: Yes, it is almost going the other way, you are right. If any of us in the business have any complaints, it is almost as if they were too critical, but I would rather have them that way than to have them be the way they were when I began, when poor old Roly Young was trying to write in code in the Globe so that those in the know could read what was underlined to see what he liked or what he really didn't like. That situation still exists in other sections of newspapers and I would think that this is an area which journalism schools could go into critically. I think the journalism schools ought to be pushing the newspapers very hard. They ought to be in the job of raising the standards and I think that the newspaper publishers on their part should be pushing the journalism schools to raise their standards.

You know, for years large numbers of publishers in this country totally ignored the journalism schools. When I was on a newspaper everybody said, "Oh, of course, you know that the graduates of journalism schools aren't really any good, they can learn more here on a newspaper." That may or may not have been true, but I heard that remark made just two days ago by a prominent newspaper man. The fact of the matter is that they are the best things that we have and there aren't really very many of them.

If what we call a newspaper business is going to become a newspaper profession, its only hope is in the kind of comparable course that we see in medicine and in law and the other so-called and properly called professions. Journalists can be very destructive in this country—they have a lot of power and I had a lot myself when I was a journalist. It is very terrifying when you think about it and there are no professional brakes to apply. There is no way really outside of the courts of law unless you commit a libel, which is an extreme thing to have to do really, of curbing the press except the self-discipline which exists among some of the best journalists of the day.

Now, I would like to talk about headlines briefly. I think anybody who has been involved with being reported in the papers—and I am on both sides of this thing—I am interviewed and I interview. I see it in a rather circular way but anybody in public life knows that if he has any major quarrel with the paper, his quarrel is more often with the headline on the story than with the contents of the story itself. The reason is they have to get the whole story or try to get the whole story in about five words—that is a total impossibility. Nothing can be told in five words except the most extreme things.

There was a headline the other day in the The Toronto Star—the story which was fairly well-reported was about the Committee on the Toronto Board of Education who had recommended very strongly a quite ambitious and far-seeing program for seven schools in the city to provide extra-curricular activities for students between the hours of four and six whose mothers were working mothers. It was hailed at this particular Board of Education meeting as a great step forward.

The headline on the Star read, "Trustees want schools to baby-sit from four to six p.m." It was that phrase "baby-sit" that did not appear in the story that caused an uproar at subsequent meetings of the Board of Education and I am told by those who were there it was picked up by some of the members of the Board and used to prevent that program from going through and they reduced it to a pilot project in one school.

I don't want to hit the Toronto Star for this because I think it is one of the best papers in the country; but the fact that even it can be involved in this kind of dangerous short-hand—and that is what it is—suggests the difficulty of the headline system in newspapers. Headlines are getting shorter every year; I was measuring them over a century and major headlines contain only about a third the number of words that they contained one hundred years ago because in those days they used to run all the way down a column and they were smaller in size so you could get quite a bit into a headline—it is impossible now.

Now, what I am suggesting is that there can be newspapers without headlines. I would think that the journalism schools of this country, to start with, should be experimenting with a new kind of newspaper which is a compartmentalized newspaper and which could be totally attractive and in which the news comes under headings, but not headlines. I further suggest that some of the kind of excitement the headlines provide, but I think in some of the monopoly towns—toronto papers or the Montreal or Vancouver papers in monopoly towns—I don't think the papers can do it when they are locked in the kind of competition which seems to demand where you have no competition it would be possible to experiment with a more subdued kind of newspaper.

Thirdly, Mr. Chairman, I think the Senate Committee here could be well advised itself to turn out a sample copy of a newspaper with some professional advice to see what it would look like. Now, on first glance the newspaper man will say, now, that is impossible—the public are used to headlines, they like to read them and everything else—but I would like to point out to you that there are great many very successful publications that have done this.

The news magazines—Time and Newsweek and U.S. News and World Report really don't have news headlines. They have titles; very short ones but they don't attempt to tell the story or they don't attempt to angle the story with two or three words. Nor do they have any front page any more. They have U.S. news and Canadian news and foreign news and news about people and sports and everything else—they have achieved the ultimate in compartmentalization, as far as I can see.

Finally, in this section on newspapers I want to talk about the general alienation of the public from the press and what I think might be done. I think more and more there is a need for the press to turn over more and more of its space to the people. We are seeing this happening in some major cities—the Toronto Star especially with its new "Voice of the People" section and the Globe with its expanded letters section, with its little regular feature called "Our Mistake"—the Star with its Bureau of Accuracy although it seems to have abandoned its Bureau of Accuracy—they had so many people 'phoning in to the Bureau of Accuracy that half of the reporters spent their time correcting their own stories.

The Chairman: I am not sure the Globe and Mail would describe "Our Mistake" as a regular feature!

Mr. Berton: It seems to be in there an awful lot, Senator, and I think one of the reasons is because it is a good idea. I would like to applaud the Globe for apparently running letters to the editor in full, or at least if they abridge them I think they include the three dots. A lot of papers you know take a letter of four pages, which is too long for a letter really, and knock it down to one paragraph without any indication whatsoever that it has been edited, and I think that is bad.

I think, however, you have to have more than that. I think newspapers really have to come to the conclusion that what is needed is a Court of Appeal established by the press. I don't think government can do this. I think some of the newspaper chains can do it because they can afford it and they have the newspapers to do it and also the facilities for it. It would be a Court of Appeal set up by the newspapers totally independent from them and simply paid for by them to protect the people's integrity as a kind of a system whereby people who feel they have been wronged by a newspaper story or by a newspaper can have a recourse.

Now, they may not have been wronged—in fact, quite often people who think they have been wronged by the press haven't been. For instance, if a man is later acquitted of that crime, I would think it would be incumbent upon a newspaper, if the charge appears on page three with a four column headline, that the acquittal ought to appear on the same page with the same size of headline or in a comparable position in the newspaper. Now, this cannot happen. Wild charges are flung about, statements are made which are accepted by the press at face value and put in quotes without any attempt sometimes to check on their accuracy. They are denied and proof is issued of that denial and if the correction appears, it appears quite often in the classified advertisement section, next to the comics sometimes.

This is one of the things I think a Court of Appeal might—with the press's co-operation look into from the point of view of the average citizen who has no other recourse except a 'phone call to the editor which isn't of very much use.

I have somewhat the same complaint to make in the area of television—and I am now moving into the broadcasting field—that there is no real Court of Appeal on television although there is in radio, oddly enough, in a sense. At least the open line shows, which I think are a very healthy manifestation of radio, give the average guy a voice, if he wants to use it to say what he thinks. There is not much of this on television.

Oddly enough I have a program on in Hamilton on Channel 11 at eleven fifteen which is followed by one of the few open lines programs on television and I think it is a good thing that the guy running the open line program is totally and diametrically opposed to me in every possible sense. I have never met him and don't particularly want to but there is a kind of balance there. If I go on and get on some guy who says a lot of things he doesn't agree with, at least in the next half hour the public is going to be able to 'phone in and say they don't agree with it. He doesn't always agree with my program, but I am delighted when he does, but it is that kind of a thing.

There is a need for much more Canadian content next year and I would like to suggest a program which can be produced cheaply which I think, if it is properly produced, can be one of the liveliest and most entertaining programs on the air and which I think would have a high rating and be totally Canadian in content—a Voice of the People program. I don't see why a television program can't do this, just take their cameras, have a lot of seats, just leave the doors open and turn the cameras on. There would be a couple of guys running the cameras and there would be music in the background but the public would be there. Let the public walk in and say anything they like as long as it is not libelous or obscene and you may have to run your tape five minutes ahead to prevent that, but the open line shows have discovered that the general public is generally responsible. They don't say obscene and libelous things, but they do voice their opinions.

I think that would be a fascinating thing to see, people coming in and saying I hate your television station or you did this to me, or I am opposed to the White Paper, I like the White Paper or whatever they want to say. There has to be a lot more of this and I hope when cable comes in this would be the type of thing the cable can do. Cheap and lively and popular programming involving large numbers of people who never get on television and never have a chance to get on television. Just leave the door open—let them fight if they want in the studio—"that's show business" as they say.

Senator Beaubien: Trudeau and Chartrand!

Mr. Berton: Sure, anything. Public figures—let them walk in.

There is another area that bothers me in television and that is the area of tape editing. I don't know how many here in the public eye have had this experience, but the tendency now is to interview everybody at an enormous length on video tape—thanks to the magic of video tape as they call it—and then they get this huge piece of tape and they snip out you know, about that much (indicating) and that goes in the news. If you were asked a question or an opinion and you start out by saying "no" then you qualify it for fifteen minutes, all they will get is that "no".

I was on a program a while ago and I didn't see it—it was an hour program and during the hour we were discussing the Prime Minister and I got a rude letter the next day from somebody saying, "Not only were your remarks rude and uncalled for, but you persisted interrupting in a rude, overbearing boorish manner everybody else on the panel." I thought this was impossible. We talked for an hour and everybody else had their say and I never interrupted anybody. I discovered that they had taken this item and chopped it to about six minutes and everybody was cut off in a half sentence apparently, except me, because as soon as they were cut off my face appeared, appearing to interrupt them. It is very dangerous really.

Great distortions can occur and have occurred and responsible editors in television understand that. There are many arguments for editing television tapes—it does help pace programming, it is livelier and the other argument is that the newspapers always edit whatever they do but television is a far more powerful medium than newspapers. People know that newspapers do this, but they cannot see that the tape is edited because electronically it has been so perfected that it doesn't look like you are being interrupted. You can't look on TV that half a statement is appearing regularly.

There have been some suggestions as to what might be done. One might be that just as commercials have to day now that it is a dramatized thing, not the real thing but dramatized, you might have to precede a program saying that the program has been edited and abridged. Another way is to leave the jump cuts in. A jump cut, for those of you who aren't familiar—here is what happens. You take a lot of tape but you take a lot of other shots of other people staring and in fact they have people sit down and point and do things so that they want to edit you—they don't want your face jumping because the shows that they have edited—they put another face in who appears to be listening to what you are saying—he is not listening at all, he is just pretending to listen to you, you see and that makes it very smooth.

Now, if they didn't put another face which might be the face of the interviewer or the face of someone in the audience, just chop the face out and let you appear again your head would be seen to move and the viewers would know that something had been left out, but at least there is a little more honesty there. It is perhaps less technically perfect, but I would opt for reality more than technical perfection.

A lot of it is unnecessary anyway in my opinion. A lot of it is sheer laziness and expensive. The most expensive thing in the world is to run tape and try to edit it. I am involved in a show that hasn't any money at

I am not even allowed to do it—it is just as well I don't, because some terrible things might happen. I have to do the editing in my head and decide exactly what I want to ask people because I know everything they are going to say but I can't afford to put a pair of scissors on that tape, even if I wanted to. I really don't want to. I think it is better if you let the people have their say. Tell them how much time they have and just let them go. The only solutions I have, gentlemen, in that area are the ones I have made, but I think it really is something that has to be considered carefully in the future.

Finally, in the area of broadcasting I really want to support the proposals of the CRTC which as you know is that programming should be sixty per cent Canadian content on television and even more important that the prime time or prime hours when most people are viewing, I think fifty per cent of that has to be—two hours out of four have to be Canadian and that on radio thirty per cent of the music played has to be Canadian in some way, even if it is only Lorne Greene who holds Canadian citizenship recording a new record on the set of Bonanza.

I do not buy the argument that this will result in a loss of quality. I don't think that the quality necessarily on television has anything to do with dollars. Some of the best programs on television happen to be the cheapest ones. Maybe a good example is the one I am connected with on the CBC "Front Page Challenge." It is the cheapest show the CBC produces regularly as far as I know and I am told (I must say this is hearsay because they never really tell us anything) but they told Gordon Sinclair and he claims that it is the only one that literally makes a profit and you can make a profit with a CBC program after they put all that overhead in, they must be producing cheaply.

I don't think all programs can be produced cheaply or should be produced cheaply. I think there are some programs that involve a large sum of money, but I think there is going to be plenty of money available under the new regulations to produce programs of excitement and quality with low budgets. I think people are going to have to use their brains and their imaginations instead of their pocketbooks in the future.

The lazier way is not always the most expensive way—it is just easier because you can have a lot of people working for you and you send them out to try things and to do other things—but I think we are going to be able to do it. I think the broadcasters understand this and I applaud those who want to support it.

I want to go on in this area because the CRTC has finally got a philosophy in broadcasting and I think the thing that has been wrong in broadcasting in this country is that the philosophy we have had has been an American philosophy—not a Canadian philosophy—a philosophy that sees that broadcasting is an arm of the marketplace.

Now, I don't think that public broadcasting in this country should be concerned at any point with ratings or with revenue or with sales or with commercials. I think it is a scandal that the sales department of the CBC can now pre-empt any program on the air if they want to. They have the right to pre-empt the programs. Not the program department but the sales department is in control. Surely the purpose of public broadcasting in Canada is to strengthen national sentiment, to hold the country together. That's what it was started for—it's one in a long progression of rather awkward and expensive but necessary devices which go back to the days of the canals and the inter-colonial railroads and the CPR and it worked up to the telegraph lines and the pipe lines and the airlines and finally the radio and TV network.

It is kind of a marriage between the public and private sector to make the country workable. To create a national idiom, a national mythology to interpret Canada to Canadians; to tell us who we are, where we came from and where we are going. This is the job of the television network and the public sector, and we will not do that—we can't achieve that with a fifth re-run of I Love Lucy or its equivalent; nor even with the excellent U.S. public affairs programs, as necessary as those are. We have to sing our own songs and we have to create our own heroes, dream our own dreams or we won't have a country at all.

That is the basic reason why the government originally got into broadcasting—the reason it seems to me that everybody in the public sector at the top level have forgotten except the CRTC. Thank God they came along and thank God they are composed of tough and intelligent people with some experience in broadcasting because they are going to be the saviour—not only of broadcasting in this country but they may be the most important people in the country today. If you haven't got a viable television network who tells you who you are, you have got no one. Now, I will be happy, Senator Davey, to answer any questions, if I can.

The Chairman: Well, I am sure you can and I want to thank you for offering. I think what we might do, Senators, is I ask questions about the comments which have been made by the witness and then perhaps following those questions, we can turn to other questions we have on topics which have not been raised.

Perhaps I could begin by asking one question that occurred to me as you were speaking. You said two things which I thought were perhaps in conflict and I wonder if you can explain them. You said that television is a more powerful medium than print and yet at the same time you said that you had more power when you were a journalist than you do now. You have a great deal of television exposure now and you have a great deal of radio exposure now.

Mr. Berton: I don't think I said I have more power now, but I had a lot of power as a journalist. I think television is more immediately powerful in that it is instant. You can't roll it back. I think a piece in a newspaper probably lasts longer and has more staying power, but from the point of view of immediate impact, as anybody who sells cigarettes or soap knows or anybody who is in the public eye knows, you cannot beat television. Every politician knows that!

The Chairman: Can we assume that you enjoy working more in the electronic media because that is where you are concentrated?

Mr. Berton: I enjoy writing books more than anything else.

The Chairman: More than anything else?

Mr. Berton: Yes. I am writing a book—I am just finishing one. You can't write a book all day because you have got to do other things, but the only thing you have complete control over is a book. In television you have no control over length. You are told it is half an hour, etc. I have a lot of control over my own television program, but there are things I don't control.

Senator Smith: Would this be a good time to know what subject or what title your book is going to deal with?

Mr. Berton: Yes, the book is about...

The Chairman: He thought you would never ask!

Mr. Berton: It's the first of two books on the building of the C.P.R. and the holding of this country together by a filament of steel that runs across Canada, which in its day was comparable to what the filament of microwave or the coaxial cable or the telephone wire is today.

The Chairman: In your opening comments you expressed some concern about the censorship of the press?

Mr. Berton: That's right.

The Chairman: I was wondering if you could tell us what elements are there in our society which are causing this attempt to happen?

Mr. Berton: It is the fear of the stranger, which is what is behind anti-Semitism and anti-Negroism and everything else. The stranger today is the kid. He looks like a stranger because he dresses strangely. He wears his hair in a different length and he wears his clothes differently, but he also acts differently. He has a different lifestyle. He is seen as an unknown and he is seen as a threat. His parents often don't understand him and certainly the older generation doesn't understand him and he doesn't understand them.

What people don't understand, they fear and they want to stamp out. There is no doubt in my mind that the most vicious kind of bigotry that goes on in this country today is the bigotry that is expressed largely by the adult population towards youth but sometimes it is reflected in youth attitudes toward the adult population.

The Chairman: Well, tied in with that youth attitude towards the adult population could we have your comments on both the quality and the content of the underground press which I am sure you probably read on more or less a regular basis?

Mr. Berton: I don't read it on a more or less regular basis, but I read it from time to time because my kids bring it home and I am sent copies of it. I think it is refreshing because it is different. I don't think difference for its own sake is enough, but in this country we have a pretty general attitude on the part of the establishment press.

One of the things that bothers me is that there is no daily newspaper that supports the third largest party in this country, the N.D.P. You would think that there would be one, but the nature in the world of commerce, I guess, is such either the party hasn't started one and no entrepreneur has wanted to.

The Chairman: You might be interested in knowing, Mr. Berton, that we put that question to a great many publishers specifically about the N.D.P. and many of them said some day they might.

Mr. Berton: It is very hard for a publisher. Once you become a publisher of status and you go to the club, you really don't think much along the lines of the N.D.P.

The Chairman: We, do you think that there is an establishment that controls the press in Canada?

Mr. Berton: I don't think it consciously controls the press, I just think it is because the establishment consists of people in the same economic bracket with the same outlook and ideas and about the same age and they all act and think about the same.

The Chairman: Are you part of the establishment?

Mr. Berton: I am part of the literary establishment. I am not part of the commercial establishment. I don't even want to be part of the literary establishment or the television establishment but I am. I have to face that.

The Chairman: You have given us two rather interesting new thoughts—this whole question of alienation and pressures and so on, and you have been practically the first witness who has brought up two rather interesting points. I think one is the fear of the stranger and the other was interested in was that the newspapers presently are reeping, to quote you "a legacy of distrust". That is a view-point we haven't had expressed. Does that go far enough, however, to explain the so-called credibility gap?

Mr. Berton: Well, the history of the press in this country—I know something about it, I have been reading for this book the press of a century ago, and the newspapers today look awfully good next to what they looked like, even when I began. A century ago they were shrill, inaccurate, totally biased and bigoted party sheets and in those days nobody really believed them—they were preaching to the converted. The Grit press preached to the Grit and no Tory would be seen alive with a copy of the Globe in his pocket and vice versa.

What happened was that they began to put real news in with the opinion and separate the two but it has taken a long time to work out the confusion between what is news and what is opinion and in certain areas, the consumer area being one, they really haven't attempted to any degree to service their readers. They have only attempted to service their advertisers. I don't mean to say that advertisers bring much pressure on newspapers—they don't have to.

It seems to me also that generally the press has not been in the forefront of social change—maybe it can't be. It has taken up causes just about at the moment when they become popular with the general public. It is slightly ahead but I think it really ought to be farther ahead.

In the youth field for instance the press is still using the word "hippie" in many headlines to describe generically any kid who has long hair and dresses a certain way. Well, this is like using the words "hike" or "wop" or "nigger"...

The Chairman: Or "Tory"!

Mr. Berton: Or "Tory".

The Chairman: Or "Grit"!

Mr. Berton: Or "Grit", although "Grit" has a specific meaning, if you remember Mr. Mackenzie.

The Chairman: You think "hippie" is an offensive phrase, do you?

Mr. Berton: I think it is an inexact word to start with and I don't think anybody can define it. Secondly, when you call people like Charles Manson who is charged with engineering the brutal murder of Sharon Tate, a hippie, and when that word is applied to people that take drugs—how would you feel if your son simply because he has long hair is also called a hippie? I don't think it is the word that needs to be used except if somebody calls himself a hippie then I think you have to allow him to use that label.

The Chairman: You indicated that this legacy of distrust which newspapers are reaping is at least in part facilitated by the fact that public taste has grown sharper?

Mr. Breton: Yes.

The Chairman: More sophisticated?

Mr. Berton: I think so.

The Chairman: How do you rationalize that improvement in public taste with the fact that on television and radio the lowest common denominator programs are the most popular ones?

Mr. Berton: Well, it has yet to be proved to me that they are.

The Chairman: You don't think they are?

Mr. Berton: No. I think this is nonsense—I think the public is far ahead of people who run television programs. The public is looking ahead and the people who are running television programs are looking backwards. They are trying to repeat last year's successes and trying to think of next year's successes.

You know, I have been on television for a long time and I have been involved with a good many programs and I hope that I have never talked down to anybody or treated any of them as thirteen year old children. As a matter of fact I have been doing an interview program on television now for eight years and every year the program, I think, gets less and less frivolous and less and less superficial.

When we began we dealt mainly with show business people. I hardly have them on any more. I find the public appreciates this and is flattered by it and likes it. They are hungry for that kind of thing. They are hungry for people who will talk to them straight and not phoney—people who give them the clear story. Now, I find the public are smarter than most people think.

The Chairman: I have a couple more questions on your opening comments. You made reference to standards and ethics. You also said, as have many other witnesses, that there is no known code of ethics or standards for reporters for example. Is it possible to prepare such a code realistically?

Mr. Berton: Yes. I think it is possible to lay down certain guidelines and certain basic premises. I mentioned one. Basic premise number one: if you hit a guy on page one on Tuesday and it turns out you are wrong on Thursday, you ought to confess on Thursday on page one that you were wrong. I mean that seems to be a pretty clear ethical approach to take.

I think probably if we were to sit down and knock it around we would get some others. There are certain alleged codes which newspapers use—the code of “off-the-record”, more honoured in the breach than the observance by everybody. But really, if we start off by my saying, “I am going to interview you, Senator”, and you say, “All right”, and you start talking and then you say, “Well, what I say from now on until I stop saying it is off the record” and I nod in agreement—ethically I can't publish that fact. Now, the other day, I picked up a newspaper and to my absolute amazement I saw that exact quote in the newspaper. The guy is quoted as saying, “now, what I say from now on is off the record”, and the whole thing is reproduced.

You know, if we had a proper code of ethics anybody who wrote that would be out on his ear or suspended or the letter against his name in a journalism school would be taken away for a month or some kind of knuckle-rapping would go on. To see that after thirty years in journalism, to understand that a reporter wrote it, a desk man passed it and an editor allowed it to go in, tells me this whole thing is going out the window—this “off-the-record” business.

On the other hand if I go to interview you for an hour and at the end of it you say, “Incidentally Berton this is off the record,” I am going to laugh in your face. I am going to say, “Well, you know the rules and you should have said that at the beginning”. None of this is codified though because there are no terms that are written down.

The Chairman: Aren't there some reporters who won't talk to people off the record?

Mr. Berton: Yes, I was one of them.

The Chairman: You were one of them?

Mr. Berton: When a fellow said to me, “I am going to talk to you off the record”, I said, “Goodbye, I don't want to talk to you at all, because I am only here to get stuff on the record,” whereupon invariably they would say, come on back, we will put it on the record again.

The Chairman: Do you think it is realistic to think in terms of developing a code of ethics...

Mr. Berton: Yes. I think it is realistic to start thinking about it and I think it is realistic to start discussing it and trying to arrive at a solution.

The Chairman: A great many people have said to the Committee and you have repeated here today that—I don't mean to say that you repeated the exact comment, but the sentiment—give the public more access to the media. You said the Globe and Mail is now running longer letters to the editor. You talked about the Star's page seven which Peter Newman, I think, christened "participatory journalism". Talking about newspapers only for a moment, aside from letters to the editor, is there anything else that newspapers can do to facilitate that kind of involvement of people?

Mr. Berton: Well, I think there is another area which is called the area of understanding. You see, something very significant and interesting is happening in this country and I think probably is happening as a result of television which is the most involving of the media.

People get involved in television because they are not remote from people in television—they are in their living rooms. It is not a movie screen or a disembodied window off in the distance. It is not the cold print of a newspaper which has no life except in the words of the reporter. It is a guy sitting right there talking at you and the fact also that demonstrations can be seen on television. Television can be manipulated now by people who want to get their views across as God. Everybody is realizing that for the first time in history, masses of people at the grassroots level do have some muscle and some strength which they never had before because the media weren't there.

I am not sure that many of the newspapers have caught on to this fact and have understood that there is something going on which they are really only partially aware of.

I would except the Toronto papers because they are amongst the most alert papers on the continent; but in other parts of the country I don't think there is an understanding of the trends and the only way to get understanding of the trends is to have people on your staff who are alive and alert and intelligent and have had some training. You don't get it by hiring anybody that walks through the door or the lowest possible price which is really what I am talking about.

I am talking about a legacy of distrust. I mean for decades in this country the poorest paid job was a newspaper man's job and you have just two kinds of people. You have people who are just dying to become newspaper people, and I was certainly one in my young days, or you have got people who need a job and who would take this job who were totally unqualified, never were qualified, who kept the job, drunk or sober, because they would work for peanuts.

The Chairman: I have a lot of other questions which are not perhaps based on remarks you covered, but I just have one other question based on the comments you made and that is your thought that the CBC should become non-commercial.

Mr. Berton: I didn't quite say that.

The Chairman: I am sorry.

Mr. Berton: I said that it should not be concerned...

The Chairman: Primarily?

Mr. Berton: I did not even say primarily. I said it should not be concerned with ratings or sales or commercials. I don't mean that it shouldn't accept commercials if there is no other way of raising money, but I mean it should be concerned with programs of quality of a kind that people cannot get elsewhere because they can't afford to give it to them on a commercial basis.

The Chairman: I was going to ask you about a comment the private broadcasters made when they were here a week ago Friday. They said that the commercials attracted audiences to a station and that the commercials made a contribution toward Canadian content.

Mr. Berton: Well, you know we haven't got many comedy programs in this country and we could use some of those guys on television.

The Chairman: Well, I think I am quoting them accurately and I think that is a fair statement that I made.

Mr. Berton: Commercials have some value and I will tell you what they are. I have five on my program and they are banked in three groups and next year because of the CRTC they will be banked in two groups. A commercial sometimes gives people breathing space. I think the negative thing to say about commercials,—and I guess once again I am biting the hands that feeds me—but from the point of view of a broadcaster, it is sometimes valuable in a program to have a break. I think from the point of view of the audience it is valuable to have a break. I like a break in my program because sometimes I want to change the subject and get on to something else which I cannot do without a stop and I like to stop to give everybody a chance to breathe. I think the audience sometimes needs a chance to breathe.

They may not be watching the commercial—they may have gone to the fridge to open a can of beer, but as I understand it, commercial sponsors don't seem to mind that because their commercials are turned up so loud that even when people are in the fridge, they can hear a commercial because the first ten seconds stabs them.

From that point of view I would say that there is a certain value in breaking programs and if I had to do a show without commercials, I might have to invent some device to pace it. Some commercials are amusing the first time you see them. I don't think anything is amusing if you see it fifty times, and that is one of the terrible problems that the producer of commercials faces. He can produce the funniest commercial in the world, but if you see it fifty times next week or the same singing commercial or song, no matter how nice it is, you are going to get tired of it. However, I can't agree that commercials have much to do with Canadian content.

The Chairman: Well, I will use that as a device and turn to the other Senators. I would like for the moment to confine the questioning to the witness's comments and then we will go on to other matters. Mr. Fortier?

Mr. Fortier: Time for a breather! I think questions which flow from the remarks...

The Chairman: Yes, I think for the moment.

Mr. Fortier: Would you go so far as to suggest that the CBC network should strive for one hundred per cent Canadian content?

Mr. Berton: No, because there are many programs of excellence which cannot be brought into this country commercially which ought to be seen.

Mr. Fortier: That is one of the roles of the CBC?

Mr. Berton: I think that is one of the roles of the CBC. It might be the World Series, I don't know. It might be a British series like the "Forsyte Saga", or "Sesame Street", or it might be "Sixty Minutes" or it might be Red Skelton, if anybody else is carrying it; I think probably that is less important to the CBC but the CBC has no business bringing in the fifth re-run of "I Love Lucy" to use the old cliché. They have no business at all bringing in bad shows.

Mr. Fortier: Does the CBC have business bidding against CTV for "Laugh-In", for example?

Mr. Berton: It does right now because the only way it can get any money is to do that. It is in the commercial business and I think it should be taken out of the commercial business. If you are given a yearly budget and if the budget isn't big enough—if your costs are going up the technical area as they are everywhere in the world, what happens is your program areas are squeezed down and down and down and you must go after extra revenue. The only way you can do it, when everything else is fixed, is by getting more commercial revenue and that is the squeeze the CBC has been put in. They are in such a squeeze now that they think as far as I can see in totally commercial terms.

But you are right in the long run. If "Laugh-In" is available and if everybody wants "Laugh-In" the last network to get it is the CBC because somebody else will provide "Laugh-In". The CBC should really be providing something that we can't get from somebody else. There are a lot of shows that I would like to see them bring in.

Mr. Fortier: This philosophy of broadcasting which the CRTC are implementing—as I was instructed to do by parliament—do you care to make a guess as to whether or not the private broadcasters will accept it and put it into force or maybe I should say economically, would they be able to accept it?

Mr. Berton: The private broadcasters will certainly, I think, oppose it in April. I think there may be some small areas in which changes will be made by the CRTC which has the great advantage of not being inflexible but I am quite convinced from what Mr. Juneau has said that it will come into effect the fifty per cent figure probably and the prime time figure and the private broadcasters, who also said they couldn't provide fifty five per cent ten years ago, will find a way of providing it.

In fact, I can tell you from my own experience that I have never seen so much wor-going on in Toronto on pilot programs with Canadian content. I have been involved with three of them myself. You know, everybody is making a program now. In two months there is an electricity in the air in the entertainment and public affairs world of this country. All the studios are turning out some very imaginative and quite inexpensive programs, the very thing the private broadcasters say can't be done. Of course it can be done and will be done.

Mr. Fortier: We have heard it said many times before this Committee that the goal is a very legitimate one and very valid one, but it is not through the CRTC that it should be attained. In other words the viewers should not have Canadian content forced down their throats; that they should somehow reach the point where they will stand up and scream for it and then the broadcasters will give it to them. Would you care to comment on that?

Mr. Berton: Well, it would never happen if it was done that way.

Mr. Fortier: You don't think the average Canadian viewer would scream for Canadian content?

Mr. Berton: The average Canadian viewer will scream for entertaining programs that he wants to watch. He doesn't know what those programs are going to be next year because he is not in the programming business. He knows the kind he liked last year. Now, the fact is that last year he got very few Canadian programs of any kind but if you give him a good Canadian program like "Front Page Challenge" or another very inexpensive program, which I was once involved with and no longer am, called "Under Attack" he will watch it.

Every yardstick that they use suggests that there are lots of Canadian programs that people will watch. The only reason that there aren't any more of them is because it has been cheaper and simpler and takes less energy to purchase something from the States that is proven.

I think the CRTC have to provide now a climate whereby Canadians in the broadcasting industry have a chance to show what they can do. Now, if after a ten year period they show that we are lousy broadcasters, that we can't do it, then I think you would have a pretty good argument to say that it ought to start bringing in programs from the rest of the world. I, for one, am totally convinced that it can be done and it will be done.

The Chairman: Senator McElman?

Senator McElman: Mr. Berton, there is an area that you have touched on to a degree and I would like to get a little deeper into it. A number of witnesses of late have talked about the potential power of the mass media with emphasis to television. The power of deciding what will become an issue simply by coverage or non-coverage—it is an issue or a non-issue with the public. With the ferment in North America today do you feel that the mass media of North America have played an appropriate part in warning society of the things that are obviously developing or did they prevent some of these things from becoming issues by non-attention or non-treatment? What is the role; what is the responsibility?

Mr. Berton: I think you have to be more specific, Senator, by saying what issues you mean.

Senator McElman: Well, the problems of the blacks, the ghettos—not only of the blacks—the poverty and so on. The things that are now all to the fore—you said the media come in at the point where society itself...

Mr. Berton: Is ready to accept it. I think what happens—I think there is a progression and I once likened it to a parade. At the very front of the parade you have people who are called nuts and screwballs and some of them wear funny clothes and in fact usually wear funny clothes—people like Bertrand Russell. If you want to just leave it to the media, then you have some very small queer publications, which don't have to worry about mass audience, advocating all sorts of things that seem to be goofy or nutty—they might have begun fifteen years ago to advocate that there should be steps taken to stop pollution. As you know, this was considered way up in the sky. Behind that you get some of the more serious publications—Harper's the Atlantic and then after that you get the mass magazines like Life and the mass newspapers. Then it becomes an issue on which everybody agrees.

I don't see any way of mass publications getting ahead too often because I suppose the very definition of a mass publication is a publication that appeals to large numbers of people. Pollution is a very in subject this year with the mass publications and has become a popular cause. I can tell you ten or fifteen years ago pollution was the very least popular cause. The same is true of poverty; the same is true of the racial issue.

I think I would agree with the implication of what you are saying, that newspapers are reluctant to involve themselves to any great degree with causes until just before they become popular. There are a lot of unpopular causes today which you don't see being spread in the newspapers.

Perhaps the best example of an unpopular cause which is now just beginning to change is the whole problem of the legalization of marijuana. Now, I remember that in 1962, I wanted to do a program in which we would debate the problem of the legalization of marijuana and it was suggested to me by my then producer that this was an irresponsible thing to do. Since that time, as you know, that debate has become a public debate. I don't want to take sides here on that debate, but the very fact that you couldn't even debate it really on a popular program eight years ago and you can now, shows what has happened. But certainly until the last two years, there is not a newspaper in this country that would have jumped in and advocated even that we put marijuana under some different kind of controls—under the Food and Drug Act instead of the Criminal Code. Now, a good many, including the Globe and Mail have suggested that. I don't think generally speaking the press of this country has indulged in causes when they are unpopular.

Senator McElman: Do you think there is hope that they will? Do you think there is an involvement now?

Mr. Berton: I don't see it. I think that the underground press is going to carry on with many unpopular causes, some of which are justly unpopular and some of which may become popular.

Senator McElman: Leaving the print, is there hope that television will do this chore? Public television?

Mr. Berton: Television is more diversified than the press. There isn't a single boss. You see, if you work for a newspaper, sooner or later the guy upstairs can stick out a finger and say, "Out". Now, in television—for instance, take my program—I really haven't got a boss. I am my own boss. The program is sold separately to dozens of stations and they decide whether or not they want to buy it and they in turn sell pieces of that commercial time which a total of five minutes to a variety of sponsors. So (a) they haven't got a sponsor and (b) I haven't got a television boss, except an American company called Screen Gems which is only interested in that it gives them some profit. That is the only thing really that they are interested in, so there is nobody really except the producer—and I am fifty per cent of the production staff myself.

Nobody really says you can't do this—except the lawyer, if am libelous; then I have to apologize and cut it out. So in television it is more diversified and this is the same with radio as well.

In the newspaper business it is much harder. I never had much trouble myself in the newspaper business, but then I arrived as a daily column because they wanted me more than I wanted them, but most reporters don't have that luxury.

I think probably there will be certain programs on television,—especially in this country much more so than the States, where they are all actually very frightened—which will take stands that are ahead of the popular taste or popular feeling and belief.

The Chairman: Do other Senators have questions on the comments that were made? Mr. Fortier.

Mr. Fortier: In your initial remarks, you spoke of the press being threatened and you first referred to exterior pressures. Under that heading you spoke of attempts at censorship and gave an example as to what has happened at too many underground newspapers in Canada. You also emphasized the Logos situation in Montreal. I, like you, am aware of Judge Touranzeaus' extraordinary judgment, but on the question as to whether or not Logos was a newspaper, you accept the fact it was. Is there any publication which resembles a newspaper which in your opinion would not be a newspaper?

Mr. Berton: I think we ought to be very careful...

Mr. Fortier: I am not asking you for a definition.

Mr. Berton: I think we have to be very careful in trying to make a definition. Even if it wasn't a newspaper and was a periodical, would say that it ought to have the right part of the press, you see. We can ban these words—"newspapers" or "magazines" or "brochures" or "books" or "pamphlets", if you want, but damn it all, I think everybody in this country even if they want to produce a pamphlet—if I want to produce a pamphlet—and this was done one hundred years ago by everybody because that is how everybody got their views expressed, but if I want to put out a thousand pamphlets and sell them on the street, I think in a democracy I should be able to as long as I am not obstructing traffic or punching people in the nose or shouting obscenities or breaking the law.

I think it ought to be within the law for me to hold up a thing called Pierre Berton's pamphlet or Pierre Berton's leaflet or anything I would like to call it—print on a piece of paper something that says something and I think I ought to have the right to sell it.

The Chairman: Senator Sparrow?

Senator Sparrow: Along the same line. Wouldn't anybody, therefore, be entitled to sell anything on the streets—why just sell newspapers?

Mr. Berton: I don't think that is quite true at all because we have a concept of democracy which allows the freedom of the press. This is not written down because we don't have that kind of a Bill of Rights, but I think you know the published word is quite a little different from toothpaste. I don't think anybody has the inherent right to go out and sell toothpaste or shoe laces on the streets. However, I think they have a right to publish their opinions and sell them or distribute them free, if they want to. I think you get the essence of the kind of consensus of democracy.

The Chairman: Mr. Fortier?

Mr. Fortier: And you are suggesting that within the laws of libel and slander, anyone can publish anything?

Mr. Berton: Yes. Well, there is another law about hate literature now to which I think we ought to pay attention, although I happen to oppose it; but it is on the books and if it is on the books, I think we ought to abide by it.

Mr. Fortier: Right. Supposing a publication on numerous occasions is charged with having committed libel and indeed found guilty. Do you think there comes a point where the law and the courts of the land could be empowered to say to Logos or the Corgia Straight—"this is ten times in the last ten months that you have been charged with having committed libel and you have been found guilty, now out you go" or do you say, "if these gentlemen are prepared to pay the price to be fined or to be jailed, they should be able to publish libelous statements"?

Mr. Berton: We have in this country the Habitual Criminals Act, with which I disagree because I think it is probably an offensive act, but if a fellow is a habitual criminal and he burglarizes a safe eight times and the Judge says, "well, you are a habitual criminal and should be put away or if you are out, you are out on probation," and I wonder—suppose for instance the Globe and Mail got ten libel suits which it might easily do...

Mr. Fortier: There wouldn't be any distinction.

Mr. Berton: I think the Globe and Mail would and I think the public would say, "no, this is harassment". Everything has to stand—I mean, the second libel suit might be a tougher fine and there are jail sentences for criminal libel so the editor mightn't be able to publish a paper, but if he gets nominal fines and goes back on the street again, I think you have to judge him on what he does and what he did. I think that is the basic principle of the law.

Mr. Fortier: So that as slanderous or libelous as the publication may have been in the past, you don't believe it is for the courts of Canada to prohibit future publications by that publisher?

Mr. Berton: No. I think, with respect, Senator, you are dealing with something that just mechanically could not happen. I don't believe there is any historical evidence or contemporary evidence that this is possible because libel cases are among the most expensive in the world to indulge in no matter what side you are on and any publication involved in a continual series of libel actions would be totally broke. That is the purpose of the law of libel—the law of libel contains in itself the solution to the problem you suggest.

The Chairman: I should perhaps explain that Mr. Fortier is not a Senator. He is our legal counsel.

Mr. Berton: I am sorry.

The Chairman: You really should apologize for another reason and perhaps I should apologize for not telling you, but you earlier referred to "gentlemen." We have two female Senators—Senator Quart and Senator Kinnear. I am sure you apologize to them as well.

Mr. Berton: Certainly.

Senator McElman: He doesn't even look like a Senator does he!

The Chairman: You had a question, Mr. Spears?

Mr. Spears: Yes; I am not a Senator either, Mr. Berton.

The Chairman: Mr. Berton knows that!

Mr. Berton: I thought they just made you one.

Mr. Spears: No. One of the very basic things Mr. Berton has been talking about which interests me particularly is some method of establishing standards, the establishment of some code of ethics and professionalism. Would you go so far, Mr. Berton, as to advocate a licence for journalists?

Mr. Berton: No. I think this has got to be within the profession itself. I think that a daily newspaper—one of substance—can say to its readers—you can put a stamp on the newspaper like a union stamp or the code stamp like the Good Housekeeping seal of approval and that is all you can do. I don't think that the public sector, or the government can insist upon this. I think that there would be many publications including the underground press who would not adhere to this, and would have to pay penalties, whatever they are, for that.

Mr. Spears: Well, in this sense then your concept of professionalism doesn't go as far as what we call the established professions?

Mr. Berton: No, I don't think it can because of what I think is more important, which is our concept of freely expressed opinion. I am really talking here of daily newspapers and perhaps weekly publications. I am really talking about our daily newspapers because they are the ones that pack the clout. They are not the gnats butting on the fringe of society. They are society. I think it has to be established by newspapers themselves in concert with the Canadian Daily Newspapers Association or the large chains. They wouldn't have to join if they didn't want to and perhaps some of them wouldn't.

Mr. Spears: Do you really mean the CDNPA?

Mr. Berton: Not really.

The Chairman: Senator Kinnear, I believe had a question?

Senator Kinnear: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I was interested when you said they have a code in the news in some of the columns. I would love to know if they are doing it yet—you said it was in Roly Young's column and you could find out really what he meant. Are they still doing that?

Mr. Berton: No.

Senator Kinnear: You know, like emotion on television when you are signalling for something and so on?

Mr. Berton: No, I think this is an informal thing. Herb Whittaker in the Globe—I sometimes feel I have to translate him to find out whether he likes or dislikes anything, but that is not true of some of his contemporaries.

The Chairman: Mr. Berton, what I am proposing to do if you have the time...

Mr. Berton: I have lots of time.

The Chairman: Well, if you have lots of time, I think what we will do, Senators, is this. There is Royal Assent at five o'clock so we must adjourn then, but I think, we will take a short adjournment now and give our reporter a break for ten minutes. We will re-convene at four o'clock and we will go through to about 4.55 just prior to the Royal Assent when we must adjourn. If that is all right with you?

Mr. Berton: That is fine with me.

The Chairman: Okay. Thank you, we will adjourn for ten minutes.

SHORT ADJOURNMENT

The Chairman: May I call the session back to order. We said we might turn to a discussion of some matters which were't raised in the comments you made earlier. From 194 through 1958, you were with MacLean's?

Mr. Berton: Yes.

The Chairman: You are perhaps aware of the kind of question I am going to ask you. I have said this publicly before so it won't be any great surprise to the people here, but one of the great surprises I have had in this Committee is the attitude of the Canadian magazine industry. We have asked them, whether the exemption which Time and Reader's Digest presently enjoy, should be withdrawn as was recommended in the O'Leary report. To the astonishment of the Committee—I think it is a fair statement—the Canadian magazine industry collectively and individually said no, if that happened, the Canadian magazine industry would disappear. You know a great deal about the Canadian magazine industry so could you comment generally on that?

Mr. Berton: Well, it startled me because when I was at Maclean's, the Maclean-Hunter company was perhaps in the forefront of the move to get some kind of protection against the dumping of editorial copy into Canada. Reader's Digest and Time, I was told at the time, had taken a million dollars out of the advertising kitty from magazines. That, together with the impact of television, which hit at almost the same time, hurt the magazine industry in this country very badly and as was predicted at the time several went under and that process is still continuing. Now, as I understand it—and I am not sure I understand it, but I think I understand it—what we are saying now is that they need the money that Reader's Digest and Time contribute into the pool which allows them to take the expensive surveys which they use to convince advertisers where they should advertise.

The Chairman: I think in fairness...

Mr. Berton: Am I wrong there?

The Chairman: That is not my understanding, you may be right. My understanding is that their position is that without Time and Reader's Digest the advertising agencies would not develop budgets for magazines advertising and the medium would disappear.

Mr. Berton: Well, there is some validity in this. It is ironic you see. In the old days there were enough Canadian magazines so it made sense to produce a very expensive advertisement because you could publish it in half a dozen publications and get your production costs back. The entry of Time and Reader's Digest into the field helped kill so many magazines that the pool could be only maintained by the inclusion of the murderers.

The Chairman: So you think now their position is probably...

Mr. Berton: I guess so. As you know I haven't been involved with magazines for many years.

The Chairman: Last evening our witness was Mr. Ben Bagdikian who has some international reputation in the media field. He was a contributing editor to the Saturday Evening Post and he is now the national editor of the Washington Post and he expressed the opinion that the consumer magazine industry, as we know it, would disappear in five years.

Mr. Berton: I think he is right. I think the day of the mass magazine is over because the day of the mass is over. There are now several masses. There are large numbers of people and they are diverse kinds of people. This is much more so than they were years ago.

We always used to say that the secret was that Playboy found one kind of mass, True magazine found another kind of mass, Esquire and The New Yorker found a third kind of mass, and these are the kind of magazines that are flourishing because the magazine that tried to be all things to all people, just didn't work out.

Now Maclean's was a mass magazine in one sense, but was a specialty magazine in another. Just as Playboy appealed to the young wealthy swinger and just as True appealed to the masculine oriented middle-class male, so Maclean's total effort was spent on the Canadian. To that extent it was a specialty magazine and specialized only in the Canadian point of view. I think if it continued to do that, it might be in better shape than it is, but I notice too many articles about Australia and other places in that magazine.

The Chairman: When the people from Maclean's were here—I think Peter Gzowski in particular—they themselves made the point about magazine specialization and when we asked them what their specialty was, they said it was Canada. I would suggest, judging by their statements, that they would argue that Canada has always been their field of specialty.

Mr. Berton: It was tempered sometimes for commercial reasons in my opinion. I speak only as a reader with some knowledge as to why articles get published. I notice a lot of travel material in that magazine and it is still in there. It has nothing to do with Canada, it isn't even good travel material and I think it is there to just get travel ads.

That could never have happened in the nineteen fifties—if they had sold a single article on the basis of travel ads, the article would have been pulled. I can remember that the most successful issue we ever put out (I was Managing Editor and Ralph Allen was Editor) was an issue on the North called "Maclean's Reports on the North." At a planning meeting of the company Ralph Allen was asked what issue the Northern issue would be, and Allen said, "what do you want to know for?" The guy answered, "because we are going to sell ads for that issue to Northern people" and Ralph Allen said, "if you do that, we will scrap the entire issue. Until that time I will not tell you what issue it is and if I hear that you have sold an ad on the strength of the cover or an article or anything else in Maclean's which would make the people suspect that the editorial material is simply used as fillers for the advertisers—that day we will go out of business."

The Chairman: Well, that I think quite naturally leads to the next question I want to ask you about. We have had a great many publishers and others before us and one of the things we have been most interested in finding out about are specific examples of advertising and other pressures; and I am frank to say that they have been very hard to come by because when you get right down to the fine lettering and ask a person to be specific, most people either can't be or else refuse to be. Now, have you in your experience—because you have been around the Horn in this business—could you offer us any examples of specific editorial pressures either on behalf of advertisers or on behalf of any other vested interest—pressures to which you have been asked to submit?

Mr. Berton: I have never been asked to submit to any pressure because it has been generally known either explicitly or implicitly, that if I was asked I would leave. I have always had fortunately another job I could go to or something else I could do—I don't like pressures. The most famous case involving me is the one I don't have to repeat because it is very well known. I wrote a piece in Maclean's called, "Let's Stop Hoaxing the Kids About Sex"—there was so much pressure on the front office of Maclean-Hunter that I was out. I wrote two more columns which allowed pressure to build up...

The Chairman: We have some news stories on that particular event.

Mr. Berton: So do I.

The Chairman: We have the C.P. dispatch at the time—was it fairly accurate?

Mr. Berton: Possibly, I haven't read it. I couldn't remember and part of this I really don't know, you see. I wasn't really consulted.

The Chairman: The article Mr. Berton is reading is headed "Maclean's Magazine Drops Pierre Berton".

Mr. Berton: Yes. You see, I was not fired by the editor, Ken Lefolli. I was fired by the top brass of the Maclean-Hunter company, but they didn't communicate with me. They communicated with the editor who communicated with me; so I never got a letter saying why I was fired and I really wasn't told much on the telephone. I had no face-to-face meeting with anybody—it was all done on the 'phone—I was out of town for most of the time anyway as I was very busy. He told me that he couldn't withstand the pressure; that what had caused it was my article which he along with a lot of the other editors and the publisher had accepted and there was no way in which I could come back.

I do remember saying, "Well, look, I would like to give you one for free"—at this point I had written my next one and I said, "You can have it for nothing because it deals with this particular article and, therefore, will continue a stimulating controversy—it deals with the reaction to it." I said "I haven't much to say in the article but I thought I would publish the letters I had received" and I said "I know that I am off the staff but you can have this one for nothing", and he said, "My orders are that you cannot write anything. They want you out and they want you out now and they don't want your name in the magazine." This was about two years before they came back pleading with me to write other articles for them.

The Chairman: Do you write for Maclean's now?

Mr. Berton: I have, yes. There is a piece by me in the current issue of Maclean's. I have no grudges against Maclean's or anything.

The Chairman: This is a fairly well-known incident, but in your other experiences in working with the media—are there other experiences that you can tell us about?

Mr. Berton: Let me preface what I have to say by saying this: that the reasons you haven't got specific cases of advertisers causing pressure is because it doesn't work that way. Advertisers don't generally walk into the editor and say, I want this story dropped or this story killed or this man fired, but there is in most publications a kind of implicit understanding on the part of everybody which is never written down about how far you can go and how far you can't go.

Nobody ever writes this up in a code or puts it on a bulletin board or even talks to a reporter, but reporters are very intelligent people. They read the editorial page of the newspaper and they read the front page and they are also, most of them, ambitious. They want to get ahead, they want to be called a first-class reporter with five years' service, they want to be promoted and they want to get more money and the way you do that is by writing the kind of story that will be featured in the paper and not the kind that will be buried. The kind of story that will get you a by-line on the front page and not the kind of story that will be hacked to ribbons and put in the back. By a process of osmosis everybody knows what kind of story gets featured and what kind of story doesn't and this is how the newspapers are slanted, when they are.

It is usually done, at least on the better papers, semi-subconsciously by people who don't even know they are doing it. They would be horrified if they thought that there was any kind of editorial control. Now, at the Toronto Daily Star I wrote a column once which dealt with Eaton's. It was a column in which I said the T. Eaton Company, which controlled the centre of Toronto, was at least partially to blame for the fact that that centre hadn't been developed because they had done nothing. I don't know if I was that blunt but I wrote the column.

Now, I wasn't told not to publish the column; in fact I did publish the column, but was asked by the editor to make sure that I had my facts correct and to double check it with everybody. There is nothing wrong with that except it was only in the case of the T. Eaton Company, the largest advertiser in the paper, that I was ever asked to be that careful. The only time I was ever asked to check everything twice and three times was that incident. I wouldn't call that a pressure but I would call it special attention.

The Chairman: Did the column appear?

—21490—51

Mr. Berton: The column appeared.

The Chairman: Unchanged?

Mr. Berton: Well, the deal was that my columns appeared unchanged or they couldn't appear at all. Yes, it appeared unchanged.

The Chairman: Speaking of your column, am I correct in recalling that very frequently in your columns, you would turn to humor or satire?

Mr. Berton: That's right.

The Chairman: Didn't you find it necessary after a while, as I recall, to put at the bottom of the column...

Mr. Berton: Please don't believe this?

The Chairman: Is that true?

Mr. Berton: I did it once, partly as a gag and partly because I once wrote a column in which I opposed capital punishment and my point about capital punishment was that if it was a deterrent, they were hanging people in front of very small audiences at odd hours of the day, that what they ought to do was pre-empt the Ed Sullivan Show and hang a guy on television. I did this parable as "the hanging of Roger Casement" and there were two calls that came into the Toronto Star. The first call said that the story had been very remiss not publishing this fact in advance so that they could watch the show on television and the other call came in saying this was the kind of thing that the CBC was doing and they agreed that the CBC ought to have been abolished. After that I started putting stuff at the bottom of my columns saying that this was a parable—a fable.

The Chairman: One of the matters that has interested our Committee most and I am sure you know this because I am sure you have followed the Committee...

Mr. Berton: Yes.

The Chairman: ... is the trend towards the concentration of ownership in all the media. Could you give us the benefit of any views you might have in this area?

Mr. Berton: I think it is a very dangerous trend indeed. I don't think it is necessary. I don't think it is healthy for the business, I don't think it is healthy for the country. I have been in these towns and seen what has happened sometimes when the media was diverse and expressed different points of view and was in competition and then fell into single hands.

I worked in Vancouver in the hey-day of Vancouver journalism when the newspapers were very alert. I won't say they were the best newspapers in the world, but certainly a great many journalists of stature came out of that period. In my opinion both the Vancouver Sun and the Vancouver Province became palid newspapers as a result of being owned by the same company because they simply—although they would deny this vigorously—didn't spend as much money in competition because they didn't have to. Worse still, I think, it's very tough on a reporter if he gets fired from a newspaper say on a point of principle—not because of incompetence—but reporters are fired because they take stands and they have nowhere else to go. Now, if one chap owns everything in one town that reporter can't get a job anywhere. I can't quote you specifically examples from memory, but I know many cases where this has happened and they were towns like London, Ontario, which would be one of them, and some in the Maritimes under the Irving banner where you know too many outlets for the media, radio and television and the press are controlled by one corporate group or one person.

I have heard the argument made and my colleague, Charles Lynch, made it here for this committee, that a newspaper chain is healthy because it allows them to pool some of their resources and to get better people to write syndicated material, but I don't think that argument holds much water because some of the best syndicated columnists, and certainly Charles is one, but some other very good syndicated columnists have come up from one newspaper—Peter Newman of the Toronto Star, Douglas Fisher of the Telegram—and the fact is that the pool exists without the change. You can hire and buy any columnist you want on a syndicated basis pretty well and thereby split the cost of the coverage. I really think it is very dangerous what is happening and I am glad to see that there are some attempts being made to stop it. I don't think a newspaper publisher should own anything but that newspaper really. I think the more people you have owning the organs of the media, whether it is radio or television or newspapers, the better.

The Chairman: Mr. Fortier?

Mr. Fortier: I don't really have a supplementary, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: Senator Smith?

Senator Smith: Just on that point. I was just wondering, Mr. Chairman, whether Mr. Berton has any ideas as to what could be done to stop this trend toward the grouping of ownership in large circles of control. What could you do?

Mr. Berton: Form anti-trust legislation. It is done in the States—they break up G.M. and Dupont and if they can break up Dupont and G.M. in the States, they could probably do the same thing here.

The Chairman: It is done in the States, but newspapers are specifically exempt in the States under legislation passed this session.

Mr. Berton: Because somebody has raised...

The Chairman: The American Daily Newspapers Association has very successfully raised that point.

Senator Smith: We were told for example, Mr. Chairman, on quite a few occasions since we have been having our hearings that due to the horrible estate laws which we have and for other economic reasons it is going to be impossible to continue the family ownership of individual newspapers and there is nothing that can stop this trend that would be an economic way of handling it. You punish someone who owns a family newspaper if he can't sell it to somebody who has got the dough.

The Chairman: Well, I think the witness has answered.

Senator Smith: Well, I thought he might add something to this discussion.

The Chairman: You think anti-trust legislation could be enacted?

Mr. Berton: Yes.

Senator Smith: Yes, I realize he has answered.

Mr. Berton: Well, it is not a question that have spent much time considering.

The Chairman: Mr. Fortier?

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Berton, what are your views on the disclosure of sources of information by a journalist when required by law?

enforcing agencies on the one hand or a court of law on the other?

Mr. Berton: Well, I don't think that a journalist's sources should be sacrosanct. I don't think he should have the same privilege as a priest. I think it is the journalist's responsibility to check his sources and to take the consequences. I think when a journalist gets material from any source he has to consider what the consequences of that material are going to be to him and to his publication. If he makes an agreement to get material from a source and he promises that source he will not reveal them, then he has to go to jail. He has to go to jail if he is going to publish the material and I don't see any other way out for that.

I mean he is going to have to take the consequences of the law. I don't think he can break his promise to his source but I don't think he should get any special protection by reason of being a journalist especially in view of what I said earlier today about there being no ethical standards anyway. I don't think the journalist qualifies. A doctor qualifies and a lawyer qualifies but I don't think a journalist can.

Mr. Fortier: He shouldn't ask the state for special treatment in other words?

Mr. Berton: No.

Mr. Fortier: You have spoken of the power of the journalist and you have spoken of schools of journalism and codes of ethics. What are the essential qualities of a good journalist in 1970 in Canada?

Mr. Berton: Curiosity is the main qualification of a journalist to start with. It is not enough. Education, a very broad mind, a sense of humor and a sense of responsibility and a knowledge of how to be accurate. The last perhaps is the most difficult thing in the world. You know, to this very day my name gets spelled wrong in the newspapers for which I used to work.

The Chairman: Which group was it, Mr. Berton, that came before us?

Mr. Spears: The Professional Journalists.

The Chairman: The Professional Journalists came before us—there was a group of four of them and two of the four, their names were spelled incorrectly.

Mr. Berton: I find that large numbers of people, and I would have included myself years ago, perhaps even today, really don't know how to check material accurately. They listen to hearsay, they listen to other people and they think a fact is a fact because somebody says it. They take far too much for granted. One of the reasons is because of the desire of most publications even today when there is no such thing as a scoop to rush news into print—to get it first rather than to get it right. I really think that a change of philosophy is needed in the press and some people have this; it is to understand that it is better to get it later and get it all rather than to get it suddenly and get part of it.

I learned this writing a daily column. I never really cared about anybody beating me to the gun on something. I figured I could do it better than they could anyway, being arrogant about it and I used to hold stories for months sometimes just to get it all. When you used to go off to get something right, you used to get it better as well. You could always find out something more.

Mr. Fortier: Do you read many newspapers on any given day?

Mr. Berton: I read the three Toronto papers every day of the week, yes. They are the only ones I read regularly.

Mr. Fortier: Would it be fair to ask you which in your mind is the best paper in Toronto?

Mr. Berton: I think the best all round paper is the Daily Star. I think the best editorial page is the Globe and Mail. I think it is by far the most literate—I don't always agree with it, but I think it is the most literate.

The Chairman: Do you ever agree with it?

Mr. Berton: Yes. These days the Globe is taking on an almost heretical change—since the days of George McCullagh there has been an enormous change in the Globe.

Mr. Fortier: Do you think much of this change has been due to the fact that it belongs to a group today?

Mr. Berton: I think the editorial page is always the reflection of one man—the editor. I think a good newspaper is the reflection of one man. I don't think newspapers can be edited by committees or groups or upon the basis of how much money they make or what the balance sheet was in 1969. I think the great papers of this world from the Calgary Eye Opener to the Winnipeg Free Press under John Dafoe have been the extension of one person's personality. The stamp of that man, his integrity, his outlook and everything else. I don't think it is going to change. I think this is one of the things that is wrong with group journalism, that electric feeling that you have a unique product in your hand—that it is the product of a person's personality is going. The Toronto Telegram is the product of John Bassett whether you like it or not. It is a unique publication because Bassett is stamped all over it.

Senator Smith: He says so himself.

Mr. Berton: Yes, he does. He is very frank about it and I admire him for it. I wish there were more John Bassetts.

Mr. Fortier: It is interesting to note though that in your opinion the Globe and Mail editorial page has become a better editorial...

Mr. Berton: Well, with respect, I think that happened really as a result of the demise of Oakley Dalgleish and the arrival of Jimmy Cooper and his present editor under him. I don't think that had anything to do with the group and also the fact that it is the one newspaper which until recently the F.P. people have kept their hands off policy on it—they have not changed the Globe and Mail.

The Chairman: It is not our purpose to put anybody in a corner, but that is a very significant statement. Could you back that up? Could you back it up when you say that that is the one paper that F.P.—that implies that they have...

Mr. Berton: I am not in the business and I know only what is generally common knowledge but I think it is pretty generally agreed in the business that F.P. exerts a fairly tight control, at least financially and to some respect editorially. I don't mean the comment of the editorials but really the major effect is the amount of money that is spent. Everybody talks about the fact that Lord Thomson keeps his hands off his editorial people. He does until they lose money and then his hands go on and they go out and that's as strong a pressure on a newspaper as you can have. If you own your own newspaper, it is up to you if you want to take a chance and maybe spend some money one week.

You don't have to have Lord Thomson's accountants say, well, you can't send the man to Moscow even though the world is coming to an end because you can't afford it, or you can't investigate this situation in your home town because the merchants will get upset and we don't want to rock the boat. That's the kind of thing I think that happens.

The Chairman: We have an estimate, and several people have made it, that children are changing to television and children under ten watch television for let's say a minimum of twelve hours a week. Does this concern you—this enormous amount of television watching by children?

Mr. Berton: No.

The Chairman: Why not?

Mr. Berton: I would hope that television would improve but I wouldn't want to see the viewing go down on the part of children because I think television is a very strong educational medium even when it pretends not to be which is most of the time. I think that the kids that go to school today at the kindergarten or grade one age are far more sophisticated than they were in my day because of television. They can't help but learn from television, even bad television. It doesn't matter whether they watch "The Man From Uncle"—they see Napoleon Solo running around the streets of Vienna or a mock-up of Vienna and this is the first time that they ever knew that Vienna even existed.

In my day I never even heard of the countries of the world. Nowadays kids can knock off all the countries of Europe as a result. True, some of it is trash and some of it is muck, but even in that trash and muck, there is something coming out which adds to the sum total of knowledge and experience. I don't know if the schools have caught up with the fact that young children are very sophisticated now and know a lot more about the world than we did.

The Chairman: Certain groups have come before the Committee such as the Parents' Teachers' federation, for example, expressing concern about violence on television. Would you make any comment about violence on television?

Mr. Berton: Yes. I really have looked at this and I don't really find any evidence that anybody was driven to a violent act by watching television or reading books or comic books or anything else. Children's fairy st ries for instance have traditionally been violent. I used to read Grimm when I was a kid and was terrified at the macabre stories there. Now, I know the argument is that television is real and the fairy stories are not real, but I don't think that is really true. I don't think television is really very real and even if it were, I think a kid or an adult has to be within himself unbalanced before any trigger from television will drive him into anything.

The Chairman: I would like to ask you a specific question for general reasons. You do a program on CFRB in Toronto with Charles Templeton which is called Dialogue and I think it is on other Canadian stations as well.

Mr. Berton: It is on about twelve other stations.

The Chairman: Twelve other stations, but I hear it mostly on CFRB in Toronto. It is on twice—it is on in the morning, at ten-ten I think it is and in the evening at six fifty. The ratings indicate that you have a huge listenership. Now, and I am not going to ask you about the specifics of Dialogue, but it seems likely if that exact same program were taken off those twelve stations...

Mr. Berton: Yes.

The Chairman: And were put on twelve CBC stations including CBL, the audience—the exact same program, the exact same discussions, the same people, you and Charles Templeton—the audience would be dramatically less. Why?

Mr. Berton: I think that is true.

The Chairman: Why?

Mr. Berton: Because of what precedes and follows that program. People don't any more tune into specific programs as much as they tune into an over-all type of station. CFRB over thirty years has built up a certain kind of radio audience which likes the total that CFRB gives them and I think I am right in saying that the evidence indicates that people turn that dial on in the morning and they don't really switch. This is less true of television as you know and used to be less true of radio but it is now true of radio. Radio stations now give themselves an image—as you know the kids of Toronto listen to either HUM or CKEY. They flip from one to the other because they provide a certain kind of music. Another person might listen to CFRB or CBC, although the two are not compatible. The Richmond Hill station in Toronto gives nothing but western music and a certain kind of listener wants that. I really don't think it has much to do with Charles and myself.

The Chairman: And yet the dialogue that you and Charles Templeton do must not be all that out of keeping—in other words, it wouldn't be that much away from home if it appeared on CBC.

Mr. Berton: Oh, no it wouldn't, but the CBC because of the nature of its programming which is minority programming just has a smaller listenership.

The Chairman: I guess the more specific question would be, what would you do about CBC radio if you were the President of CBC?

Mr. Berton: Not much, I think it is pretty good.

The Chairman: You think it is pretty good?

Mr. Berton: I think it is fulfilling the exact job—you know, what CBC radio doesn't need to do is give us any rock and roll music. Every city has a station where we get all the rock and roll music and other stations we can get all the country music and other stations where you can get the George Melachrino Strings, etc.

The Chairman: The CBC does have rock and roll music. That is, CBL radio has rock and roll music.

Mr. Berton: Well, in no sense could you call it a rock and roll station.

The Chairman: If you listen to it on Saturday, between nine o'clock in the morning and twelve o'clock at noon you would think it was a rock and roll station.

Mr. Berton: That may be, but as you know, generally the CBC in the mornings when I hear it, from about eight o'clock to noon or to two o'clock in the afternoon, this is the kind of program that you cannot get on any other station. I am talking of Max Ferguson, I am talking about Bruno Gerussi, I am talking of the various magazine programs—the Pat Patterson program and Matinee and so on. I think in that sense CBC radio in the last few years has pulled up its socks because before that it was trying to be all things to all people.

The Chairman: Well, will CBC radio ever attract more audience?

Mr. Berton: I don't know. I really think CBC radio's job is two-fold. One is to be Canadian and the other is to provide the kind of radio at public expense that no other radio station feels that it can afford to provide.

The Chairman: Your comment about less accent on commercials—several witnesses here have differentiated between CBC radio and television.

Mr. Berton: Right.

The Chairman: They say that CBC television should stay in the commercial business but CBC radio which I understand attracts only about two million dollars actually should...

Mr. Berton: I don't know the figure but probably a case could be made that it would be just as cheap for them to get out of radio, drop their overhead and sales department and everything else.

The Chairman: I think perhaps we only have one last question because unhappily we have to adjourn. I better qualify this for I may be incorrect, but I don't think you have ever been a member of the parliamentary press gallery?

Mr. Berton: No, I never have.

The Chairman: The Committee, I think, would be terribly interested in any comments you might make about the calibre of coverage out of the parliamentary press gallery both in print and in the electronic media.

Mr. Berton: I am not sure I want to do that. It is not my field. As far as the parliamentary press gallery and its work is concerned I am really just another newspaper reader. I am only reading three Toronto newspapers and I am not reading any other newspapers regularly. I sometimes see them when I am out of town, but I am not familiar from a personal point of view—I am not witness to what they are reporting and I would just as soon not pretend to be an expert in an area where I am not.

The Chairman: All right then, I won't make that my final question. My final question, and this I think you are expert on—what comment would you make to the Committee about the calibre of the job being done by the Canadian Press generally?

Mr. Berton: I think it is too bad that they take so much from Associated Press and Reuters. I think in Canada they tend to cover the news rather pallidly, but perhaps that is a good thing—the colour can come from the individual reporters and individual newspapers and when you are feeding so many papers it is probably difficult to get any kind of colour in your news perhaps that is not important. I do wish Canadian Press presented a Canadian reporter's viewpoint from the major capitals and sometimes the minor capitals of the world, and took less from the other press associations. We are getting all our American news through American eyes with one or two exceptions and we are getting all our British news and so on through British eyes. It would be better if we got it through Canadian eyes. There is a difference in approach and a difference in emphasis because only a guy raised and brought up in this country can understand really how to talk to his own people in his own idiom and in fact the Canadian language is a separate and distinct language, albeit the distinctions are subtle, from any other language. We are getting American news in the American idiom and the American language.

The Chairman: Are there other questions? If not, I think I will thank the witness on behalf of the Committee. You have a reputation as I am sure you know for being prodigious in your various literary pursuits. An enormous volume of material—I have heard people say that they are amazed at the consistent quality and I think that those of us who are aware of the things that you do on television and indeed you have done in print in various places always marvel at these qualities. At the same time though we may not admit it to ourselves, we realize that notwithstanding the talent there is an enormous involvement in time and that being so we are particularly pleased that you found the time to come before this Committee. We think this is a very important hearing for us because we think the background and the experience that you have in all phases of the media in Canada is in a sense unique. There aren't too many people like Pierre Berton and we are pleased that he came here. Thank you very much.

Mr. Berton: I would like to thank you for having me. I have enjoyed it and I am one of those who think that this is an important operation. I know some of my colleagues are questioning whether this Committee will have any value or none at all, but I think you will have an immense value. First, I think it is educational and second I think what comes out of this Committee is going to be extremely useful to almost everybody who is concerned about the future of this country.

Thank you, Senator.

The Chairman: Thank you. May I remind the Senators that there is royal assent at five o'clock and may I remind them also that the next meeting of the Committee is on the 14th of April at ten o'clock in the morning. Thank you and the meeting is adjourned.

THE SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE ON MASS MEDIA

EVIDENCE

Ottawa, Tuesday, April 14, 1970

The Special Senate Committee on Mass Media met this day at 11.15 a.m.

Senator Keith Davey (CHAIRMAN) in the Chair.

The Chairman: May I call the session to order. The Senators are probably aware but perhaps I will confirm the fact that the hearing at 2.30 this afternoon, Winnipeg Channel 12 Ltd., has been cancelled because Mr. Johnson, who was to present the brief, is ill. We have received the brief, however, and many of us have read it. A decision will be made subsequently about whether or not we can receive the brief at a public hearing. One of the problems, of course, is that the hearings are scheduled to conclude on the 24th of April. So whether or not we will receive the Channel 12 brief at a public hearing is now open to some question.

We have already received the brief and we are sorry, of course, that Mr. Johnson is ill.

This morning we are going to receive the brief of Télémédia (Québec) Limitée, which is represented here today by its President, Mr. Philippe de Gaspé Beaubien who is on my right.

I would simply say to you, Mr. President, that the brief we requested has been received. It has been circulated to the members of the Committee. It has presumably been studied by them and we are now turning to you for an opening statement of ten, twelve or fifteen minutes in which you may amplify or explain or make any comments you wish or add additional remarks.

Following that the Committee would like to question you on the contents of your brief and perhaps on other matters which may concern them.

I think all the members of the Committee are mindful of the specific position in which you find yourself vis-à-vis the CRTC and I think we are sensitive to the particular problem that this kind of hearing presents for you. With these few short words I think perhaps you could begin by introducing the other members of your team.

Monsieur Philippe de Gaspé Beaubien, President, Télémédia (Québec) Limitée: Thank you, Senator.

[Translation]

I would first like to introduce my associates to you: on my right, the Vice-President (radio division) Mr. Maurice Dansereau; on the Chairman's left, Mr. André Lecomte, vice-president (television division) of our company Télémédia (Québec) Limitée; at the end of the table, to my left, is Mr. Malcolm Scott, our company's secretary and at the extreme right, Mr. Jean-Louis Gauthier who is President of our television station in Sherbrooke, Télé 7.

Mr. Chairman, Honourable Senators, we sent you a description of our company and how we intend to operate it. As the Chairman of this Senate inquiry mentioned, we have still not received the CRTC's decision on the application for transfer of ownership that we made. We wanted to present to you briefly what were, in our opinion, the broadcasting needs in that part of Canada which is mainly French-speaking. We wanted to explain that in certain areas we believe that it is necessary to have co-ordinated efforts in order to meet these needs more efficiently. We explained fairly briefly what our company was, what were the principles behind it and how we believe we can meet these various needs.

I believe, Mr. Chairman, that the submission is self-explanatory and the main purpose of our presence here is to answer a few questions that you might ask us about our operation and the needs of the milieu in which we work. We believe that it would be wasting some of your time if we tried to repeat a text which you have already read; consequently it gives us great pleasure to be at your disposal to answer, as frankly as possible, the questions you might have. If you have no objections, I would now like to ask you what are the factors, in particular, that interest you and on which we can enlighten you further.

I thank you very much for receiving us and it is with pleasure that we come here because, I think, it is an opportunity for us to shed light on what our company is, as well as on broadcasting needs in Quebec.

[Text]

The Chairman: Thank you. The only other point I should perhaps add is that if there are any of the questions you feel should be referred to one of your colleagues, then just simply indicate that.

Mr. Beaubien: Thank you, Senator.

The Chairman: I think Mr. Fortier will start the questioning today.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Beaubien. I accept your invitation. I wish to tell you that one of the topics that I would like to explore with you is one that you dealt with, in detail before the CRTC last month—namely the nature of the interests that you purchased from the Power Corporation group, Corporation Trans-Canada and Télémédia Incorporée, the nature of the rights that Power Corporation still holds through the debenture that you mentioned in your brief. On the other hand, I know that you have already had your fill of answering the questions of the CRTC. I am therefore going to try to be as brief as possible.

My first question is this: in the case of default (you mention it, I think on page 12 or 13 of the French text of your brief) what are the obligations of repayment of principal or interest to Télémédia Incorporée or Trans-Canada Corporation Fund; what are the obligations to Power Corporation which give it, in the case of default, a participation in your Company?

Mr. Beaubien: First, Mr. Chairman, Senators, I appreciate the opportunity to clarify this point. As we indicated in our brief, on page 16—and if I may, I would like to repeat it so that it will be clear: "Power Corp. will not have any role in the operations of Télémédia (Québec) or of its subsidiaries or associates, directly or indirectly, through management personnel or through board representation; nor through its own chief shareholders as individuals nor through its own subsidiaries or affiliates. Power Corp. will not hold any shares of any kind in Télémédia (Québec). As for the debenture, it includes no conversion right."

I wish to tell you that first, Power Corporation finds itself in the position now of being a lender. Its relationship is the same as what a bank or a finance company may have with any company whatever. At a certain point, I had to be able to make a guarantee to the Power Corporation which said: "If you sell this company, we are prepared to make certain conditions for the first year". I shall explain to you why they made this condition if you are interested, Mr. Fortier.

I had to say, at that time, that I would not sell the control of the company as long as the debenture was outstanding, as long as it was still owing. At that time the company asked whether I was prepared to accept the penalty of paying the full amount of the debenture if ever I lost control of it. I said that in my opinion it was an unnecessary condition and I undertook to take the shares I held and deposit them in trust. Those shares in trust are a pledge that I would not sell control of the company. There is no way in which Power Corporation can get their hands on those shares, except in the event I do not meet a personal obligation that I have undertaken to meet, namely, that if I lose control of the company, I would have to be responsible for paying an indemnity of $25,000.

Mr. Fortier: $25,000?

Mr. Beaubien: $25,000. And secondly, that Télémédia (Québec) Limitée undertook to see to it that the number of voting shares in the company which might be issued in the future would not be issued unless the company was advised that there was a possibility of issuing shares. Therefore, there is no way that I can lose control without a personal indemnity for default of $25,000, and there is no way that Télémédia (Québec) Limitée will issue other shares in such a way that my portion will be below 50 per cent.

Mr. Fortier: No way?

Mr. Beaubien: At that time, if I do not meet this $25,000 obligation, well Power Corporation can declare a bankruptcy, or something like that, and at that time, they will have the same rights as the others. But the protection that Canadians have is that no transfer can be made without the CRTC's approval. That is given in the text. I do not have the detailed text with me but those things will have to be done with the CRTC's approval. Therefore, the CRTC is fully protected in this respect.

Senator Beaubien: Philippe, Power Corporation has a first mortgage that is $7 million?

Mr. Beaubien: That is correct.

Senator Beaubien: Suppose the company cannot meet its obligations—I am not speaking now about you. Does Power Corporation then take over the first mortgage?

Mr. Beaubien: At such time, they are the same transactions that we have with a lender.

Senator Beaubien: The bank could take over?

Mr. Beaubien: Power Corporation has no voting right. There will be a meeting of the Board of Directors and a decision will be made on how it can be refinanced.

Senator Beaubien: But, for example, if you cannot meet your mortgage?

Mr. Beaubien: You see, Senator, the advantage of this transaction is that the first year there is no interest payable to Power Corporation. The payments on the principal are made at the rate of $500,000 a year, and they are not made before 1973. The first payment is not made until 1973.

Senator Beaubien: Then, you cannot go bankrupt before 1973...!

Mr. Beaubien: I believe that we shall be able, moreover, to sell them. The forecasts show fairly well at the moment that we shall be able to meet our obligations. In Télémedia, it is the first two years that are important.

Senator Beaubien: I have no doubt that you are capable of meeting them.

Mr. Beaubien: As a lender, it has the same responsibilities as a bank or a financial institution and it will have to examine whether it is to continue lending its money or call the loan and, at such a time, they would decide on adopting another method of financing.

Mr. Fortier: Do those rights exist in favour of Trans-Canada, in favour of Trans-Canada Corporation Fund, in favour of Télémedia Incorporée, or in favour of Power Corporation? Who holds the debenture?

Mr. Beaubien: A part of the debentures is held by Trans-Canada; the other part by Télémedia Incorporée and the ownership of Power Corporation.

Mr. Fortier: If I understand correctly, Mr. Beaubien, there are two possibilities: either you do not meet on time the repayment of its principal and interest that you have undertaken to meet. At such time you agree to pay, let us therefore say, a $25,000 penalty; this penalty is a personal commitment on your part. Or then there is a default, and you do not pay the $25,000, and should this occur, Power Corporation or Trans-Canada can put their finger on Télémedia (Québec) Ltée?

Mr. Beaubien: You are a barrister who is in a much better position to describe the financial procedure. I believe, at such time, that there will be a lawsuit to ascertain whether I can pay or not. And if I cannot pay, there is a judgment, and should there be a negative ruling, in my favour, the CRTC is consulted.

Mr. Fortier: The CRTC will still have a say in it. But theoretically, it may happen that, in case of default on your part, Power Corporation will wake up one morning with control of Télémedia (Québec) Ltée.

Mr. Beaubien: Should I not be able to meet my $25,000 obligation, on my personal shares, at such time—I think that they will draw up a petition—I do not know the legal term—I will have to go to court. If there is an unfavourable decision, at such time, the shareholders will decide to call a personal bankruptcy, and I will go before the courts which will be called upon to rule, and the CRTC still has the right to determine whether, at such time, the sale will be made. I can tell you that I have no intention of losing control of the company, and that I think that I can meet this $25,000 obligation, especially in the light of events. The feeling that I want to convey in the answer is one of confidence that we shall be able to meet the conditions that Power Corporation has imposed. The debentures have the same conditions that I would have had from I.A.C. I would have had the same conditions from the bank or some financial institution. They are lenders.

Mr. Fortier: What is the interest rate?

Mr. Beaubien: I can speak about the interest rate, if I may, to conclude this aspect. A good part of the radio and television stations throughout Canada borrow money to finance either a tower or equipment. Those who lend money to them have the same rights as Power Corporation will have where I am concerned. A bank can, at a given moment, say: you have not met your obligations on this tower, therefore, we want to meet with you and set up more detailed procedures for making sure that there is more control in the company. But you know that Canadian banks do not become owners of shares of either radio or television stations across the country because someone is having financial difficulties.

Mr. Fortier: The CRTC will have to make a decision?

Mr. Beaubien: I simply want to indicate, Mr. Fortier, that the rights of lenders are simply all the same. The interest rates are the same. I could have it with anyone else. I would like to speak about interest, if I may.

Some people are surprised by the fact that we succeeded in negotiating a 6 per cent interest rate. I would like to explain why. When I made an offer to buy from Power Corporation the stations it held, I competed with someone else. I was not the only one to try to get those stations and I was told, at that time, that the offer I had made was not sufficient. In the company's opinion, they had to sell at the price they had paid. At the time, I found it difficult at the start, I found that there might be a way to help myself, and I needed help because it was obvious that money was harder to find. Then they said: very well, we are going to try to help you during the first years, to try to give you a preferential rate—and I had asked for 3 per cent incidentally. I had asked for 3 per cent for this reason: I knew that Power Corporation had a note in the amount of $6,900,000 bearing no interest which was due in 1980, 1990. Therefore, I was able to negotiate, not my 3 per cent, but 6 per cent for the first five years, which I found the most difficult. At least I came up with a contribution to Power Corporation which was 6 per cent more interest than they had on the note they held at the time. I was able to give them something better than what they had. I think that was an important factor. These first six years are important. Why did Power Corporation agree to such a transaction? I wish to inform you that, except for one of these companies, in all these companies, they were operating at a loss in 1968—in several cases they were standing still. Losses were substantial in a major part of those companies. I wish to tell you that this is a factor that demands of us a great deal of work and a great deal of enterprising spirit—to try to turn the situation around, to improve it. This is the case in several companies, in Quebec, that are having difficulties at the moment. Power Corporation found itself in a situation where it had a series of stations that were not yielding any money. They said: "listen, you can have 6 per cent interest for the first five years, if we are able to arrange for the repayment of a note that bears no interest and we will see our money again. That is enough for us. Undoubtedly there would be other reasons that we cannot disclose to you." This is the reason I was able to get a preferential interest rate for the first five years, those important years, so as to be able to turn those stations around and make them financially more profitable.

Mr. Fortier: You say that those companies, while they were under Mr. Desmarais' guardianship, were standing still—the radio and television stations?

Mr. Beaubien: May I add a point. He was not the owner directly because he had just acquired the Rimouski and Trois-Rivières stations through certain newspapers, you know. I did not want to give the impression that those companies were lagging behind with a change of control. They were under different administrative authorities.

Mr. Fortier: Agreed. You were associated with the Paul Desmarais group in the company Télémedia Incorporée and you tell us today that, to put it simply, you borrowed from Power Corporation. Is that correct?

Mr. Beaubien: Yes, it is.

Mr. Fortier: You are no longer associated with that firm except, as you say, in the capacity of lender or borrower?

Mr. Beaubien: That is correct.

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Beaubien, what was it in the first instance that influenced your offer to Power Corporation (I am not referring to Mr. Desmarais who has in any case already been questioned about this matter)? Did Power Corporation ask you: "Philippe, can you make us an offer?" Or did you start matters moving by saying: "Paul, I would like to make you an offer?"

Mr. Beaubien: I went to see Mr. Jean Parisien, who has already appeared before you and who was the Executive Vice-President with responsibility in the Power Corporation group's communications network. I told him that if there was ever a decision to sell the company, I hoped he would give me the chance to make an offer for that company. I already held ten per cent of the firm Télémedia Incorporée. I had already tried to build up my own interest when one of the partners wanted to sell out, an interest which was bought by Power Corporation; there had previously been three Quebec Télémedia shareholders. I went to look them up about six months before they made the offer, and I repeated the offer at least three times before they told me: "Now we are ready to hear your offer." So it was I who took the initial tive in this matter, and I did so because I believe we had a good opportunity to make some headway in the mass media in Quebec. Yes, that is what I thought, even if there was a slowdown, even if they were experiencing problems which have been familiar to many French Canadian firms recently. I would describe the problem as a lack of anyone to take over on the managerial side. The firms were built up by young fellows who took risks and introduced plenty of new ideas. But in too many cases, they had no one to take over from them and manage the company. So that was our job. We were all young, ready to work long hours. We had a bit of capital and we were keen to keep Quebec companies in Quebec hands, make sure that they were not sold outside the province and outside the business circles our operations covered.

Mr. Fortier: At that time, did you really and truly feel worried that Power Corporation was going to dispose of, sell its interests in those various radio and television stations? Were you afraid that it would sell out to foreign owners?

Mr. Beaubien: Well, you would have to define that term. Let us say that I could see the company, which was also interested in other fields, being criticized from all sides, and I let it be known that my associates and myself were interested in acquiring it. We had no information suggesting that it was to be sold to foreign owners. But I knew that there were other people interested in those companies. I knew that other companies across Canada which knew something about the firms in question saw their potential and were interested, though I do not know whether they made offers. I believe that there was at least one other offer which I had to beat in order to convince them to sell to me—which I succeeded in doing.

Mr. Fortier: You say we must define our terms; I agree with you entirely. On page 8 of your brief, you state and these are your own words:

"Individual stations have been weakened by poor administration and meagre financing and they may well be ripe for takeover by foreign interests better equipped and better financed."

Have you found the passage, at the top of page 8? When I read your brief, I put a question mark in the margin.

Mr. Beaubien: Well, it should have been put as:

"People who do not come from our own parts."

That is what I wanted to say. I did not mean to suggest that English-speaking Canadians are foreigners. I think you are reading too much into the statement, Mr. Fortier; I did not intend to imply as much. I meant that it would be outside the milieu of our acquaintance.

Mr. Fortier: Because you put the ball in my court by asking me to define the word "foreign" and I am asking you to do the same thing?

Mr. Beaubien: That is right.

Mr. Fortier: Well then, to go on—the moment came when took your decision. Before doing so, as you put it so well in your brief, you went deeply into the problems of Quebec's radio and television stations and, in a more general manner, into problems of communication and the repercussions on the broadcasting industry. Since the question has been raised, I would like to ask: when you were making this study of problems of communication, did you personally or your group as a whole reach the conclusion that it was a rather undesirable situation when an individual held interests in a company which puts out both printed and broadcast news, for example?

Mr. Beaubien: Really, I cannot give a straight yes or no. I can only quote some examples. I think that when this sort of common ownership influences public opinion to the point where it may be said that information is being controlled, that is, where there can be control of information because the individual really has a monopoly on information, I think it is a bad thing. In a case of that sort, there are certainly problems, and I think that this is to the disadvantage of most of the population. However, it has been proved that in certain cases, one communications medium is needed to support another; I think you have already heard an explanation of this theory. In such cases, I think that it is very much in the public interest that there should be communications systems to transmit information attuned to their own environment. So, the answer to your question may be yes or no. In general, I would say that it has been our policy to specialize in the broadcasting media. Those media are complementary from the point of view of news services and equipment, so that the tendency or possibility of having a centre saturated with communications media is automatically avoided by the adoption of such a course of action.

Mr. Fortier: Did any of your studies lead you to suppose that there are areas in Quebec where an individual or a company held this sort of monopoly on information? Obviously, that would be anti-Québec télémedia.

Mr. Beaubien: I would not like to say that; I do not think so. In the region in which we are working, it has already been mentioned that there was a fair amount of concentration of ownership before we came, but I should make this point for the members of the Senate, if it is of interest to them. In the Sherbrooke region, for example, where we have a radio and a television station, our television station, is just one of eleven. There are 11 television stations which can be picked up in that area. I believe that our radio station is one of 18 serving the area. Of course, someone can still say: you have a radio and a television station in the same area and own a local newspaper too. This was the case with the former owner—he had a newspaper, a radio station and a television station. I think that the decision of whoever is to judge this question should take the existence of other examples of the media which exist in the area into account. As far as we are concerned, my opinion is that there is no way—no way at all—in which we could be accused of undue concentration or undue influence from the point of view of information.

Mr. Fortier: Am I right in interpreting your answer to mean that this was not one of the reasons which prompted you to offer to buy those radio stations and television stations from Mr. Desmarais?

Mr. Beaubien: First of all, we made the offer because we are businessmen. We were young, we had ambition and we were ready to take a risk to make money—this was our basic motivation. This was not the only factor, however, because this is an interesting line of business. In my lifetime I have had occasion to work for perhaps 50 companies and I can tell you that this is an interesting field because so much is changing in this province right now. We had the chance to be part of this, to offer information, entertainment, to let people here in on what was happening—and believe me, they are much more eager to be in the know than is generally supposed.

My experience in Expo opened my eyes in the matter of the educational pavilions with special themes. Before Expo opened, a lot of people were ready to say that we really were not answering any need here, that people went to a world's fair to enjoy themselves, to have fun, and that they would make straight for La Ronde. We were told not to waste our time and money on building theme pavilions for Canadians because ordinary people just did not want them. Well, the guys who said that had a big surprise when they saw that just the opposite was true—people were really eager to know, find out things, compare information from other sources.

The role of radio and of television is very much the same. This is a job which I wanted to try to do. It seems as if we are all aiming for the same thing. It certainly seems a shame, Mr. Fortier, that although we are living in the same world, we did not manage to make the Government agencies and the general public understand what we were trying to do. This is why we really welcomed the chance to come and talk to you, Mr. Chairman, and to the senators, because we feel that if we have failed in one of the information fields, it is not because we were negligent of our duty to teach, inform and divert the public, but it is because our methods were perhaps not those in the public's best interest.

I am impressed by the new industry in which I have become involved. But I feel that if we failed somewhere, it was in the task of letting the public in our area of operation and thus also the government authorities know what we were and what we were trying to do; how our outfit operates; what the profits are and how they are invested; what local community needs are; how we try to interest the community and whether that is difficult to do; how we were trying to explain the reason for our existence. We do not share the fear that most of the public has about us and which government authorities seem to have about us. We are told: don't get involved in that, you are trying to show us how to do our job. But no one tried to explain and that is why we are happy to appear before you because we have told ourselves: perhaps this is our chance to give every one a better understanding of what we are doing; perhaps this will be an opportunity for the journalist here in this room, to see that we really do have problems of our own and that we are trying to solve them. This is what the public is trying to understand. I feel that there is a lack of trust here—the company and the government need to have confidence in one another, and so do private enterprise and the public, and so do the broadcasters (whom we represent) and the people who control our operations, the governments which see to it that our power is not misused.

Mr. Fortier: Is this lack of mutual confidence due in part to the fact that there are too many government agencies at one time interfering with the broadcasting media?

Mr. Beaubien: I do not think so, Mr. Fortier. I think we realize that we are coming to terms with common ownership. Controls are needed in a field like this. We understand that the government authorities should worry about such matters and in fact, ladies and gentlemen, this is the third major presentation for us. This is the third inquiry into our company's operations in a year. First, there was the presentation which we made to the Commission of the National Assembly in Quebec City; we spent a day and a half appearing before our CRTC agency, and we are only too pleased to be here today; we would make another such appearance if we felt that further explanations would be of use. We feel that controls are needed, then; we think the groups existing already are efficient, but we are worried about the fact that we want to try to create an atmosphere of confidence so that we can work together and try to find solutions to present problems. It is not our impression that this atmosphere prevails at present; we feel that people are worried about us and see us as somebody trying to misuse the authority he has.

Mr. Fortier: Why do you think people have formed this impression—your own opinion?

Mr. Beaubien: I think this spirit of mistrust is general nowadays: this is the general attitude towards businessmen, private companies, which have not, in my opinion taken the trouble to explain what they are or what they are trying to do. Public opinion has turned against them and now favours governments, which they would like to do everything for them, subsidize them at every turn, support them—this is no solution to present-day economic problems, in my opinion. As a businessman, I think that no one has taken the trouble to explain things to the public, and I think that the broadcasters have taken it for granted that the public knew what we were doing and thought we were doing a satisfactory job. There are certainly faults, no doubt about it.

Mr. Fortier: Do you think that this is especially due to the nature of the industry you are working in?

Mr. Beaubien: I don't think so. I think that if the day came when we had a chance to explain what we were doing, if we were allowed to describe how a newsroom works, everyone would see that we are just reporting. Last night the Apollo report came in: the mission was cancelled at 11.15. This morning our newsrooms had university faculty members and other well informed persons to comment on that item of news—scarcely ten hours after the first bulletin. There is action here, organization, concern for the public, yet the public does not seem to realize—looks at us with suspicion. It tells itself that all this is because of industry; it thinks that the broadcasting networks belong to it, and it has a right to that opinion.

The Chairman: Is this a problem? Is it a different problem in Quebec than for the rest of the country or does this problem apply in both parts of Canada?

Mr. Beaubien: Senator, I think that problem applies in all Canada today.

The Chairman: Everywhere.

Mr. Beaubien: Yes. I think it is evident as we travel throughout the country and as we try to talk to people that there is a genuine pre-occupation or feeling on the part of the public in general that one who is a capitalist or businessman, or free enterprise is something that is not contributing much to the economy in which we all live. I feel this is unfortunate.

The Chairman: Well, let me ask you a somewhat related question. Perhaps I can preface it by saying that I am sure you understand the interest of this particular study is really less in Télémedia (Québec) as an end unto itself than in its position in the entire spectrum. We are grateful to you for coming and I hope you do not feel we are specifically investigating your organization because we are not. I am sure you appreciate that.

I was interested in the English translation here in the brief at page 4. You talk about "The Challenge" and I think very graphically you describe the challenge which, I presume, is from the United States. This is the indication on page 4 and 5. You talk about the access of American television signals and then you say something on page 5 at the end of that paragraph:

"This threat at present is most real for those Canadians whose mother tongue is French and whose culture is primarily French."

I wonder if the threat is not really more real for those Canadians like myself whose mother tongue is English simply because of the inundation of American television signals, for example, in Toronto. I am sure they have a far greater appeal for English Canadians than for a great many French Canadians whom, I am sure, are not interested in watching programmes in the English language.

In other words, in developing a real sense of national purpose and national pride I think that Quebec has a distinct advantage in its French language as opposed to the rest of the country. Could you comment on that?

Mr. Beaubien: That is a good question, Senator. This is what we meant. We can see that within the next ten years there are going to be means of being able to capture on a television screen or a radio because of satellites over our country, signals that come directly from other countries.

We feel that if it is difficult for us now in the Province of Quebec to act in a sea of two hundred and fifty million English-speaking people and retain our identity and our personality, it will be doubly difficult when we have the whole world pouring in, and a great many of these are English-speaking countries or countries who will broadcast in a language which is not our mother tongue.

What we wanted to say is that we have got to start becoming confident now in our own market, not only to make the dollar now but to be able to get the benefits of that dollar. So we have to be able to start developing people and men and facilities and programmes and ideas that will permit us to keep our audience and at a time where someone can tune into Czechoslovakia, the Soviet Union and the United States, as they did at Expo where you would go and see the world was right there.

It will be the same thing because of all this and people will not watch us in our markets only because we are French-speaking Canadians. People will not watch us in Canada because we are Canadian. They are going to watch us if we are as good as the others and if we can provide information.

I would agree with you that it may be as difficult for you, although I had not seen it that way because the influx will be even greater from outside.

Our message there was to say: my golly, if there ever was a time in our history where we should not fear the concentration—not the concentration—concentration has a bad connotation—but the co-ordination of efforts, of starting to work together to try to get ready for what is coming from other parts of the world.

It is now. I look at what the Czechs have been doing. They have exhausted their natural resources and they are developing human resources and they are very good at imaginative, creative ways of presenting ideas and concepts. We have got to become equally as good if we want to retain our audience.

The Chairman: I must confess I was thinking more of the United States and I was going to ask you what you meant when you say, on page 5;

"improve the quality of their productions to meet the standards of a better informed, better educated and more discriminating public."

I was relating that comment in my mind and perhaps thinking back to page 4 because in some way you regard American programming in both television and radio as being of superior quality.

Mr. Beaubien: No. Well, it is not an easy answer, Senator. There is no doubt that as far as quality of message, they are very imaginative people and they are a great country. There is no doubt. They have resources and people.

However, I cannot help but feel that many times, when they have broadcast into my home anyway, the tradition is not necessarily the tradition of my children. The Mason-Dixon line does not mean much in my house.

Therefore, we carry certain of these programmes dubbed in French. It is not much mind you. Some seventy per cent of our programming is originated in French-speaking Canada by us; but there is no doubt that there are a certain amount of these programmes that are very popular and have message. We should not be narrow enough to say because a programme like "Father Knows Best" is not made in our community, that it does not have a message to deliver.

However, this is not exactly what I meant by that.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortier: If I understand right, you say 70 per cent of programming?

Mr. Beaubien: I'd like to ask the President of the Sherbrooke station, if you would allow me, but I think from our last submission to the CRTC that 70 per cent of the programming is of Canadian origin."

Mr. Jean-Louis Gauthier, President CHLT Télé 7 Limitée, Sherbrooke, Québec: We operate 116 hours a week. Of that, 50 hours come from the CBC French network, and we ourselves produce 38 hours of programming in our studio. Only the balance is film. Part of that film is American film dubbed in French. We present also some programmes, some films that are imported from France.

Mr. Fortier: For you, The CRTC's regulations regarding Canadian content present no problems?

Mr. Gauthier: It doesn't affect us because we already exceed them. In fact most of the stations in the Province of Quebec exceed the Canadian content that the CRTC is requesting.

Mr. Fortier: I think the members of the Senate Committee would be interested in hearing Mr. Dansereau and knowing just how far the radio stations, for example, are affected by the 30 per cent Canadian content.

Mr. Maurice Dansereau, Vice-President Radio Division) of Télémédia (Québec) Ltée: Mr. Fortier, especially for French-language radio stations, it isn't a problem of meeting the CRTC standards, the standards that the CRTC is seriously talking of establishing. It isn't a problem at the production end. The only problem it can create is a different kind of enforcement problem in a situation where right now, in the Province of Quebec, you have a tremendous number of radio stations that are in trouble. Business isn't as good as it used to be. So if the CRTC forces us, if you will, to fill out a log in which we're going to be obliged to put down the length of the record, the time it was played, whether the playing in it was done by Canadian musicians, the singing by Canadian artists, what company it came from, the record number, etc; well, if that means one or two persons more in each station, then for some stations in sparsely populated communities with certain restrictions, you're adding an administrative load that's very hard to carry.

Mr. Fortier: That's the only place where there is a problem?

Mr. Dansereau: Let's say that, in radio broadcasting, especially on the French-speaking side, by the force of circumstance, we've had to develop a record industry. When you think of broadcasting stations in Quebec, it's not with Frank Sinatra in English or things like that, that you're going to interest everybody. At first, French records were imported, which was pretty expensive, and also, they weren't always necessarily of good quality. There were some people who began to work in a small way, who set up small companies. Some of them went bankrupt; others survived. And finally, they succeeded in establishing to use the popular term, "the French Honours List", which is independent of the English or American "Hit Parade". They managed to keep those companies alive. And in French Canada, we already have a record industry that's really very viable, and that can be made use of. Unfortunately, that hasn't perhaps happened on the English side of radio broadcasting.

Mr. Fortier: So what are the problems that a small radio station like CHLN in Trois-Rivières comes up against? What are your major problems?

Mr. Dansereau: If you please, Mr. Fortier, CHLN is not a small radio station.

Mr. Fortier: I'm sorry. Relatively speaking?

Mr. Dansereau: Let's say the problems a small radio station can have are: in the first place, if it's a private station, it has to meet obligations imposed by law, by the government—there's the CRTC. It has to produce a certain number of hours. Very often that little station has the advantage of being affiliated to the CBC, and that's one of the advantages. There are disadvantages to the CBC affiliation, but that is one of the advantages that enables...

Mr. Fortier: Advantages or a disadvantage?

Mr. Dansereau: It's one of the advantages. But I would add that there are some disadvantages also.

Mr. Fortier: I'm going to ask that question of Mr. Gauthier also.

Mr. Dansereau: It's when you operate in a small market and are obliged to meet certain standards. There are places where really, with the competition, where the biggest stations come in, be they radio or television stations, and there are so many of them these days. Let's take the case of Sherbrooke: In Sherbrooke, there are 18 stations, about 18 radio signals coming in it can be 18, 10 or 11,—and even television, and there are some dailies there. In a little center where there are no dailies there are weeklies. But just the same, the merchants in a small center of 5,000, 6,000 or 10,000 persons, they're not people who can afford national advertising budgets. The great mass of national advertising is developed by the metropolitan radio or television stations. There's very little national revenue left that these little stations can count on. They have to count on local revenue.

We can give examples of stations operating in centers where they have a wonderfully big share of the audience, but this share amounts to very little because there are so few people, yet in some cases they reach 80 per cent of their audience. It just isn't worthwhile for a national customer to pay the cost of reaching those people.

Mr. Fortier: It could become so, as you say in your brief, if you can give this group of companies a group of stations, isn't that right?

Mr. Dansereau: Yes, it's one of the points extremely favourable to a group.

Mr. Fortier: First of all, for a station like yours, who is your chief competitor from the point of view, say, of listeners? For CHLN in Trois-Rivières, is it another radio station? A television station? Is it a newspaper? In your mind, as manager of the company, who is the chief competitor?

Mr. Dansereau: I'm tempted to tell you that there isn't any. I'm sincere when I say that. I consider that there isn't any competition. I consider that there are other people doing business, and they are never competitors, because you have to base yourself on the idea that you're better than the others, and if you're better, there's no competition.

Mr. Fortier: What proportion of your audience do you reach with CHLN? A little while ago you mentioned 80 per cent, I think. According to the BBM?

Mr. Dansereau: Let's say that in Trois-Rivières, we pretty well divide the audience with the other radio station.

Mr. Fortier: The other station which is independent?

Mr. Dansereau: It's also an independent station. What we call "local coverage", I would say 70 per cent. Well, in this case, look, those are figures off the top of my head. You know that in our group with the FM stations (there are 8 or 9) it's pretty hard to remember all the figures.

Mr. Fortier: From the point of view of advertising, who is your chief competitor? Do you consider it to be the newspaper or television, or another radio station?

Mr. Dansereau: In national advertising it's television; in local advertising it's the newspaper.

The Chairman: I wonder if I might ask Mr. Dansereau a question. You did say, as I understand the translation, that the new CRTC Canadian content regulations present no problem for your radio station. Is that correct? You mentioned the problem of keeping track...

Mr. Dansereau: For a French-speaking station, for producing the amount, let us say percentage wise of what we have to produce of Canadian content, let us say, on records or through talent, no problems. It is only in...

The Chairman: I appreciate your point. I wanted to ask you...

Senator Smith: What is the rest of his sentence? I didn't get that.

The Chairman: Well, the problem he has spoken about at length is that it presents administrative problems.

Mr. Fortier: Manpower.

The Chairman: Manpower, which is not the question I want to pursue, however.

You are, I believe, a director of the Canadian Association of Broadcasters?

Mr. Dansereau: Yes.

The Chairman: Is that correct?

Mr. Dansereau: Yes.

The Chairman: Therefore, this may be a very unfair question and I am not trying put you on the spot but I would be curious to know what you think of these regulations as they refer to the rest of the stations in Canada outside of Quebec? Are you in favour of those regulations for those stations?

I am asking you in your capacity as a director of CAB I will be quite prepared to accept an answer that you do not want to answer. I do not want to embarrass you. However, I am curious to know what you think of the regulations.

Mr. Dansereau: Well, I would rather not because there is a...

The Chairman: There is a CAB position?

Mr. Dansereau: There is a CAB position and there is my own position and within the CAB position—my own personal view—let us say I would not talk about the CAB position—is that I do not find that these regulations will hurt us but basically I am against regulations.

The Chairman: Period?

Mr. Dansereau: Period because I feel that the tendency of regulations are restrictive and I feel that broadcasting at large, if we would not have maybe these restrictive decisions or regulations we have to follow, we would be able to produce better broadcasting.

As an example of that, let us say a lot of people are saying there are too many commercials on radio or television. My own personal view would be, thinking that way, why not let people do whatever they want to do with a licence for a certain number of years. Let us say five years.

The Chairman: Five years?

Mr. Dansereau: Let them operate and if somebody is crazy enough in between eight and nine o'clock in the morning to have forty-five minutes of commercials and two minutes of news, he will be wiped out within a matter of a couple of years as far as his ratings are concerned; no more commercials on his station because he would have had too many commercials and he would not be able to operate the station. Then the CRTC would have been able to say, "Have you been really fulfilling your mandate which is to inform, which is to entertain your people and also the cultural aspect of it?"

But the more restrictive you become the worse it is for us to produce a better product.

The Chairman: Let us take your example. Let us say that CHLN—I would agree this is a hypothetical example, you would not do such a thing, I am sure, but suppose you did run forty-five commercials between eight and nine o'clock on your radio station, would it not be a terrible thing to make the listeners of Troisi-Rivières suffer through five years of that before they would get some redress?

Mr. Dansereau: They would not have to suffer for five years.

The Chairman: What would be their alternative?

Mr. Dansereau: Their alternative would be to switch to a more interesting station and we were talking about eighteen of them penetrating in our district.

Senator McElman: Mr. Chairman, according to the CAB, that would increase their listening audience if they had more commercials.

Mr. Dansereau: Sir, if I may be permitted. There is partly some truth in that statement, you know, because basically a commercial is news for a lot of people, for a housewife. When she hears that such and such a store is having its annual sale, it is news to her. When there is a new product that is coming on the air, that is news; and if she does not know, this new product would not be able to be marketed and this company would not be able to produce it and some people would lose their jobs. So I still feel that a commercial is news.

The Chairman: But you would not run forty-five an hour?

Mr. Dansereau: No.

Senator McElman: Of that type of news?

Mr. Dansereau: No, not of that type of news. Maybe I have been talking too long.

The Chairman: No, I am sure you have not. I was not trying to embarrass you. It is another example, Mr. Beaubien, I am sure, where I think broadcasters in Quebec have an advantage in this kind of a regulation.

I think the English language broadcasters are going to have to scramble, or so they tell us, because the proposed regulations present a real hardship for them. I was interested in your views. I noticed in the biography that you were a director of CAB and that is why I asked you.

Senator McElman: Could I have a supplementary. Mr. Chairman?

The Chairman: Yes, Senator McElman.

Did you want to add something Mr. Dansereau?

Mr. Dansereau: Just that it was not because I did not really want to talk about the CAB position—but because they possibly will be in front of the CRTC on Thursday morning; so I did not want to answer that.

The Chairman: Quite.

Senator McElman: Forgetting about CAB for the moment, does the example of Quebec and the broadcasting industry in Quebec not indicate that when people care deeply by enough about the continuation or preservation of a culture, that not only will they in fact do things to protect it and strengthen it but also that the media, reflecting and leading in some cases, will also take action to protect the culture or milieu concerned?

Is this not what we have in truth here, an example of this in action?

Mr. Dansereau: I think I would like to say that you are right.

Senator McElman: Is the media reflecting or leading?

Mr. Beaubien: Interesting...

Senator McElman: My impression is that they are reflecting.

Mr. Dansereau: Also leading. Well, to come back to the example of the record industry in the Province of Quebec, the media has been leading there. Maybe—oh—I am entering on a hot potato.

The Chairman: Well, you can throw it away, if you want to. If you would like to say something, please do.

Mr. Dansereau: Maybe on the political side, the media is reflecting, not leading but in the development of talent, the media is leading.

The Chairman: I think, Mr. Beaubien wanted to say something on this perhaps before we go on.

Mr. Beaubien: I think it is difficult to say it is either/or situation. I think that in everything I look at in this industry, there is a bit of both.

In many instances—and I am a newcomer to the industry so I can afford to perhaps say these things and you can chalk them up to ignorance—he has twenty years' experience in the field. When I first arrived in this industry, I had a great idea of coming and maybe perpetuating a little bit of what we had done successfully in the Theme Building, which was to take people with their desire to have knowledge and help them broaden themselves; and help them grow; and help them measure themselves in a dimension that is greater from their day-to-day preoccupation.

I have been constantly frustrated since that day in finding the way to do it; in finding the way to lead and still not lose the audience. There is a level but it must be done very discreetly. Knowledge is very helpful here; and so if you do it too quickly, you lose the ratings. You lose the audience. You lose the advertising. You lose revenue because we are not sponsored by anything in the government.

Therefore, it is a delicate balance to always try to step one step higher, to get them to reach and to keep it interesting and our big challenge is to know that the population has a great need for knowledge and a thirst for knowledge and still find an imaginative, creative, skilled way to present it so they will watch it and they will grow because they want to grow.

Now, that is difficult in what he was saying is an atmosphere of fear. It is difficult to build this industry to the point where it was left to us by people like their fathers who had grown in this industry, who were rugged entrepreneurs and individualists, who moved into this field and took risks and had the imagination and had no bounds and just moved to give us ideas and concepts.

We find it difficult to continue to have that same kind of energy and drive and production and creativity and the educational spirit today when we have three major investigations on the part of the various kinds of government.

We recognize their right to do it. We come here happily and openly and say to you Thank God, we want to tell you what we think", because maybe we will get to the people of Canada and will tell them to relax a little bit, we are not that bad. We are really animated with as much desire to help you and give you what you want as much as any other profession that we see today, except we have not been able to communicate that and you are a suspicious population because you think we are exploiting you and because you think we are giving you something that you do not know."

I wish now we had more time because we have just invested quite a bit of money going into our market and trying to find out what they want, trying to find out how we are reaching them and it is a bit discouraging sometimes.

We have not found the imaginative and creative way to do this. I am sorry I have led off on one end which was the leadership element and, "yes", we see that responsibility of leadership. "Yes", we think about it more than any other single element and do you know something? We do not necessarily think about it because we are fearing the CRTC or we are fearing what you are going to say. We do it because we think that is our mandate and as good businessmen, that is the way we are going to make money, if we succeed in doing it. But I tell you right now I was trying to explain—I didn't explain it too well earlier—what is missing now, is the climate of confidence, where the people of our regions look at us with a feeling that we are really in a sense performing a function and not exploiting them; that we are making a profit but that we are really well deserving of that level of profit.

Mind you, in our company this is the exception because we are not yet. We want to convey the same thing to the Government of Canada and the same thing to the CRTC.

Maybe we are echoing the fact. We realize it is a common property. We realize that controls are needed. We realize there are investigations that are needed but somewhere, somehow, we are going to have to work more closely together because it is getting so technically complicated and it is getting so expensive in equipment and that equipment is getting so disarrayed or run down. It depreciates so quickly and we are nervous.

We are not now getting ready in our area to play the role that you expect us as French-speaking Canadians to reflect the true image of the French-speaking community in the other parts of the world when the satellites come. We are not ready for that right now. We need more equipment. We need better people. We need training. We have got the technicians. But we have a lot to do.

I hate to tell you, Senators, what this has cost us in the past year in energy, in money, concern and we do not know the solution.

We recognize your right to have us before you today and we have come openly with the hope, however, that by communicating this, you can then come back with a recommendation that will make it easier for us to work so we can find the climate that has built this industry; the climate of confidence that will permit us to provide the imagination and the creativity and the spark and drive and the things that you would expect of us.

But I tell you now we are not giving because we are so concerned about licence renewals, concerned about the fact, are we abiding by all the regulations? Are we going to be penalized in this element and it is a delicate balance.

It is an awfully difficult thing. So the only conclusion I want to create here, the only contribution I would like to make is that I hope that as a result of coming here, that the dialogue that you have permitted us to engage in today will continue.

I would hope there would be more and better ways that we can start exchanging views with the members of regulatory bodies.

I hope as a private enterprise businessman that I will have the opportunity of working with members of government, that we do not necessarily take our stands on two positions that are different and say: "I am justified in that stand and can justify it in a court of law", and, "the government is justified in that stand and they can justify it in a court of law but we will never get together".

This is the problem that we face. This is why we have come today. This is why we are working with regulatory agencies.

This is why I personally served on two national advisory councils of our country to try and devote time and effort to get these points across. That is why we spend a lot of time having our executives sit on the CAB, on the ACRTF and on any organization or committee that are formed—so that we can dialogue and get our points across.

We have not been able to get it across yet.

The Chairman: In the spirit of dialogue, let me put a question to you which I do put in the spirit of dialogue. There may be an inconsistency in what you say and perhaps you could explain it. You have talked very movingly about the climate of confidence which built the broadcasting industry in Canada.

Would it not also be fair to say, however, that that climate of confidence which built the broadcasting industry in Canada has presumably also built the climate of public distrust which you have also talked about.

Mr. Beaubien: I think at that time it was not so much that it had a climate of confidence. It was a new industry. It had no regulations. It was just starting to mushroom and open up. As it developed and the techniques developed and the competition came from other information media—and there have been problems essentially in the organization where controls were necessary...

We say to you today we do not want to abolish controls. We do not want to abolish investigations. We recognize the right of controls. We recognize the right of being accountable to governmental organizations.

What we are inviting is to do it in a climate of—well, I think Mr. Dansereau had a word—rather than a penalty, an incentive. If we could get back to that level, an incentive to people to do more of the kind of things that you think are right rather than saying you are wrong.

The Chairman: Do you think that the broadcasters are sufficiently self-analytical or self-critical?

Mr. Beaubien: It is difficult for me as a new member of this industry to be critical about this element but I would say that I see, honestly, Senator, more preoccupation on the part of broadcasters to fulfill their mandate and their role than I see in most of the industries and other fields of endeavour I have been exposed to in a relatively short life.

The Chairman: Why? Are the broadcasters more dedicated?

Mr. Beaubien: No, because of what Mr. Fortier said, because they realize that their sole existence is dependent on something that does not belong to them, something that is loaned to them, something that can be taken away just like that.

It is not easy, you know, to raise money and to go to the public and get them to come with you to invest in a company as we are doing now today, when that licence is granted for only a given number of years.

It takes a lot of confidence on the part of people who are waiting to invest in you as a person knowing it is for only a short term.

Now, that is one of the reasons why broadcasters are very much concerned about this.

The second reason I think is that they live in a milieu, as has been mentioned, and they are very much in tune with real life. They cannot escape it.

I am not making apologies. We make mistakes. We are not perfect. We are looking at ways of improving. We have made our share of mistakes but I see real dedication in the broadcasters I have met—I am new in the arena—but I also feel I am really concerned right now.

We are away off the subject, I am sorry.

The Chairman: No. I think we are very much on the subject. I think Senator McElman, you are on a supplementary question, I am sorry.

Senator McElman: We are certainly on the subject. This is all relevant to our discussion. It has been indicated to us that if people care enough about something they will find the means of strengthening and continuing, and—I realize I am now getting into a very involved subject but it is important, I think—is this not an example to Canadians?

We have had testimony that broadcasters, particularly radio, have been the great protectors of the Canadian identity, of Canadian culture. We have had other testimony that they have swamped Canadians with Americanization which is robbing Canadians of their culture and their identity.

Broadcasters, this is all through the briefs and the CAB have suggested that they have protected the Canadian culture; and here we have surely an example where broadcasters within the community are protecting the culture.

Is there not a lesson to be learned here for broadcasters in Canada as a whole, that if they as broadcasters care enough—and obviously Canadians want to be Canadians, not Americans—that if they as broadcasters care enough about the Canadian identity and Canadian culture, that they could make a much greater contribution than they are already making by developing the mood for French Canadian artists to reach a French Canadian audience and so on.

Are things not happening in Quebec to a degree that are not happening similarly in English Canada to protect the Canadian identity.

Mr. Beaubien: It is awfully difficult for us to answer about a market that we do not know. There is no doubt that, speaking about our market, we have been very fortunate in being able to help our community, we think in very many ways.

For instance, we have the language that we speak—not at the present time, but our other official language in Canada, is getting a lot purser and more refined. Influenced by radio and television in our communities, there is a beautiful French that is being spoken which we refer to as "La langue s'est épurée". It is particularly more pleasant and it is particularly more—the adjective is more difficult.

Mr. Fortier: Rarified?

Mr. Beaubien: Rarified. I think that is one objective.

The second point is that I feel that we are really trying to involve the artists and the local management in the community by selecting as Directors, people who are truly representative members of their communities.

I do not know if you have had an opportunity to take a look at the seven or eight last pages in our brief. We have begun to try and get people who are really involved in the community and we meet with them.

We have about ten companies—although we have not received authority from the CRTC to operate now and we must get authority to operate—we are going to leave those companies stronger for our being there, because we have begun a plan to select individuals and we go to meet and talk with them. We travel to Rimouski. We go with Mr. Dansereau and meet with the boards, so we do try to get involved in these television stations.

We have not succeeded yet, but we are still trying to find a way to get more involvement on the part of our people.

I cannot answer for the other market but we are encouraged by what we find in our own part of the world.

The way we have started is to try to interpret that visage of Quebec, that face of Quebec to other parts of Canada, not only to English speaking Canadians in our community, who are more important to us to earning French and to become familiar with it, but to other parts of Canada.

For instance, through an associated company—we did not discuss it in the brief here because we are a separate company—we supply French-speaking television programmes every week that are played in Hamilton, in the heart of English-speaking Canada and those programmes run once a week. It is called "Bonsoir Copains". It is made in Sherbrooke by Mr. Dansereau and it is a good little programme. They have youngsters singing French-Canadian songs. We ship it to Hamilton and they put it on, French commercials and all, once a week.

We have got a file of letters not only from French-speaking Canadians but from school teachers, from people in the community who say: "Look, this is a good way to learn and it is quite different."

There are quite a few good songs coming out of Quebec right now.

Well, it is difficult for me to answer about a market I do not know too much about.

Senator McElnan: One final question. If the English-speaking Canadian broadcasters were to endeavour to communicate to Canadians, through their programmings that it is important to maintain the Canadian identity and that they, for example, were going to provide some leadership in it, would you expect the Canadian people to give more evidence of their support for such an approach by broadcasters? Or are they too Americanized already?

I do not ask you to answer that as a French-Canadian but just as a Canadian.

Mr. Beaubien: You see, the hesitancy I have in answering, Senator, is because I think that we are doing some of that.

Senator McElnan: Some of it?

Mr. Beaubien: Yes. I think that where maybe we have lacked a little bit is to explain to the people what we are doing, when we are doing it and what it takes to do it. I say the cost of doing this because do not kid yourself, it is very expensive to start originating programming. It is costing us an arm and a leg.

Senator McElnan: But the French broadcasters have not backed away from that cost, have they?

Mr. Beaubien: Sir, we have had to because let us face it...

The Chairman: Which is back to my original point.

Mr. Beaubien: There is no source of French-speaking programming in other parts of the world that is available to us. We are faced with it and we are doing it.

Mind you, I think it is a good idea that we are doing it. I think we are developing talent. I think it is a question of degree. I think it is a question of...

Senator McElman: You say the broadcasters are doing some of it.

Mr. Beaubien: Yes.

Senator McElman: If they were doing a reasonable amount of it, would there be any need for the content regulations now proposed?

Mr. Beaubien: This is what I am saying. I am just wondering if there are not other ways we can investigate to try and encourage them to do it rather than force them to do it.

I am just wondering if, in our kind of economy or our kind of life today, the incentive is not more appropriate than the penalty. I do not know.

Senator McElman: There has not in fact been much encouragement and the industry has been with us for many years.

Mr. Beaubien: I have not got the competence to answer that question. All I am saying is that I am hoping that this element that I have described, the climate of confidence which you have helped to set up because you have asked us to talk and we have spoken openly, that you will seriously look and think about this.

I think there is good going to come out of this because the recommendations you are going to make are going to be made with more intimate knowledge of all of us and this is what we welcome and the one conclusion we bring back this past year is that we want to go back in our own communities and start to explain to the people of the communities what we are, what we are doing, how we operate, what are our problems.

We want to take cameras and turn them around and show them how a news room works. We want to show them what it takes to make a program, what is the cost? Where did the idea come from?

We want to tell them how we encourage the development of ideas of programmes as a means of explaining and communicating a little bit more and invite dialogue on the part of our people.

The conclusion: the most frustrating thing is too often we find our audience apathetic, not interested and this is our challenge. We have not found out how to overcome that yet so they can come in and explain themselves and talk to us.

The Chairman: Thank you. Mr. Fortier?

[Translation]

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Beaubien, a little while ago you drew a parallel between the theme pavilions at Expo which were, we know, a great success, and what you want to do with Télémedia. I couldn't help turning to page 21 of your brief where you say that one of your objectives is:

"Try to achieve an intelligent and reasonable balance, both in station operation and in programming, in presenting the facts of modern life as it is lived. Create a positive approach, pointing towards the future with optimism."

Is that from Expo? Also, you mention your Board of Directors at Télémedia; and it's "Who's Who at Expo"; Mr. Shaw, Mr. Jasmin and Mr. Beaubien. If you can transplant your success at Expo into Télémedia, well, good for you".

Mr. Beaubien: That's very kind of you.

Mr. Fortier: To get back to this paragraph in your brief, are you talking only about a situation that you have noticed, that you've experienced in Quebec, or are you describing a situation that you find everywhere in America, in English Canada and the United States?

Mr. Beaubien: Today, unfortunately, people think that bad news is news. Happy people don't make a story, they say. And we, as individuals, are surprised at the number of bad news items aimed at us in one day. We got the idea of applying that as a strategy. When one of the men in one of our stations took Thursday night's paper and cut it up, putting the good news items in one pile and the bad news items in another pile, 80 per cent of the weight of the paper, if I remember right, maybe not 80 per cent,...

Mr. Dansereau: Not far from it.

Mr. Fortier: I won't ask you which paper it is because Mr. Dansereau is beside you.

Mr. Beaubien: That was the bad news and 20 per cent was good news. We were surprised, when we listened to our own radio and television stations and realized that it was mainly bad news. We are going to try, wherever we can, to introduce a bit of humour to make people smile, but not to change the news.

In the second place, Mr. Dansereau was telling me yesterday about meeting one of the morning men from our biggest radio station and he told him that there wasn't only bad news, that there were things also that were going well in Quebec. There are problems, but there is good news and confidence should be re-instilled in the people. The people are often over-burdened, tired. We have a role to play; you often see the head of the family, the business man who returns home in the evening. He has worked all day, has had problems and worries, and doesn't want to hear only about things that are going badly.

Mr. Fortier: There are some weeklies and even some dailies in Quebec that show that there's a good part of the population that is eager for bad news.

Mr. Beaubien: That's right. I think they are completely satisfied these days. I think we can try to give other elements that a good part of the population needs. You mentioned Expo, and I'm mentioning it again. People wanted to go to a place where there was no pollution, where it was quiet, where there were no cars, where there were flowers and where there was music. You could rest and watch the people go by. There was never any jostling or fighting. Never once to my knowledge. Man used to dream. Man as we know him has a different attitude. It isn't normal for man to live in air-conditioned buildings where the air is artificial and the light is artificial. We tried to give him back the climate in which he is most human. And then, without influencing the news, we must give him back an element of joviality, enthusiasm and optimism.

Mr. Fortier: Isn't that a somewhat utopian climate? Do you want to dissociate him from very-day life, from reality? Because, as has been said here before the Committee, we live in a real world. Does good news capture a television audience?

Mr. Beaubien: I don't think we change the news. What we try to do is to put in an optimistic note, a gay note. It can be in a women's programme. But what there is in the news bulletin, the news, we can't change. I think Mr. Dansereau has a word to say about that, because he is dealing with it at this time.

Mr. Dansereau: If I may; I wanted quite simply to add that it doesn't necessarily affect the news. News per se is news. Although it is said, it is still news and we should pass it on. Nobody is ever going to deny that. But it's mainly the climate around the programming, the atmosphere created by the station. As Mr. Beaubien said, the morning man instead of saying: "Well, look, the air is polluted, the traffic is stuck, there were three murders, there's so much of this, there's so much of that", and also "It's raining; it's a Monday; Madam, you have your housework to do, and besides that I'm in a hurry for the programme to end." It's possible to say something else.

Mr. Fortier: Continue your example, and tell us what he should say about the temperature, for example.

Mr. Beaubien: He can announce that tomorrow it's going to be beautiful.

Mr. Fortier: 50,000 cars have made the trip between Montreal and Quebec and there hasn't been any accident. What's he going to say about that subject?

Mr. Dansereau: Do you know that if there's only one weekend accident it's already a record, it's improving? It's much more encouraging. Instead of saying: "There's been an accident, there's been a death, the fellow was plastered, and it was ugly to see."

Mr. Fortier: I agree. Now, what about air pollution?

[Text]

The Chairman: Perhaps I could ask about Les Canadiens missing the playoffs. Is that good news or bad news?

[Translation]

Mr. Dansereau: In Quebec, when Canadiens lose, it is bad news. There is no doubt about it.

Mr. Fortier: I saw a recent news item of Mr. Bourassa in La Presse which said that, had he been in power, Canadiens would not have lost.

Mr. Dansereau: This is simply to explain that what counts is the global climate of a station. It is to try to make things more encouraging without wishing to change life as it is—at least to show certain aspects of life. One hears of all kinds of problems; I was just yesterday telling the chap of whom Mr. Beaubien was talking: "Listen, there must have been one good thing that happened yesterday in Montreal." And I added: "Why didn't we try to find it? Why didn't you speak more about it?" Simply this. Let us begin by what we call "positive thinking".

Mr. Beaubien: This is not in the news. It is in the commentary, in the way of presenting things. This is the way that creation of a climate of trust among individuals will be helped along.

Mr. Fortier: Do you think that there is a radio or television station in Canada which does this?

Mr. Dansereau: I think that there are several which try to do this. There are those which more or less succeed.

Mr. Fortier: For the enlightenment of the Committee, without speaking against the others, who are those, in your opinion, who succeed the most, because this positive climate is a point of view, directed towards the future of which you speak so eloquently. Have you tested it?

Mr. Beaubien: I can tell you that CHLN, in Trois-Rivières, started doing this. The other day, I was listening to the news on CHLN, and the announcer said: "Ladies and gentlemen, I regret that the news was not very good, today; we'll try and do better tomorrow." I can tell you that in a specific case, station CKAC which we manage in Montreal, has taken as its attitude to try to have an encouraging element in certain programmes, especially in serious programmes—things like drugs, serious community problems; that it not only be pitfalls, so to speak, that there is hope, that there is a solution to be found for these problems. This is not in the news; it is found in the programmes.

Mr. Fortier: It is still part of information. Is it at the information level?

Mr. Beaubien: No, it is a programme which takes place during the day for the housewife where there are commentaries on the religious point of view, on drugs, where there will be guests invited who speak. It is not in the framework of the news; it is in the framework of what we are doing. There is a kind of fragmented programme, which is a programme directed towards joy and where there are commentaries every week only on good news.

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Beaubien, these serious programmes you were talking about quickly a little while ago; I'd like to return to this subject. These are the serious programmes where you use your influence as broadcasters, where you influence your public, aren't they?

Mr. Beaubien: I think we rather reflect it, Mr. Fortier. This is the point which was brought up a while ago by Senator McElman.

I think we do two things. A while ago, I spoke of "leadership", where we must try, most of the time, to reflect the climate. Members of the public are invited to come to our studios, to speak to us themselves. Our task is not to preach to the public. Rather, our role is to create a means whereby different opinions in the community will come to be expressed so that the community speaks to itself. This is what we call the third dimension of the community. Our task is to give the news. We have the duty to listen to you on "open line" programmes. We equally have the duty of inviting you, as business men, and others from the labour movement, so that you hold a discussion while we play the part of moderators. We have the duty to bring students, professors, doctors, nurses, patients, priests and laymen in a community so that they can talk among themselves.

Mr. Fortier: Do you not also have this role of editorializing of which you speak on page 23 of your brief? Do you not also have this role of editorializing and must you not also express the thought of the broadcaster?

Mr. Beaubien: We can come back to this. Mr. Dansereau can speak to you, for example, about what our policy is at the present time. First of all, facts are sacred. All our stations give facts. Secondly, we have information forums where certain men are invited to give their points of view. These are personal comments, and in certain cases, there is the editorial which reflects the editor's thought. I must tell you that, in general, Télémédia is essentially a decentralized company. We do not have a general policy. Our stations operate differently from region to region. We wish to continue this as it is. We think that one day when a master company will begin to dictate a point of view, whether it be head office at Place Ville Marie or elsewhere, our information and editorial policy for the different regions, it will no longer reflect the community in which it operates. It will no longer fulfill its role. I, therefore, tell you that our policy is essentially decentralized, and that we do not have in Télémédia as such any editorial policy.

Mr. Fortier: But doesn't the management company have to insist up to a certain point that within certain parameters—to use a word which Mr. Desmarais used before this Committee,—...

Mr. Beaubien: Mr. Desmarais!

Mr. Fortier: Paul. Within certain editorial parameters, there was a free hand, but that, in any case, the parameters are set by the owner?

Mr. Dansereau: Listen. I do not know what really is the policy of Mr. Desmarais or of La Presse from an editorial point of view. Besides, I don't think we are here to discuss this.

Mr. Fortier: No, this is not my idea.

Mr. Dansereau: Our own policy is that, basically, Télémedia as such is in fact a management company. Télémedia is a management company only which operates stations which are real entities, which do not have editorial policies either within parameters or internally. We simply say: "Listen, you have regulations; first you are obliged to follow the Broadcasting Act, you have the CRTC regulations". The rest is done locally, whether it be in matters of programming or in commentaries, or editorials, and it is decided locally, so to speak, where the station is situated. We can even tell you something: I believe that in all our stations, there is only one which really broadcasts what we could call an editorial. In our opinion, an editorial represents the thought of the company. The balance of our stations present commentaries. CKAC can establish alternative suggestions and other things in other places. In this case, it is really the opinion of the person expressing himself. In each case, if people do not agree with us, if they do not agree with the opinions expressed, we try to leave them the opportunity to contradict the one who has just spoken, whether through "open line" broadcasts or through another public forum type of programme.

It therefore is best summarized thus: that Télémedia, as such, has no editorial policy. Where there might be editorial policies, these are strictly determined in their locality by the general manager of the station and the local board of directors. And where there are commentaries, well, as long as the person sticks to the boundaries established by common sense, as long as it does not become libellous, well, it's his opinion.

Mr. Fortier: Yes, this answers my question.

Text]

The Chairman: Thank you, Mr. Dansereau. May I say to the Senators and others I want to adjourn in five minutes. It is now five minutes to one. I would like to adjourn this session at one o'clock.

Do you have other questions, Mr. Fortier? Can you complete them in five minutes?

Mr. Fortier: Yes, well I will attempt to.

The Chairman: I will suggest, Mr. Fortier, you are going to do more than attempt. We really must adjourn at 1.00 p.m.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortier: You see, it is not only from the CRTC that directives are received.

Mr. Beaubien, after your presentation of March 11 before the CRTC, Mr. Claude Ryan published an editorial in Le Devoir on Thursday, March 19, 1970. The editorial was entitled: "A public empire for a song." I have reason to believe that you have read it. I wonder if you could,—in fact, during the next five minutes, I am offering you the opportunity to answer more specifically to the third paragraph, centre column, here where Mr. Ryan says, and I quote:

There are within this generous project which is offered to future share subscribers elements which are so staggering that it is doubted that such a project is possible, unless it is submitted that unidentified interests have stated themselves to be disposed to offer considerable guarantees to subscribers.

Could you comment on this?

Mr. Beaubien: In French or in English?

Mr. Fortier: The Senators are aware of this editorial.

Mr. Beaubien: I have tried, sincerely and objectively, to deliver a message with regard to the people of Quebec and Canada, about what the facts were in this situation—I gave them all. I met Mr. Ryan on that same afternoon on which he wrote this editorial. I met him to tell him that I believed that he had not been completely informed about the facts because he had not attended this conference. I must tell you, openly and completely, and perhaps—I ask myself how I can communicate the truth.

The truth is that there is no one, secretly or indirectly, underneath this transaction. The truth is that a group of French Canadians got together, put their capital, also found companies ready to place their money to make a first payment expecting to purchase radio and television stations, which in large part, were losing money last year, which was not interesting. I can tell you that these facts were not reported, that these companies were pressed for time. And, secondly, that personally, to buy that company, not only must we make certain substantial loans, but we must devote our life, personally, and myself, personally, for at least ten years in this situation, if I do not go to public financing. I must remain there; I must undertake to remain in that company and not take up another career to guarantee it. I can only tell the Honourable Senators that there are subscribers of shares in this company, who are among the public; the list is not yet official. Unfortunately, I cannot yet announce them, because my subscription is not yet filled. I can tell you that it will be well received by French Canadian businesses in this field, who are ready to begin again investment in a company such as ours. I can tell you that there are no unidentified interests who have declared themselves willing to guarantee subscribers considerable securities other than those who will be revealed when I have finished completing the number of persons who will be private subscribers. Power Corporation has absolutely no involvement from the management, voting, ownership, or influence point of view in our company. They are in no way interested. I did not even succeed in convincing them that one of them remain on the Board of Directors of our company. If you allow me, gentlemen, I can show as proof of this something which Power Corporation has just published in its last offer of "Consolidated Bathurst", and it says in it—and it will be revealed in its financial statement next month,—and it is stated in three places; allow me to read it. It is found on page 22 of this offer.

"On December 4, 1969, Trans-Canada concluded an agreement with Philippe de Gaspé Beaubien in the name of a company subsequently constituted, Télémedia, (Québec) Limitée, with a view to the purchase by this latter company of all interests of Trans-Canada and Télémedia in matters of radio and television."

This statement is signed by P. Ross, their auditors.

Secondly, I find at page 27 of the same report the portfolio of Power Corporation which is clearly indicated, authorized by the auditor listing participation of Télémedia under a column which is marked: goods and debentures, non-preferred shares, non ordinary shares. On page 28, the following page, where there is the explanation of that matter, there is one paragraph. Allow me:

"In conformity with the terms of an agreement dated December 4, 1969, Power Corporation agree to sell at its cost price, certain assets in Télémedia Incorporée."

And it is only "some of the assets" because they were not all purchased. They were purchased from Télémedia Incorporée in return for debentures of Télémedia (Québec) Limitée. This transaction is subject to CRTC approval. Therefore, I must frankly and openly tell you that Power Corporation—and perhaps I will not succeed in explaining it—has absolutely no management, no vote, no participation other than as lender to the company. And we are anxious to be able to repay them so as to prove that a group of young men, as we are, are able to do something in our own sphere. I find it a pity that it was not possible to find words to explain this, and I conclude by saying that I believe that all those who think differently are misinformed, and those who express themselves otherwise in informing the public, inform them wrongly. "It's not the truth". That is what I have just told you.

Mr. Fortier: One last question. Allowing for present projections, and supposing that the CRTC grants you the permit you are asking, when do you expect to go to public financing?

Mr. Beaubien: As soon as our financial position allows us to show reasonable enough and interesting enough profits to interest our people to participate,—as soon as it will be interesting to participate in our company. I hope it will be soon, because already in April, the majority of companies which operated at a loss will operate at a profit with the exception of one. And soon the need will be felt inside the companies for additional capital.

[Text]

The Chairman: Thank you, Mr. Beaubien. May I just say to you and your colleagues that I hope we had made it clear by our questioning that the committee is indeed mindful of the very special position you occupy vis-à-vis the CRTC in these days while you are waiting for a decision.

We have tried to be mindful of that in our questioning. As I said earlier we want you to know that our interests in Télémedia (Québec) Limitée is particularly in the way in which it fits into the broad media spectrum not only in Quebec but in all Canada.

I think your presentation has been particularly effective. I would like to congratulate you on what I regard as a most compelling presentation and I have been impressed particularly by its optimism.

We are grateful to you and in expressing my gratitude to you personally, I hope I can also express it to your colleagues and to the people who are with you here today and I say to the other gentlemen, thank you so much for coming.

May I say to the members of the Committee the next hearing is at four o'clock this afternoon, Western Broadcasting Company Limited. The meeting originally scheduled for 2.30, Winnipeg Channel 12 Ltd., has been cancelled.

Thank you.

—Upon resuming at 4.05 p.m.

The Chairman: May I perhaps begin by reminding the senators that we will meet in this room tonight at 7.30, an in camera session for half an hour. The Senate sits at eight o'clock and the committee is not sitting this evening, as I am sure you are aware. If we could meet here at 7.30 p.m. for about half an hour, we will certainly adjourn in time for the Senate at eight o'clock.

The brief we are going to receive this afternoon is from Western Broadcasting Limited. Seated on my immediate right is the President, Mr. Frank Griffiths. On my immediate left, Mr. William Hughes, who is Executive Vice-President; and seated on the extreme right, next to Mr. Griffiths, is Mr. Warren Earl Barker, who is News Director of CKNW.

Mr. Griffiths, the brief which you prepared was received, in compliance with our guidelines, several weeks in advance. It has been circulated to the Senators and it has presumably been studied by them. We would like to all on you now for a brief opening statement. You can talk about the brief or other matters which may be on your mind and following that we would like to ask you questions on your oral statement, on your written brief, or other matters. Any questions we ask that you wish to refer to either of your colleagues, please feel free to do so. Welcome.

Mr. Frank Griffiths, President, Western Broadcasting Limited: Thank you, Senator Davey, and members of the Committee. My first observation is, of course, it is very pleasant to be in Ottawa this week. It is really delightful. Mr. Hughes has been here a few days longer because, as many of you are aware, the CAB had their annual meeting over the past weekend. It looks as though Mr.

Hughes will be here longer because the CRTC meetings appear now to be going into the middle of next week and we have an appearance before them towards the end of their agenda.

The submission which we did file with you speaks particularly of our philosophy; tells you our history and speaks of our philosophy in broadcasting. We are not in any sense in the print media and hence are not so closely involved as many of your groups have been. From a broadcasting point of view I can say to you this: that our overriding principle is commitment to the community in which we are fortunate enough to be privileged to operate, and of course in broadcasting it is a privilege to operate.

The submission which we have filed, I think, sets forth quite generally our views on news and news dissemination and responsibility for news. We are somewhat at a disadvantage in Vancouver at the moment in that the accounts of the appearances before your committee over the past eight or nine weeks have been somewhat limited because we don't seem to have very much in the way of daily newspapers at the moment; so if anybody had said anything very sensational we would be aware, but otherwise perhaps we would not be aware.

With those few remarks I would say that really we are here to answer questions and if we can be of assistance we are pleased to do so. Thank you very much.

The Chairman: Thank you very much, Mr. Griffiths. I think the questioning this afternoon will begin with Senator McElman.

Senator McElman: Mr. Griffiths, you have mentioned the lack of newspapers. In this vacuum of print, what steps have you taken to extend, expand, change your news coverage?

Mr. Griffiths: I would like Mr. Hughes to answer that.

Mr. William Hughes, Executive Vice-president, Western Broadcasting Limited: Senator, I would like to make an opening statement with regard to that and then turn to Warren Barker who is our news director. We anticipated a question like this and that is why we took the time to bring our news director here so he could talk to you from an operational standpoint.

CKNW has, since 15 years ago, maintained probably one of the largest newsroom and news services in the country. We have the combination of Standard Radio—we have their news service across the country—and our Ottawa correspondent who is here this afternoon, Miss Empringham. This is one of our services.

We have been deeply involved in information news for many years. We have pioneered news every half hour on our station. We are not just a “rip and read” organization. It is compiled and presented on the station each half hour. On the half hour it is usually five minutes, but we have always stayed with long summaries. We do 15 minute summaries at eight o'clock in the morning and a 15 minute summary, including sports, at noon. A half hour summary after six p.m. and ten minutes at 10 p.m. That has not changed over the years because we have been involved in news. The thing we have done has nothing to do with the newspaper strike and...

The Chairman: Excuse me. Is that the same policy at your other station or are you talking only of CKNW?

Mr. Hughes: Because of its size CKNW has an emphasis on news. However, we have encouraged and assisted news development in the Winnipeg operation. They have also joined the Standard Network. For instance, they have a newsroom but because of the size of the market, the Winnipeg operation is not as comprehensive, I don't think, and as large as the Vancouver operation.

The Chairman: I didn't mean to interrupt. Go ahead. I just wanted to be clear on that.

Mr. Hughes: We have also engaged in other activities that radio stations in Canada are becoming more aware of. Mr. Barker now conducts a very fine business report every morning at 8.20. We also have engaged a well known columnist in Vancouver, Mr. Jack Wasserman, on a continuing basis. He comments three times a day. I was talking about 15 minute news blocks and we are now extending into half hour blocks. We were doing this before the newspaper strike.

In addition, we have invested over the years in what I would think is one of the highest paid commentators in the country, and one of the best newsmen in Canada today, Jack Webster. He is on the air from 9 a.m. until 12 noon every day of the week, Monday through Friday. He is on again from 6.30 to 7.15. I also brought in a man who wanted to train and who has a wide background in radio and television in San Francisco but wished to come to Canada. He is in his second year now; he has been a year and a half with us, he is on a comment program. He is not competing with Webster; it is a different type, more guests and in-depth and is on in the evening from 7.15 until 9 p.m.

Now with that type of coverage we really didn't need to increase our coverage because we felt we were doing a very wide coverage in any event.

With that comment I think Warren could take over and explain some of the features that we have added that we felt we could. For instance, obituaries are a real problem because I don't think it makes for very happy listening. We don't carry obituaries. I know this is a problem because people do have trouble in communicating in that area of births and marriages and other things like that. We feel that just listing off names is not particularly a function of radio.

The Chairman: What is the name of the 7.15 program?

Mr. Hughes: Art Finlay.

The Chairman: Is that a phone-in program as well?

Mr. Hughes: To a degree, except he does much longer interviews with in-depth studies with people rather than just straight phones. His latitude is that we don't want a repetition, say, of what Jack Webster has been doing. He is taking a completely different tack. I have to be careful with this because Webster has some terrific people on.

I know that Don Jamieson was telling me—the Minister of Transport—that he enjoys being on with Webster more than anyone else in the country and he is going to be on this coming Friday. We have had, in recent weeks, Mr. Kierans. We had a lot of unrest in our post office in the Vancouver area and we had Mr. Kierans on a direct line from Ottawa right to Vancouver and this was a very interesting program.

These are things that come to mind quickly because we are doing this kind of information dissemination all the time.

Mr. Fortier: Could I ask a question before we go to Mr. Barker? How did CKNW come to put this emphasis on news? Was this in order to answer a challenge from a competing station or was this because you felt your listeners wanted more news?

Mr. Hughes: Mr. Fortier, my background is news and I think I was orientated to this information dissemination. I gradually felt that when I became manager in 1954—we had pioneered in western music when we came on the air in 1945, but gradually I noticed the emergence of news and I have been a strong advocate of terrific participation in news and in dissemination of information.

We have spent large sums of money. It is too bad we can't take you to our newsroom and show you the electronic advances that we have made so that we can do this. People say to us "How can you put on conference calls and how can you bring in your service from Ottawa to Toronto cleaner than anyone else?" It is because we have taken the time to put the equipment in and because we are in the news business and communication business. Music really is not a too important aspect of our station.

Mr. Fortier: So this emphasis came into being because you felt that there was a void in the news coverage on radio in the community in Vancouver?

Mr. Hughes: No, I didn't feel that. Maybe I was ahead of my time, but I felt that the electronic medium was going to come into its own in communication with people.

Mr. Fortier: Did the advent of television have anything to do with that?

Mr. Hughes: A lot of people waved the flag and said we were going out of business. There was some way we had to fight back. I remember when I first came into the broadcasting business, 40 per cent of the people in Vancouver listened to radio stations in Seattle. No one listens any more because radio is Canadian. Maybe those stars are on television now. We had to survive somehow and survive we did through emphasis in news and information. You have, in our brief, some of the amounts of money we spent. It is by far the most expensive portion of our operation and the one of which we are the proudest.

Mr. Fortier: Do you envisage a day when CKNW may become an all news station?

Mr. Hughes: No, I don't. First, I don't think Vancouver is ready for it. I was in Los Angeles about three or four weeks ago and listened to KCBS and I have heard the news station in New York. I think it is interesting but I don't follow it as a steady diet.

I will tell you my impression of stations in radio. I don't think there is any loyalty to a television station. I think people take the schedule and go down it and say "I want to see 'Laugh-In' tonight, that is where it is. I want to see something else tonight and that is where that is." In radio it is different. We have emphasized our personalities; we have emphasized our news people. We are welcome in the home and we are part of the home. Three of our five people, that we would call key on the air in the entertainment section, have been with the station for 12 years. Warren Barker has been with the station since 1952; Jack Webster has been with us 10 years. We have kept our people and we publicize these people, and they are welcome and known in the home. I think this creates loyalty to radio.

The Chairman: I think we should turn to Mr. Barker.

Mr. Warren Earl Barker, News Director, CKNW: My personal contribution to the vacuum of newspaper news, much to the chagrin of our traffic department, is to run two minutes over in every newscast instead of one. That involves about nine newscasts a day.

But specifically and seriously to answer your question: what have we done to increase our news coverage? We have retained three of the reporters idled by the Sun and Province shut-down, not on a continual basis but a spot basis to cover assignments that have been conflicting with what our own staff have been assigned to, or to give extra coverage as required. They have been out on an average of perhaps five to seven assignments a week, particularly in the evening period which we find the most difficult to staff heavily. Whenever a meeting, or hearing, or function of some sort occurs, that we cannot staff with our own people and which has been drawn to our attention, we have sent the newspaper people out on our behalf.

This has been the gist of our efforts to increase our variety and coverage. Now the type of assignments these have involved—one of the newspapermen spent a week at Chilliwack covering the hearing on the deportation case, a special inquiry. The final report has not come down on that. Increased coverage of municipal councils, and that sort of function. That basically has been the increase in manpower and our endeavour to cover things that our own staff may not be fluid or large enough to handle at that particular moment.

The Chairman: How have you covered as a news story the absence of newspapers?

Mr. Barker: We have not been, shall we say, performing a regular analysis of how the market or the area has been suffering as such. We have endeavoured constantly, at considerable cost and phone charges at least, to keep adrift of any tendency to resume negotiations.

The Chairman: That is what I was referring to.

Mr. Barker: I have spent more money on calls to Colorado Springs, the International Union's headquarters, than I hate to mention. We have been sitting on top as best we can and whenever there is anything that looks like a resumption of negotiations, we have done our best to find out and report it. In other words, we have been treating it as the biggest labour story on the market.

Senator McElman: What has happened to your audience rating?

Mr. Hughes: The rating is due out this afternoon, Senator. I haven't heard. We were asking some of the broadcasters if they had heard. That covers the second and third weeks of March, which will be very interesting. It is due out today. I would like to comment...

Senator McElman: Could you let us have that?

Mr. Hughes: Yes. It is the BBM Service.

I would like to make a comment. Mr. Gray was commissioned to come to Vancouver to make a survey. I found the reports that I read in the Toronto Globe and Mail kind of interesting. Certainly I would like to go on record as saying that Vancouver is not a depressed and is not a breadline situation, or anything like that with the newspaper absence. I think that newspapers are an important part of the community and I think that Vancouver and environs is surviving without the newspapers. I think that this committee should remember that the stringent credit controls, tight money and unemployment can all be cited as reasons for some turn-down in the department store sales in Vancouver. I would refer you also to the City of Victoria, 72 miles away, which is served by two newspapers uninterrupted by the strike. I think any survey will show that their department store sales are down.

I repeat, the newspapers do tend to be an important part of our community but I would like to say that we can survive and we are not dying out there because the newspapers are not published.

Newspapers do a job and radio and television have done a tremendous job in the Vancouver market in complementing the newspapers and in taking over and communicating with the people. The advertisers—certainly we cannot think of coping with the volume that would be available and this is also actually the time of the year when radio stations traditionally are going into a better time of the year. If they are going to have a strike January is the month to have it for radio. Certainly we are carrying a full log in advertising, and the community is thriving. I am happy to make this point.

The Chairman: Do you feel that Mr. Gray gave the committee an unfair impression of the situation?

Mr. Hughes: I am biased; yes, I thought so. I think he went to advertising agencies and asked them and of course they are going to say "We really feel it" because they are not placing advertising in the newspapers and they are not getting the commission. Of course they are going to feel it. As a working broadcaster we have done a job. If he had gone to Victoria and the research is borne out, it will show that Victoria and other markets are suffering and they do have newspapers.

The Chairman: We might come back to that and talk about it in a few minutes.

Senator McElman: Have you developed any different type of advertising for new customers that have come to you and that perhaps will carry on in consequence of this shut-down?

Mr. Hughes: That is kind of difficult to answer. I think that the major complaint that we have is that broadcasting, radio and television, really are unable to satisfy a very important part of the daily life and that is the want ads, the classifieds. We don't lend ourselves to that type of advertising, and this is the complaint that I hear from advertisers that I have talked to. That is the inability to be able to use classified advertising.

A lot of advertisers felt they were dependent on print to sell, such acts as the Le Zeppelin and other different acts coming to town; they thought they had to depend on newspapers very largely, and of all things not use radio, which is primarily entertainment.

think these people have found out that radio really does sell people who are coming in to entertain. I have talked to a number of people in Famous Artists, who are the largest promoters in the Vancouver area, and to quote them they are more than pleased and say they are going to be very strong radio advertisers in the future because they have been playing to sold out houses.

I would give you a couple of other examples. The boat show came to Vancouver right at the start of the newspaper strike and they had the largest boat show we have had in the history of Vancouver. One hundred and forty-eight thousand people in ten days. What share of the credit would you give to radio? The share I would give is the substantially higher numbers that turned out. I would like to talk about the du Maurier international ski races that were on from February 26 to March 1. The reaction from the promoters was: "Far better than we ever expected."

The Five-year Plan in Vancouver went through with 60 per cent approval. The mayor was ecstatic. He couldn't believe that it could be done without newspapers. It was done and went through by 60 per cent. At the same time, the same day, I believe, West Vancouver put forth a school board by-law, which we would ordinarily think would automatically pass because anyone who is really interested in schools knows it is on and gets out and votes. The cons in this section maybe would not know about it and would not get out and vote. The West Vancouver school by-law was defeated because radio, primarily, and television, secondly, were able to explain the issues and the people did get out and vote. I think they had a very large turnout. There was a feeling in the municipality against it and it showed itself.

The Chairman: As a result of what you were saying, do you think that when the newspapers begin publishing, hopefully some day soon, that they will have lost a great deal of advertising ground and there will be advertisers, traditionally newspaper advertisers, who will now remain in radio?

Mr. Hughes: No. I think there will be some advertisers who will remain in broadcasting to a larger extent than they were, but I am sure the department stores will certainly revert.

The Chairman: I was going to ask you specifically about department stores. Are they using radio in a big way?

Mr. Hughes: No. They have been extending over the last five to ten years into radio very gradually. I can remember a few years ago when the T. Eaton Company did not do any radio advertising and now they are substantial radio advertisers. The biggest breakthrough in radio in the last three years has been Simpsons-Sears who formerly used no radio whatsoever. I believe this year they will spend between $60,000 and $80,000 with our particular station, and this is an important breakthrough. I don't think that radio, being very honest, can take the place of the newspaper in department store advertising. We can complement it, we can be a last minute reminder, but when the lady gets the 99-cents-day sale page she runs her fingers down and this is really shopping by press and I think this will continue.

I think that if the history of the United States is borne out during the newspaper strikes there, I feel that the readership of newspapers and the circulation of the Vancouver Sun and Province will suffer. I think that young adults, young marrieds in the suburbs and urban areas just living outside the downtown core where you cannot pick up a newspaper on the street, I think a lot of these people will not return to purchasing a newspaper every day. I have heard a number of comments along this line. They will still probably take the weekend paper to get the television listings, but I think the newspapers will have to be very energetic to get their circulation back in the suburbs.

Senator McElman: Mr. Hughes, you mentioned a few moments ago that when you began in broadcasting about 40 per cent of the Vancouverites were listening to U.S. stations?

Mr. Hughes: Yes.

Senator McElman: Comparing it today and leaving out your newscasts and your talk programs, Jack Webster, and so on, how do you differ from the American stations?

Mr. Hughes: I think, Senator, we have taken many of the ingredients of the American broadcaster and we have Canadianized them and presented the American expertise and their production and records and what-have-you with a Canadian flavour. It is done by Canadians for Canadians and they appreciate it.

Senator McElman: Could you give us examples of this Canadianization?

Mr. Hughes: Well, all of our people, for instance, the 70 people on our station are all Canadians and our talk of events in Canada and also elsewhere around the world is with a Canadian attitude. I know, I can appreciate that what you are getting at is the music content.

Senator McElman: Broadcasters talk about the sound today.

Mr. Hughes: I think that music is international and I think that the Canadian people now are not as dependent on radio for music as they were a few years ago because we have cassettes, we have records, we have tapes, we have cartridges. We have just about everything. The children can tape their own records off the air and play them to their hearts' content on these small Sony recorders. I don't think they are dependent on the Canadian radio stations for music as they once were.

We have used a lot of American ingredients in our programming, but we have Canadianized them.

There has been talk, I notice, in one of the questions here, about the labour unions. They say: "Radio stations have been the chief agents and purveyors of imported programs. They have brought them in because they are cheap, popular, and readily available." I know of no Canadian station that brings in American programs in any large quantity. We certainly don't air any. We have no syndicated American programs on our radio station and I can't remember when we did have. The only one that comes to mind that a number of stations run is "Art Linkletter with the Kids" and I think it is a terrific show. That is what I call a syndicated American program and we have none. They have all but disappeared. Back when the Senator was in broadcasting ...remember when we used to have Ma Perkins, Guiding Light, and Backstage Sally...

The Chairman: You are dating me! Ma Perkins? I don't remember that at all!

Mr. Hughes: These were American programs that came in on a disc in those days and they have all disappeared.

The Chairman: I wonder if you know, in your experience, of stations which are programmed in the United States, or by people who come here from the United States, or whose music format is established in the United States; indeed sometimes actually the records are selected in the United States. Is there much of this to your knowledge?

Mr. Hughes: I think everybody goes on those kicks every once in a while. I went into the FM operation just three weeks ago. A year ago I had taken a tour and thought I would maybe use an American program service to get it away and off to the races. I didn't. We produced it all right in our own studio because I found out that our men could relate to the Canadian atmosphere far better and we chopped the service completely. We do all our FM programming right in Vancouver.

The Chairman: Is that true of all radio stations in Vancouver?

Mr. Hughes: I would think so. I think the odd one has brought in an expert—that is a man who goes 75 miles from home. When you cross the border you become a real authority. I don't think it has worked. I know some of them have come from Toronto and Montreal and it doesn't work. We don't try to program our Winnipeg station because their community is different than Vancouver and there are features of the Winnipeg life that have to be presented that don't make sense in Vancouver, and vice versa.

I remember the time I went to Winnipeg and at first I didn't understand why everyone had their Christmas tree up on January 6. We had taken ours down on New Year's Day. It is a different market, there is a high Ukrainian population there and the 6th of January is an important day. You have to relate these things. I give you that as an example.

I don't think the American programmer can come in and program in Canada. I think it happens every once in a while, and it goes like the seasons. It is not something that is happening in any wide degree.

The Chairman: Mr. Fortier, do you have supplementary?

Mr. Fortier: Yes. Coming back to the music aspect of your program content. You say the music is international in flavour, and I certainly cannot take issue with that, but you know what the CRTC thinks about internationalism of music, and you are well aware of their proposal of a few months ago about 10 per cent Canadian music content on radio. Would CKNW have trouble meeting the Canadian content?

Mr. Hughes: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: Would you expand?

Mr. Hughes: Yes. I am appearing one week from tomorrow and I am going to oppose it.

The Chairman: I think in all fairness to the witness, in view of the fact he is going to appear there and while we would be delighted to know what he is going to say, if you feel you would rather wait and say it then...

Mr. Hughes: Well, I have informed Mr. Jeanu...

The Chairman: He has some idea?

Mr. Hughes: Yes. I think it is nothing original with me. I think it is a fact.

The Chairman: We would be most interested but I don't think you should feel that you have to say something that you are going to say next week.

Mr. Hughes: Well, it is a good chance to rehearse! The thing that bothers me about the 30 per cent rule is this: many Commissions have gone into radio broadcasting industry over the years, starting with the Aird Commission and up through to the last Fowler Commission, and they have had serious complaints, I think justifiable, of the sameness and repetition of music on radio stations. In other words, they used to say that they are just like a big juke box grinding out recorded music. I think that was a complaint and a valid one.

I think that things have changed a great deal in the last few years in Canadian radio. Program experimentation, especially by many of the metropolitan radio stations, has resulted in a wide variety of programming approaches and attempting to supply Canadians with interesting, entertaining and informative programs. Talk-back programs, news in depth, editorials, commentaries are just a few of the new ingredients put into Canadian radio to take away what I call the juke box sound. In metropolitan markets, specialty type radio stations, satisfying the demands of listeners, have come into being. I am speaking of the top 40, teenage appeal stations, middle of the road concert music stations, classical music stations—each one appealing to a certain segment of the market.

The rule that the CRTC is discussing and considering implementing, I think will require a diverse program development. I think through this forced play music regulation, the Commission is almost encouraging a return to the juke box. The requirement for all stations to draw from what will be a very limited supply of music to obtain 30 per cent of their music selection will force into existence a sameness of sound, a repetition of selections, that I think will start us back to becoming juke boxes.

The thing that bothers me even more is that if people, Canadians, don't hear what they want—remember Canadians from habit are independent and when they want it they want it—they will go to where it is, no matter how far they have to go. If they want to hear the latest music, a full diet, they have cassettes, and they have records, and they have tapes, and most of all they can tune to American stations and go to them, especially in the border areas. Seattle has five 50,000 watt stations beamed right towards Vancouver.

I think there should be, however, an encouragement in the creation of the Canadian music industry, and broadcasters certainly should be involved. But I think that broadcasters should not be saddled with the entire responsibility. I am going to give you just a couple of things that have happened in Vancouver. I want to skip through this.

Tom Jones is coming into Vancouver in about three months and I understand that he will take $80,000 out of Vancouver after that one night performance. Tonight here in the Ottawa Civic Auditorium Led Zeppelin is here and I imagine, if it is any repetition of what happened in Montreal and Vancouver two weeks ago, the place will be jammed—and rightly so, they are good people—but this money is going right out of our country except for a rather minor tax situation.

I think that if the CRTC is proposing a 30 per cent music quota on the broadcasters that if we really want to get into the Canadian music business, if it is that important, then I think other areas should also be involved, such as the people who bring in these artists who take vast sums from the country. How about one in three have to be Canadian and see how that works? Or 30 per cent of Tom Jones' take has to stay in Canada to encourage the Canadian music industry and the recording industry. I think that if all of us work together we will be able to bring the Canadian music industry into being and it will be one that can compete with the United States.

Mr. Fortier: How would you translate this encouragement into any sort of positive action by radio stations in Canada?

Mr. Hughes: Gradually, Mr. Fortier, but I think by putting a percentage on the whole idea it is wrong.

Mr. Fortier: Well, let us say I agree.

Mr. Hughes: Gradually, even without any percentage or any rule, Canadian stations are playing more records.

Mr. Fortier: Do you have figures on that for CKNW?

Mr. Hughes: We have about 7 per cent of our library that is now Canadian compared to what was even lower. It is gradually coming. Remember the vast majority of the music today published in Canada is by teenage orientated groups, rock groups. We are a modern station but we don't play rock and roll music as such. So this would be doubly hard on us. Most of the product is of teenage orientation.

Now the good music stations—I think CKPM is one here and CHQM in Vancouver and CHQR in Calgary are going to have a very difficult time because the number of selections in their segment, such as good music, is just non-existent. They will not be able to make it. What are they going to have to do? What are we going to do? We will have to play more rock and roll music to satisfy the 30 per cent rule and it is going to create a sameness.

Mr. Fortier: Did I read into the 7 per cent of your library also that 7 per cent of playing time on CKNW is devoted to Canadian records?

Mr. Hughes: It fluctuates. For instance, a well known group called The Poppy Family, who I believe are presently on their way to Japan from Vancouver, they had a hit which was making every chart and in that period, although we don't name them number one or number two, that tune got a lot of play. Gradually we are finding more and more Canadian selections are coming into being.

Mr. Fortier: As I am sure you know, there is a very substantial number of French Canadian records being cut in the Province of Quebec. Do you make any use of them on CKNW?

Mr. Hughes: Yes, we do. I am trying to come up with the name of the most recent one... They can go on the English-speaking stations and even though the people don't understand what is being said, they are very enjoyable.

Mr. Fortier: Even in English sometimes you don't understand the words.

Mr. Hughes: I appreciate that. That is true. There are still an increasing number of those coming and I would say of the Canadian music we play, quite a number are by the French artists but they have been done in English.

Mr. Fortier: Do you make a special effort at CKNW to familiarize your listeners with records that are out of Quebec?

Mr. Hughes: And also that they are Canadian. However, I must also say this, that it doesn't matter whether a record is Canadian or not, we take a view that a record must pass a number of criteria. There was a record brought out by a Canadian group but in my estimation, it condoned the use of marijuana and we didn't play it. It was good, it was very listenable, by a Canadian. In our wisdom we felt it was not correct to do this. It is still illegal by our laws in Canada and so for that reason we eliminated the record.

The Chairman: Setting percentages aside, are you in agreement with the basic objective of the CRTC in the area of Canadian content?

Mr. Hughes: I think the CRTC is correct, but in this I don't think radio needs encouragement because we are so Canadian now. I think the CRTC should examine a radio station as a whole service, not just music, because our news is completely Canadian, all our people are Canadian, and the talent we create in our open line broadcasting and news commentators and business reporters and sports commentators, these are Canadian talent.

Mr. Fortier: What percentage of your listening time on any given day is devoted to music?

Mr. Hughes: We play relatively none between eight in the morning and noon. We play an increasing, fairly large amount of music from noon until six o'clock. We play no music from 6 p.m. until 9 p.m. and then we play music from 9 p.m. until midnight. In the area from nine until midnight we have a chap who has been in the broadcasting business many years and made a hobby of collecting old records and it has been a very lucrative tive one for him. What we do at night is play a lot of the old radio programs of yesteryear that Senator Davey doesn't remember. I commend him to listen the next time he is out with us because he will hear Dr. Kildare and others. I think all this is a change of pace in radio.

The Chairman: You mean half hour programs?

Mr. Hughes: Yes.

Senator McElman: Have you got The Shadow mixed in there?

Mr. Hughes: The Shadow, The Green Hornet—I don't want to date anyone here!

Senator Smith: Go back to the crystal days and it will date the rest of us!

Mr. Hughes: If there is an insistence on the 50 per cent Canadian music we will have to make those out.

Mr. Fortier: Let us follow through on the question which the chairman put to you. Forgetting about the percentages, and I take it at its face value that yours is not an entirely music station, you will have to agree with me that there are radio stations in Canada which are devoted nearly entirely to music. Should the CRTC proposals apply to those stations? We will forget CKNW for the time being.

Mr. Hughes: Let us take the segments. The radio stations that play the most music fall into two categories. One—the hit teenage orientated stations—the top 40. Those stations, I feel, will have the easiest time getting a line for the 30 per cent, because most of the music produced, the majority produced in Canada on records today falls into that area. Also, because of the very people they are appealing to, they are able to repeat their selections so much more often and therefore they will get the quota. The stations that will have the most difficult time—they fall into a different category but they are all music—are the stations that have gradually emerged to play adult music, the slower selections, the candlelight and wine...

The Chairman: Mr. Fortier's music!

Mr. Hughes: They won't be able to comply at all.

The Chairman: Let us take it one at a time. Let's talk about the top 40 stations. Why will they have a more difficult time?

Mr. Hughes: They will have an easier time.

The Chairman: It will be more difficult than it is now.

Mr. Hughes: Oh, yes.

The Chairman: Why?

Mr. Hughes: I am speaking strictly on hearsay at the moment.

The Chairman: It is perhaps unfair.

Mr. Hughes: I am not a rock and roll station. You know the Maple Leaf System music group has been formed and I believe with CHUM and stations that play music like that. Maybe it would be a question to ask Mr. Waters, but I have heard that even with the tremendous encouragement, that they have a great deal of difficulty in selecting even one or two records in a month's time that are produced here in Canada which they feel will be accepted by their audiences as really good listening. I would rather not be tied down any tighter than that because they are in a better position to answer that question.

The Chairman: They are coming on Thursday and we can talk to them. What about the stations which play "elevator" music, if that is a fair phrase for them? Why are they going to have a more difficult time?

Mr. Hughes: For instance, very little of that music is produced in Canada. I believe the only area they can go to is the Canadian Talent Library.

The Chairman: But the point I am trying to make, Mr. Hughes, is that surely, that means the Canadian musicians are going to have to start to make that kind of music to play on Canadian stations; and that is in the interest of the Canadian music industry.

Mr. Hughes: But not necessarily of the public.

The Chairman: Why not of the public?

Mr. Hughes: There are some great problems involved in this. The CAB, I think, has been before this Committee and they are making a presentation to the CRTC in detail. I have it here with me and it involves copyright, it involves mechanical reproduction of music, it involves many, many things. To make a record successful you have to have volume of purchase. In Canada with 20 million people, there is just no way that there will be enough records purchased by the general public, even as a best seller, a great hit or anything you want, that will make it possible to sell enough records to make any profit or even pay for the production.

Mr. Fortier: It happened in Quebec with French records. They were faced with the dilemma and they agreed to face up to it and were successful with a much more restricted market. There is such a thing as the top 40 in French Canada, such a thing as a different sound, the ones you have described.

Mr. Hughes: I accept that, Mr. Fortier, but I happen to be living in my part of Canada. I am living across from 200 million English-speaking Americans and their music. They are singing in the music I know and in the language I know. It has a much deeper impact. French Canadians in Quebec probably were fortunate because they did have a locked-in audience that did not have access to Tom Jones and Humperdinck and the other fellows on the American stations.

Senator McElman: Are you not getting to the heart of the problem right now in the American sound?

Mr. Hughes: Humperdinck is not American and neither is Tom Jones.

Senator Smith: It is where they make the big money.

Senator McElman: It is the American sound we are dealing with. This morning we had Telemedia as a witness and we were told that not too long ago the recordings played largely by broadcasters in Quebec came from France. They were in French, but they were not the Canadian sound. They were not the French Canadian sound. They decided to do something about it, and they started their recording industry. I think it is markedly successful and they are meeting the demands of the people of Quebec for Canadian music and developing their culture. Is there any reason why the same sort of thing would not apply?

Mr. Hughes: I think that over the last five to eight years there has been some increase in English Canada—on our part at least. We ourselves invested half a million dollars in new studios and recording equipment last year, and we are now doing more and more recording of musical groups, even to our own commercials and selections. I think it will grow. Yes, I do.

Senator McElman: Let's take the 7 per cent of your current library. Five years ago what percentage was the Canadian content of that library?

Mr. Hughes: Nil. It is growing.

Senator McElman: Over a five year period 7 per cent?

Mr. Hughes: Yes. I think that it fluctuates because music has changed so much too. For instance, we have no music in our library that was produced before 1960. The Glen Miller music and the Tommy Dorsey music, that has gone. People don't want it any more. They don't listen to it.

Senator McElman: Taking into account the cost of production, of sources that might be available to you to get Canadian recordings, relating it to the cost of buying American tapes and plates, and looking ahead ten years, if there were not the CRTC proposals that now face you, what would you say the 7 per cent would have grown to, say, in ten years time?

The Chairman: That is a very hypothetical question.

Mr. Hughes: It is very difficult to answer because I think there are other sources of encouraging the promotion of Canadian music. It is not just by pinning it on the broadcasters. I think other people have to be involved in this. I think the Canadian Government has to be involved in it because the Canadian Government is encouraging, and not very successfully, the start of a motion picture industry. From reading in the Toronto Star a write-up on the new film, it is not very complimentary.

The Chairman: We should say in fairness to that film that the identical coverage in the Toronto Telegram was very favourable.

Mr. Hughes: There you are. Those are two people. I am saying that broadcasters need assistance from other areas, including the Government, to encourage this because it could be helped. The thing that bothers me, in our station, I would not like to see us have to take anything away from our progress in developing a news and communications station, to have to hire extra people to just sit and decide whether a record was made in Canada and the number; and have to find out whether the fellow who sang the lead was born in Canada but does he now hold a British passport; and where he lives now? We are going to be involved in a tremendous paper war and we are going to have to be phoning and saying "Hey, take off the next selection. We are one short. Put on a Canadian." That is just creating routine jobs for people. I don't think it is the way to encourage an industry to flourish. I think it should be played if it is good; it should be played if it is worthwhile, but just to have to play it and have people monitoring and writin things down—that is not programming broadcasting stations.

Senator McElman: You asked, Mr. Hughes, why should the broadcast industry be singled out. Would you not agree that the broadcast industry in Canada has been given a rather extensive preferential treatment in licensing? Before any application in a market area can be licensed, the economic viability of the existing broadcasters in the area has to be taken into consideration. They do not issue licences if they are going to, knowledgeably in advance, knock out existing broadcasters. The Canadian law also protects the broadcasters of Canada from substantial take-over by foreigners, particularly Americans.

Now in this gifted situation that broadcasters have, is it so unreasonable, is it unreasonable to say why are you singled out to contribute to Canadian identity, Canadian culture, the Canadian unity—whatever title you may wish to use?

Mr. Hughes: Senator McElman, I also wish to point out that the Canadian radio industry is double taxed. We have some privileges but we are double taxed.

Senator Smith: What do you mean by that?

Mr. Hughes: We have a substantial transmitter tax to pay on top of all our other taxes. We pay a percentage of our gross as transmitter tax. We have an investment in here and we have to meet strong competition. Every market is absolutely served in every area by radio and we have newspaper and we have television stations and we now have cablevision. I don't think that a radio station gets any particularly free ride. He has to compete in the marketplace with a population, for instance, that does not advertise, in comparison to the United States for instance. The advertiser in Canada does not spend as much money as the American advertiser does. We have a number of rules across the country and in British Columbia we have no beer or wine advertising at all, and we have a station across the border in Bellingham that takes $3 million a year out of the market. How about those imbalances?

The Chairman: I think your points are well taken but surely so are those of Senator McElman. If Western Broadcasting Limited decided to divest itself of CKNW in Vancouver, you know very well there would be a great long lineup of applicants wanting to get the franchise. It is very prosperous, lucrative, good business to be in. You have been in it all your life.

Mr. Hughes: Senator Davey, I respect your comments but I disagree violently; because you have a station in Winnipeg that just went bankrupt; and you have another one that appeared at the last hearing from Sydney, Nova Scotia, that is in dire straits; and a number of others around the country. We have stations in our own market that have changed hands and have lost substantial sums of money. I think that we at CKNW have worked very hard, as other broadcasters have, and built our station into a good field of endeavour, but I think there are other broadcasters who have not. They have had the same chance as we. Maybe their result is not as good as ours.

The Chairman: I don't think I disagree with you at all but I don't think it is inconsistent to not disagree with Senator McElman as well. Surely you have a privileged position in the media spectrum. For instance, there are only so many radio stations in Vancouver. It is only technically possible to put so many radio stations in Vancouver.

Mr. Hughes: That is true; except, for instance, we have seven AM and we now have four FM. That is in the last few years and our population has not increased that much. We also have four television stations taking money from the area.

Mr. Fortier: Your privilege has been watered down?

Mr. Hughes: Very, very much so.

Mr. Griffiths: I was going to ask Mr. Hughes if he would like to comment for a moment on the possible effect of unsatisfactory grade Canadian music causing a possible reversion.

The Chairman: We would be most interested in the comments on that.

Mr. Hughes: I think I really covered the fact that if the quality of the Canadian music on the radio stations is not up to what you are presenting for the 70 per cent—we are talking 70-30—if the 70 percent is so superior.

to what you are presenting in the other 30 per cent, which has to be Canadian, we are very concerned with the comparison and what does it sound like? All of a sudden we come on and say "Here it is." It is going to have to be built over a period of years. I think the danger is in the magic figure of 30, or 20, or 5.

I think the Canadian record industry should be encouraged and gradually come into being and if the records become competitive the stations will play them. We want to play the Canadian music if they compete with what else is in the marketplace.

Senator McElman: Mr. Hughes, you say that you must build over a period of years. How much has it built? Is this not the point?

Mr. Hughes: It is building, it has built. I think the Canadian Talent Library has contributed and is building. It has only been going I think for years.

The Chairman: Would you agree with this? Suppose, following the discussions with the CRTC which are now taking place, suppose the CRTC said "O.K., we will take a rain check on this thing and take another look a year from now." Would you not think that the CRTC, whatever happens, has provided a great stimulus to the Canadian music industry by its initiative?

Mr. Hughes: Not necessarily to the Canadian music industry. I think it has created a stimulus for us broadcasters.

The Chairman: That is what I meant. Do you think they have?

Mr. Hughes: I think a lot of us are really seriously looking at the problem and I know I am very conscious of the Canadian records now, but I don't want to see or hear the general sound of radio that we have created from the jungle of the juke box a few years ago; I would not like to see all the stations having to concentrate on producing a certain number of records and we all have to play them to meet a certain figure. That is what scares me. We have this difference in sound in the radio stations of Canada today and through this, we can give a variety of selection, I think the Canadian people are going to be quite unhappy with the sameness of sound and repetition which I think is forthcoming if a certain percentage rule is put on the broadcasters.

Mr. Fortier: Again leaving the percentage aside and carrying on with the statement of a few minutes ago, that you wished you could play more Canadian music if it were of the calibre or quality which would compare with what you are playing today. Surely you must have made some listener surveys in Vancouver. Tell me, Mr. Hughes, do your listeners wish to hear more Canadian music?

Mr. Hughes: We never hear that. We really don't get the demand.

Mr. Fortier: You never made a study oriented to that?

Mr. Hughes: No. I will tell you they demand a lot of other things but, as I say, in our type of operation music is not the end-all for us.

The Chairman: I am going to interrupt you at that point to day that I think we have spent a good deal longer than we should have on the whole question of music content, given the fact and the point that you have made that yours is not a music station, at least primarily a music station. I think we have prevailed on you at great length. I will suggest that we turn to discuss other matters. I don't want to be rude to Mr. Fortier or anyone else, but I think that you have been gracious in allowing us to chew the matter at such length. I think we might now turn back to other matters, if that would suit the convenience of the senators.

Mr. Fortier: He said he wanted a rehearsal and he has had it!

Senator McElman: Could I ask one question in that area?

The Chairman: Yes.

Senator McElman: Looking back, if you can for a moment, to the situation in Quebec where there was an incentive to do something with respect to talent, performers, music; and it happened. They made it happen. Would you believe that in music, as brought to us by the broadcasters, which is a large part of the fare that Canadians get in music today, would you believe in music that we are already so Americanized that lack of demand for Canadian music you speak of has not even come to your attention? Are we already so Americanized?

Mr. Hughes: I don't quite....

Senator McElman: Without regulation.

Mr. Hughes: I don't quite understand what is Canadian music?

Senator McElman: Some people are trying to find that out now.

Mr. Hughes: Oh, I know. Isn't it true that the Canadian performers move right through to the Ed Sullivan program and it comes back. It is really North American music. The Beatles brought the new music of the 1960s and 1970s to the United States from Liverpool, but the American base music is western. Do you know what the base music is of Canada? It is country and western. So Canadian music is country and western, and so is it in the United States, in the heartland of the United States. That is Canadian music too. Red River Valley and Lake Louise—all that, that is Canadian music. It is also international. It is North American music.

Senator McElman: Then culturally we are absorbed music-wise?

Mr. Hughes: It is, I think, international. I think you go to hear the composer Mozart and that is not Canadian music but it is world music. It is international.

The Chairman: Do you want to follow that up?

Senator McElman: No.

The Chairman: I would like to turn the discussion for a few minutes—we don't want to keep you here all evening—but you made a reference in your opening comment that your station is not a "rip and read organization." I wrote down the words as you used them. I think I know what you mean by that, but you might explain what you mean by "a rip and read organization."

Mr. Barker: I think the general connotation of "rip and read" in radio is the station—we all subscribe to the broadcast news wire service, at least almost all stations do, which is a radio version of the Canadian Press. Mr. Hughes' reference to a "rip and read station" is a station, I believe, where someone comes out two or three minutes before the scheduled newscast time and looks at the wire service which handily prepares a five minute summary of nine or ten articles of news, rips it off and rushes back into the control room and reads them.

The Chairman: The question I wanted to put to you, Mr. Hughes, is: Are there any more of that anywhere in Canada? Are there any in Canada now?

Mr. Hughes: I think gradually over the years that the standard of radio news coverage is increasing, yes. We have a very substantial newsroom organization which is dependent maybe on the Canadian wire service for quite a large percentage of, say, non-British Columbia news; but we have developed stringers and we have correspondents in Victoria and...

The Chairman: As I tried to point out this morning to the Telemedia people, and as I would now point out to you, this particular committee—the last thing in the world we want the people from the Western Broadcasting Limited to feel, or the radio stations to feel, is that we are particularly interested in how your news department operates. We are more interested in the general media spectrum. And so one of the reasons we wanted you people to come before the committee is your reputation as responsible broadcasters. The question I put to you more directly is: Are the high standards at your station, are these the standards in the industry across Canada, or are they the standard in the big urban centres across Canada? In other words, are there any "rip and read stations" left in this country? Perhaps you don't know.

Mr. Hughes: I would think there are in smaller markets and I don't think you can unduly criticize the operators because there are some very marginal operations in Canada. Looking at the Dominion Bureau of Statistics I think you can say that your money is better put in the bank where you can make more interest on your investment. They are faced with great problems because they have to be everybody to everyone in a small community. I think there still would be a number who are, to quite a degree, dependent on the teletype for their news.

The Chairman: Your observation confirms the judgment that has been returning to me throughout the hearings. That is in the question of media service across the country. It is the question of the rich getting richer and the poor getting poorer. I don't mean the publishers and broadcasters, but in terms of service. In this country if you live in Vancouver and Toronto you are well served, but if you live in a small community 150 miles from one of the big cities, you have the kind of service you have been describing.

Mr. Hughes: I would like to comment on that, Senator Davey. I would like to congratulate the Standard Broadcasting people and anything further you could ask them when they appear before you. They have, with our assistance, pioneered the Standard Radio

News Network across the country and we are now finished negotiating with them. We are going to extend the Standard Radio News Network with Western Broadcasting Limited augmentation from the Vancouver market to anybody in the Province of British Columbia. All they have to do is pay the line charges. We will give them service. Standard has said "It is your service once it enters the Province of British Columbia." We are planning to add to it and say "Fellows, here it is. You can have a metropolitan service in your market. All you have to do is pay the line charges."

The Chairman: That is first rate. When is that going to start?

Mr. Hughes: It was just okayed on the first of March. We are busy negotiating with them.

The Chairman: Are the smaller broadcasters grabbing at the opportunity?

Mr. Hughes: They are interested. We have run into a problem that we are attempting to overcome with the CN CP Broadband service. That is a very important part of it. We could dial them up and automatically from Vancouver or Toronto excite their recording machines and give them their voice report right from Miss Emprigham here in Ottawa. She can excite our machines!

The Chairman: She can excite some of the Senators!

Mr. Hughes: She can put her announcements or reports of this very hearing right to Vancouver and it will go to the interior of British Columbia. This is really in the pioneering stage and made possible by broadcasters in the metropolitan centres who first banded together in Ottawa, Montreal, Toronto, Winnipeg, Calgary and Vancouver. That started the ball rolling.

The Chairman: I know that at the CAB convention this past weekend a survey was taken of 400 of the radio and television executives, some kind of internal poll was conducted. I saw some of the results in the Saturday April 13th edition of the Toronto Star as recorded by the Ottawa Bureau of the Star. It said that the broadcasters expressed the opinion that:

"Education intelligence levels and pay scales of news gatherers are insufficient to permit them to understand and report on current social issues?"

Would you comment on that, Mr. Hughes? Is that a correct interpretation?

Mr. Hughes: I read that and I heard a broadcast the other night from Montreal where Douglas Fisher was on with Raymond Crépault, the Past President of the CAB. Mr. Fisher said that the news broadcasters he knew made $60 a week. Now there is just no way they make $60 a week. I thought it was a very unfair statement. They are well paid in our organization and they are experienced men; and the senior men are in charge of the shifts. I think that the broadcasting industry is gradually, and in its growth with the interconnections, are enmassing a number of good people in the broadcasting business. I hark back to the days in Ottawa and the tremendous development in radio and television of news bureaux here as just one example.

Senator McElman: On the matter of the news presentation, with the new development you have coming up, is there any innovative thought going on now in the broadcasting area? Since yours is a headline type of reporting area? Since yours is a headline type of reporting in broadcasting, rather than in-depth, is there any new thought on the presentation of news? We have been told repeatedly that good news is no news. Is that to be the bad news type of presentation? Or is there some change to take place, or taking place, in news presentation in Canada with broadcasters?

Mr. Hughes: That is a very difficult one to answer. Warren, would you comment on that?

Mr. Barker: I would suggest that if you analyze not a single isolated newscast, but the various stories carried by the metropolitan station over a week, or two or three days, or three days selected at random throughout a month, you would find that the death, fire and flood type of news story has—not disappeared but has taken a far less important role than I think a lot of people still ascribe to it in the public mind.

If a newscast is led by a report of a Parliamentary Committee, how do you call that Good news or bad news? I think that radio in the metropolitan areas is headlining or leading with this parliamentary news, space news. The disaster type of spot news, I think, has long since been downgraded as to its relevant position in newscasts. I don't mean we ignore it, but I think that metropolitan radio today generally—I know I would certainly much rather have a crackling good story out of the legislature any day than a spot news story. Does this answer the question?

tion? We are not looking for news of personal tragedy.

Senator McElman: Perhaps I could put it another way that you could get more directly at it. You hear increasingly from the older generation "I don't listen to the news any more. It disturbs me, it upsets me, it bothers me." You hear from the younger generation "I don't listen to the news. It is not relevant now."

I am not a broadcaster or not a newsman. Can you tell me what this means?

Mr. Barker: It means, as far as the younger generation goes, it is not going enough into the universities and fields like that. We are trying to increase our coverage in that direction. The response of the older people, I think, is something that is unavoidable. I think it is a backhanded compliment to the media that the media is becoming perhaps more representative of the disturbed society and the conflict and the problems in our society. I would take the criticism from the older people in that way, as perhaps being an indication that we are coming to grips with what are the current trends, current problems in our society.

I will be the first to say that the news media, I believe in general, are having a problem—not just the broadcasting media—in getting to the younger generation.

Senator McElman: Let's get it to all generations over a long period of time. This applies to all of the media, some to a lesser degree. We have got a daily box score on how many Americans and how many South Vietnamese and how many North Vietnamese were killed yesterday, or this morning. Is this assisting society?

Mr. Barker: I haven't heard that type of news story in a month, maybe six months, in Vancouver.

Senator McElman: Then there is some change taking place? That is what I am trying to get at. There is some change taking place, I would assume, because that was the case for a long time.

Mr. Barker: This may have been in the early days of the war. I cannot recall hearing radio newscast in Vancouver area for the last six months that has paid any attention to any particular battle or loss of life in Vietnam. Perhaps the only story out of there—and I think it has been covered—is the investigation of the alleged atrocities.

Senator McElman: Is this then because of the play-down in the United States Government that they have changed their tactics and they are not giving the numbers as they did before, or is it a change of attitude or procedure in reporting the news?

Mr. Barker: I think basically it is a change in the Canadian newsrooms and that the news editors are throwing out their reports of how many troops have been killed in battle. I think that is what is happening. In my own case we have concluded it is not significant, so it is going in the wastebasket.

Senator McElman: Let us bring it to the local level of broadcasting. When you turn on the radio in the morning the first item usually is that three people were killed on the freeway this morning, they ran head-on into a truck and three people were wiped out. That is still so often the lead item. Why?

Mr. Barker: I would disagree that it is so often the lead item. In my own case it is the lead item if it has been a very quiet day. That may seem jocular but that is not intended to be.

Mr. Hughes: If there are three people killed on the freeway and the names are available and it has happened it is important.

Senator McElman: The most important?

Mr. Hughes: I think it is important. If it happens to be a relation of yours or a friend, it is the most important thing that happened that day or for a number of days for you.

Senator McElman: Let me take an example in the last 24 hours. The names were not available initially and it was the first item.

Mr. Hughes: In our station if the names are not available... let us say right now it is 5.30 in Vancouver and the names are not available. This accident is a very serious one and is holding up traffic on the freeway. It will be the point of a special news bulletin from our airplane or traffic control that there is a very serious accident there. It might not be on the 6 p.m. news. If the names are not available it is not a story. You could have every housewife in the lower mainland beside herself. "My husband is not home with our two children and we just heard there is an accident on the freeway." We are very careful. It doesn't become a story until there are names of people applied to it. If it occurs we would say "Try and do something about not going near 401 at Willingdon tonight. It is completely blocked off." This is providing a different service, a service to those involved to stay away from that area.

Senator McElman: In your brief in a number of places you refer to your involvement in the community life, that is involvement of your total group, your staff or group. I think at one point you used the terminology that you are totally immersed in the community life. With such immersion, with such direct contact with the community, what proportion of your news in general terms would bear to things that could be called—let us not call it good news as opposed to bad—but positive news.

Mr. Hughes: Well, give me an example of your consideration of a positive news item.

Senator McElman: You are living in the community of Vancouver, I am not. You are involved, I am not.

Mr. Hughes: All right. Let me give you an example. Our commentator Jack Webster pioneered and championed the elimination of a parking lot for a yacht club in the Vancouver harbour on one of the beaches. It was going through and he championed it and the mayor flew back from Hawaii over the fuss that was raised and it has now been stopped. If you were a member of the yacht club that was not positive news, but if you were a member of the general public who goes to the beach it was. It depends what position you are in whether it is positive or negative. These are things we get involved in.

Senator Kinnear: I wonder what percentage is international news? I find that international news is taking up a great deal of the broadcasts.

Mr. Hughes: No.

Senator Kinnear: You don't use it?

Mr. Hughes: No. I am sorry, Senator Kinnear, I don't want to make you think we don't cover international news, but we don't set ourselves up as an international news station. I imagine it is quite heavy today on picking up actualities from Houston, but normally if everything is going well in space we report that. We are heavily involved in British Columbia, and to some extent becoming nationally involved with our bureau here in Ottawa, and the contacts we have in each major city as we grow.

Senator Kinnear: With regard to your other comment, I suppose you would be giving more news on Cambodia rather than Vietnam?

Mr. Barker: Definitely.

Senator McElman: Looking for an example of positive or good news and taking the approach of the now non-producing newspapers, if Mr. Bennett were defeated that would be good news?

Mr. Hughes: No comment!

The Chairman: I think that Mr. Fortier had a supplementary question at this point.

Mr. Hughes: If I may say, Senator McElman, you made an interesting point and there is something to always remember. When people say they don't listen to the radio, don't believe them, because they do.

Senator McElman: I said they don't listen to the news.

Mr. Hughes: When they tell you that don't believe them. I have so many people phoned into me, principally on Jack Webster. They will phone in and say "I never listen to the Scotsman." I say "I am very sorry but it is tremendous we have freedom of choice." They say "Listen, I never listen to him, but this morning... or last night..." They say "I never listen to him." Don't believe them when they say they never listen to radio because they do.

Mr. Fortier: What do you do to attract people who don't listen to radio?

Mr. Hughes: Last year we spent $90,000 on exterior advertising to invite people to listen to radio. Let me expand on that a minute. One of the real problems in coming up with the measurement of the audience of radio is the fact that the invention of the transistor has enabled radio to become completely portable. A radio goes wherever you go. The audience, although it is on the move, becomes very difficult to measure. I have always felt this and I know that Senator Davey agrees with this because he had the same problem for many years. It is very difficult to take that now immense audience in cars, that are moving with transistors, that is on the beach that is going wherever they go with radio and get a measurement on this. I think the radio over the years has always been underplayed. The vast audience is bigger than that reported because of the vast moving audience that can't be measured.

Mr. Fortier: Given this premise that it is difficult to exactly assess the number of listeners, are you concerned that there is still an inordinately high number of people who "don't turn you on?"

Mr. Hughes: They say "I never turn you on" but when I go to meetings—I have been on the air every day doing a program and everybody knows me and yet they tell me they don't listen. They say they never listen to the radio any more. If they don't, how do they know me? It is the only thing I have ever done. A lot of people come out and say "I don't listen" but they do. They do. They say they don't look at television but I am sure they do. I bet tonight they will be watching the hockey game.

Mr. Fortier: Do you listen to TV yourself?

Mr. Hughes: Yes, I do. I am very interested in it and I enjoy it.

Mr. Fortier: What is your relationship with the television stations which are in the Western group?

Mr. Hughes: None. None whatsoever. We are very competitive.

Mr. Fortier: Do they ever complain about your seemingly unfair competition? I am looking at the Refocus report.

Mr. Hughes: It is very unfair. No.

Mr. Fortier: Which is directed very much against the television Vancouver market and poor old CKNW. I read it with much interest and I must say I could hardly wait to ask you questions on it. Did you get criticism from some members of your Board or CHAN?

Mr. Hughes: We had it out before I presented it to the Board. I didn't expect any criticism. I never have. I happen to be in broadcasting and in the radio section. And we uncovered this and we have taken it to the advertisers. Now Channel 8, that is their problem—they have to fight this one.

Mr. Fortier: It is radio eat television and vice versa?

Mr. Hughes: Yes. We are in the marketplace and this is a very strong weapon for us, the dilution of the Vancouver television market.

Mr. Fortier: We have heard from the radio broadcaster, Mr. Griffiths. How do you feel as one of the principals of Western Broadcasting about the attack on their television holdings by CKNW?

Mr. Griffiths: Well, Mr. Fortier, there is just not any question about it. If we ever joined areas of the broadcasting media together, one or the other would die. This is a very basic fact. I think one of the basic reasons for the success—and I do say that CKNW is successful—is it enjoys a fantastically high level of competition from the daily newspapers. So we have learned to compete to the bitter, bitter end for everything. Never do you see reference to CKNW in the daily press as such. You may see reference to a suburban radio station, for example.

The Chairman: They don't carry your call letters?

Mr. Griffiths: No.

The Chairman: Ever?

Mr. Griffiths: Not unless we have a fire.

The Chairman: Do they carry the radio listings?

Mr. Griffiths: No.

The Chairman: They never mention your call letters?

Mr. Griffiths: No.

The Chairman: Do they mention the call letters of their Vancouver radio stations?

Mr. Griffiths: Yes.

The Chairman: Why do they single you out not to mention your call letters?

Mr. Griffiths: Because we are intense competitors.

The Chairman: Do they mention everybody else?

Mr. Griffiths: Primarily CKWX.

The Chairman: CKLG, would they mention them?

Mr. Griffiths: Not really. The Vancouver Sun, to be fair, has had, I believe, a policy in the last few years of no mention whatsoever of radio stations. However, we have competed with them very strongly in gathering news. So much so that we are must listening in all their editorial rooms.

The Chairman: Do they mention CHAN television?

Mr. Griffiths: Only when the president makes a contentious statement.

The Chairman: Do they carry CHAN listings?

Mr. Griffiths: Yes.

The Chairman: Surely CHAN must be as great competition for them, as great as CKNW?

Mr. Griffiths: I think the television listings probably without any close competition is the most widely read section of the newspaper, so it is to their advantage to carry TV listings.

Mr. Fortier: One of your investments, of course, is a 55.1 per cent shareholding in Canastel. Canastel still remains a bit of a mystery to some of us here. Who are your fellow shareholders?

Mr. Griffiths: That is very simple. Canastel was owned by Associated Television in England and amongst other things it owned 25 per cent of the television station in Halifax. That, of course, makes them ineligible for a licence and so as part of a retirement from Canadian broadcasting, Associated Television in England sold their Canadian holding company, Canastel, to a combination of two people, Western and Selkirk. Western bought 55 per cent and Selkirk bought 45 per cent; so through that holding we have the joint investment in Halifax.

Mr. Fortier: You gave Selkirk an equal voice on the board?

Mr. Griffiths: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: Why is that?

Mr. Griffiths: A matter of negotiating.

Mr. Fortier: That is very magnanimous on your part, I would say. Did they have an offer to purchase an equal number of shares?

Mr. Griffiths: No.

Mr. Fortier: Do you leave the management of CJCH in Halifax to the local people?

Mr. Griffiths: Totally. We have no mandatory right to representation on the Board in Halifax but as a matter of good business the other shareholders invite us to have a representative and the representative that Western and Selkirk chose is our television president, Mr. Peters, so he is a director.

Mr. Fortier: Do you have any plans at the moment to further extend you holdings in eastern Canada?

Mr. Griffiths: No.

Mr. Fortier: Do you have plans to further extend your holdings in western Canada?

Mr. Griffiths: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: Within cable, radio or television fields?

Mr. Griffiths: Yes, all three.

Mr. Hughes: Senator, I think to make the record straight, I meant to bring this up at first, I refer you to paragraph 4 on page 1 of the brief. I wish to go on record at this time on behalf of Mr. Griffiths that the purchase of Bentley was approved on the 31st day of March and the closing of our purchase of Bentley took place yesterday afternoon.

Mr. Fortier: Express Cable, you are still awaiting approval on that one?

Mr. Griffiths: Yes.

The Chairman: What does it mean on page 15, section 43:

"The revenues of the radio and television stations are principally derived from the sale of advertising time to local and national advertisers."

I put a query by the word "principally". Are there other ways you derive revenue?

Mr. Hughes: Well, in television, of course, there are substantial revenues derived from producing programs and in radio increasingly so. We in Vancouver now have eight track recording machines and very sophisticated boards, and we are now doing eight track. It is a terminology. You can take an orchestra, a band, and when they can come to your studio you record them and then you can bring in the singer when she is over her cold, or the group, and put them together on the track and let her hear the mix. Then the new technique comes along. We will ask her to do the selection in a key higher. Then you have another track and then you bring in the announcer and put him in. Each track remains alone by itself. Then we start what we call the mix on track five, six, and finally end up with the final product on seven. We have still got eight free in case someone comes in and says "Wait, I don't like that mix. I would like to hear another mix of a higher music level and bring that singer down and make the announcer have a different tone." We can change his tone electronically. This is what we are involved in now. Gradually it is increasing and there is some revenue from this as we make commercials for stations all over western Canada.

The Chairman: Would you do it for national advertising agencies?

Mr. Hughes: Yes, we would.

The Chairman: Are you concerned, Mr. Hughes, about the on-coming trend towards Americanization of the Canadian advertising industry?

Mr. Hughes: No, I am not; because when I first started in the selling part of radio in 1952 we would come to the east for eight weeks and we would spend three weeks in Toronto, two weeks in Montreal, and the rest of the time in New York. I haven't been to New York now for five or six years. Our sales people don't go into New York now at all, so our connection with New York and Chicago, and Los Angeles as an area for getting advertising revenue is just nil. I can't remember the figures, but we don't even go down now.

The Chairman: Why is that?

Mr. Hughes: All the business is done in Toronto.

The Chairman: Because the American agencies are taking over the advertising agencies in Toronto?

Mr. Hughes: Senator, with respect, I feel a lot of the Canadian agencies have developed and they now are handling the accounts in Canada.

The Chairman: We have the ICA coming here on Thursday and we will be talking to them. I was anxious to find if you are concerned about it and you are not. Thank you.

Senator McElman: On the matter of revenues on page 27, section 92, there is reference to refusal to kill. Some items on occasion have cost the station considerable revenue. Would you give us any examples?

Mr. Hughes: I will give you an example, no names, no pack drill. We had a situation where an advertiser of ours was charged with the misdemeanour of having someone in his organization turn a speedometer back. A charge was laid by the RCMP and we reported it as such. We had considerable difficulty with the client who felt we should not have reported it until it had been heard in court and decided that way. I disputed this with him. We had reported it as fairly as we possibly could but he was going to cancel all his advertising. I said "That really is secondary as far as we are concerned." We would treat ourselves the same way. We were fined last year $500. It was a situation where I took every precaution possible but one of our commentators made a comment regarding a by-election in Vancouver which was within the 24-hour period. I had a notice stuck up right in front of him and I had a man speak to him the night before, but he forgot and made a one sentence comment. We paid the $500. We went to court and I pleaded not guilty because it certainly was not intentional. We certainly reported it.

Senator McElman: He is still with you, is he?

Mr. Hughes: No.

Senator McElman: I will not ask for other examples. Would this sort of thing happen very often, the quotation I have given you?

Mr. Hughes: No.

Senator McElman: It is then a very much diminishing thing from what it has been suggested it once was?

Mr. Hughes: I would like to be very fair to the advertisers. The number of advertisers who have ever phoned me and asked for special consideration of any kind is on one hand.

Senator McElman: Negligible?

Mr. Hughes: Yes, negligible. I feel we have never experienced any pressure from advertisers, "You do this or else." If they don't like it they usually don't buy.

Senator McElman: With your BBM rating, you don't have to be concerned about that sort of thing.

Mr. Hughes: It certainly helps to have it like that.

Mr. Fortier: Your broadcaster infringing the Election act, of course, is a good example of a situation where a station would be charged. A large portion of your broadcasting is given to opinion programs. Does the station stand behind every opinion which is expressed by, say, Jack Webster, or any other opinion commentators?

Mr. Hughes: No, I don't think we necessarily stand behind them. Jack is very conscious of this. We have lengthy discussions at all times saying "You have said this. Let's get the other side in." We make available time for anyone who wishes to comment on the position; as we did with the yacht thing that happened the other day. We attempted at great length to have them come in and give their side.

Mr. Fortier: Will he have to clear with management any views which he is going to express?

Mr. Hughes: Well, he has been with us for 11 years and we have meetings every other Tuesday afternoon to discuss aspects of it. If he gets where he feels...he communicates and says "How do you feel about this? Give me some background from your side." We have discussions. We don't attempt to say "Take it easy if you don't like that television program last night." He doesn't phone me and ask, he goes on and says it.

Mr. Fortier: Have there been instances where he has editorialized one way and you felt so strongly about the episode that you or anyone on the Board would have said "No more of this?"

Mr. Hughes: Never "no more." I think that newsmen can be guilty of over-emphasizing a story and maybe getting involved and seeing the trees and forgetting about the forest. I think in a friendly way we would chat with him and say "I think you are playing this story a little high." He says "Yes, maybe; I can see your point." I think it is only an opinion you would get from someone discussing it in a helpful vein.

Mr. Fortier: Whose judgment would you substitute to his? Your own or management?

Mr. Hughes: We would talk about our program. The assistant manager would be involved in it and Warren, probably, and myself, and we would attempt to come to some arrangement, some opinion on that, a consensus of the view.

Mr. Fortier: Is there such a thing as a CKNW editorial policy?

Mr. Hughes: No. We have gone out on a number of crusades. The latest one, which would not be an editorial policy—I wish we had brought it with us—we published a full page ad with regard to pollution to attempt to show the people of British Columbia what a problem it was. We said, that if they felt it was a problem, they should write to the Premier of the province and bring their views, to his attention. We supplied them with a whole page to write on—a blank page of newspaper. Then I went on the air, myself with two minute comments on the pollution problem facing us here in the mainland; and I had the air people, the pilots on tape and they would tell me what they are experiencing from the smoke problem etc. We detached a man from the newsroom for a period and he went and covered the material and we ran that up until February.

Now we are going to shortly unveil a new program with regard to hospitals. We feel there is a genuine hospital crisis in British Columbia, especially in the lower mainland, where people are waiting and waiting. We are going to attempt to get public opinion and notice of the fact that something more should be done to get more hospitals built.

The Chairman: Perhaps because it is six o'clock we should terminate the hearing but perhaps I could ask one final question of Mr. Griffiths, with the forbearance of the Senators. I hope you will appreciate the spirit I put the question to you. You and Mr. Hughes have something in common, in that you both come from New Westminster. The discussion here this afternoon for almost two hours has centered substantially on CKNW and that is understandable because it is perhaps the premium station in your organization. Many of the questions we have put to you have been specifically on CKNW. Now the answer you may make is to be critical of us and say that our questions concerned CKNW.

Are you concerned about the fact that you are really, in terms of Winnipeg operation an absentee owner; and should I be concerned about absentee ownership when I reflect on the hearing and the fact that we spent all this time talking about CKNW and not at all about Winnipeg?

Mr. Griffiths: I think the questions that have been asked this afternoon by the committee could equally have been asked of the station manager and the news editor or CJOB. I think, and I am sure, otherwise I would not say so, that the answers would have been practically identical because the approaches are identical. At all times we say to the management that you have got to be of the people of the community, not just in the community. Moving to Calgary, the situation is slightly different. I would like to make comment on that. Winnipeg goes back mar-years, because in Winnipeg we purchased an operation from someone who wished to retire from the business at that time, so there was no continuity except we have the same manager, and the same accountant, and the same news editor that were there that many years ago.

In Calgary we have taken a more up-to-date approach with the approval of our purchase, a series of things come into play. First of all, the principal members of the Board of Directors there continue to be directors. Half the directors are Calgarians and the other half will be from the west side of the mountains. The vendors there become substantial shareholders of Western, and the President of the Calgary company becomes a Western director. So we say, I think, that in every way and properly, the voice of Calgary is equally directly represented.

The Chairman: Thank you. If time allowed, and unhappily it does not, I would like to explore the relationship that you enjoy in Calgary and Winnipeg. I am grateful for the explanation you have given. I am sorry we cannot explore it at greater length.

Mr. Hughes mentioned my own background in broadcasting, and quite aside from that I am always apologetic when broadcasters appear before the committee because we hear in all your brief that you have appeared endlessly, or so it seems, before committees of inquiry—the CRTC, the BBG, the old CBC, and various royal commissions. These points have been made endlessly in the brief that we have received from broadcasters. We take that point, we understand that point, and we appreciate that problem.

I must say, gentlemen, we do not apologize for asking you here today. Indeed, very much on the contrary. This is a study of the overall media spectrum, and I suggest to you, had we omitted broadcasters, had we failed to include them in a study of this kind, the broadcasters would have been understandably offended. We are grateful to you and thank you.

May I remind the senators that we are going to meet for a few minutes in Camera at 7.30 p.m. The first session tomorrow morning is Countryside Holdings Limited at 10 a.m. in this room.

The committee adjourned.

THE SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE ON MASS MEDIA

EVIDENCE

Ottawa, Wednesday, April 15, 1970.

—The Special Senate Committee on mass media met this day at 10.00 a.m.

Senator Keith Davey (Chairman) In the Chair.

The Chairman: Honourable Senators, if I may call this session to order. This morning we are going to receive two briefs. At 11:30 we will hear from Radio Futura Limited, and their Montreal and Vancouver stations. However the first brief we are going to receive is from Countryside Holdings Limited. Sitting on my immediate right is an old friend of mine, Mr. Norris Mackenzie, who is the President of Countryside Holdings Limited.

I think I might perhaps ask Mr. Mackenzie to introduce his associates, but before I do so, I should simply say to him the procedure here is simple. The brief you were kind enough to send us three weeks in advance, as we requested, has been received by the Senators, it has been circulated and presumably studied by them. We would like you to take a few minutes now to introduce your colleagues and then take ten or twelve or fifteen minutes to comment on your brief or other things that may be on your mind.

Then, following that we would like to question you on your brief and on your oral submissions and other matters as well.

I might say it is not necessary for you to make an introductory statement but the time is yours if you wish to use it.

Mr. G. Norris Mackenzie, President, Countryside Holdings Limited: Are you suggesting I should ad lib?

The Chairman: You are pretty good at ad libbing.

Mr. Mackenzie: Ladies and gentlemen, good morning. To my right is Allan Rogers, who is the Secretary of Countryside Holdings Limited and a partner of mine without a cross word for about 13 or 14 years and that is pretty good. He is also a lawyer.

The Chairman: That is especially good if he is a lawyer.

Mr. Mackenzie: And a good lawyer. On my left is Roger Warren, who is with A. E. Ames & Co. Ltd., in Toronto and is also a director of Countryside Holdings Limited. I am the President.

I did not expect, Senator, to have the privilege of addressing this august hearing so early in the morning.

The Chairman: It is not necessary. If you would like to say anything, you may do so but you certainly do not have to.

Mr. Mackenzie: I will be happy to give you a verbal run-down, which is not necessarily in this brief.

We are summer residents of the Muskoka area. Many years ago Allan and myself and our then partner, a Chartered Accountant whose name is Douglas Haig, decided at Huntsville, at least, by merit of some technical reason or the other, we could not get good radio. CFRB is a fine radio station but we could not always get it because it comes and goes.

There are weekly papers in the neighbourhood of Huntsville, Bracebridge and Parry Sound. But there was really no daily form of inter-communication between these areas. This is true. We were thinking of the winter time primarily—and of course, in the summer. Even in those days there was a tremendous influx of tourists. So, not having too many brains, we decided to start a radio station at Huntsville and we did.

In those days we did not really know very much. We applied for 250 watts and we had a very good frequency. It was 590 on the dial. We found to our chagrin this power would not do anything for us so we re-applied and got 1000 watts and then we were still in trouble and had to put up a satellite at Parry Sound.

It may be of some interest to this group to know, I think in all of Canada, CKAR is the only station that has its so-called satellite with the very same call letters which is CKAR at Huntsville and CKAR-1 at Parry Sound.

This is a very small community. Both communities, internally in the Parry Sound area and at Huntsville, represent a very few thousand people but there is this area. There are inter-hockey games and so on.

We found nothing but problems in ground conductivity because the very reason we could not get CFRB was also the reason we could not get our stuff out as well as we wanted to. We have had a nice time in getting this organized and it has been a great education. We have learned a lot. We have had to.

Had it not been for the fact we are all otherwise employed, this being our first station, we probably would have had a lot of trouble keeping it going and we did anyway.

I am very pleased to tell you this year, 1970,—I believe it is our twelfth year of operation or possibly thirteenth—we are budgeting for a very modest profit. In the meantime, this station has, in my honest view, done something of which we are all very proud; it did indeed and does indeed really and truly contribute a great deal to the area in which it operates.

A lot of people, will take a look at any small radio station in any small community and immediately will begin to compare it with the Toronto Star, for example, or something in the big city, which is rather flattering.

Our little radio station because we listen to it all the time, it is no CFRB, it cannot be, but it is a very fine locally oriented and I think, nicely programmed station. It is one of those stations that has to be all things to all people with the result we have the normal allowance of the kind of music that probably appeals to this group, which is "Dancing in the Dark," it's my style. We have a little bit of religion which I am sure is the Senator's style, and some sports and things of this nature plus the rock and roll which will drive you right out of your mind, but we have it all. This is the sort of service that we try and operate in Countryside broadly speaking. CKAR was our first one and they are all now healthy, growing babies.

I think that really tells you what we are doing.

The Chairman: Thank you very much.

The questioning this morning will begin with Senator Sparrow.

Senator Sparrow: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Could you give me the listening audience break-down of the stations referred to in your Brief, Huntsville, Parry Sound, Stratford, Woodstock and Orillia? Could you give us an idea of the size of your stations?

Mr. Mackenzie: Well, Senator, in Huntsville, as I have described to you, it is not exactly the Queen Mary in relation to luxury. We do not subscribe to the BBM survey. There is another reason too because of the area itself and because of the nature of the area where tourism represents a tremendous thing. I do not think we can. We have tried to attack that position with advertising agencies too. We can only tell you that in the area we serve, most of the time in most of the area, we are by far the strongest signal and business is good. We get good reaction to it. I cannot give you the numbers.

Huntsville itself has a population of something under 4,000 people. Again, depending believe it or not, on weather conditions, we can be heard in Bracebridge, in town sometimes and other times not if electrical wires are buzzing, but we can be heard outside and all along the lake resorts. It is an impossible question to answer.

Senator Sparrow: And the other stations?

Mr. Mackenzie: As to Woodstock and Stratford, I have not got the figures. The two areas would represent probably a metropolitan population of a total of around 50,000. Between Stratford and Woodstock, I think you could safely say on the average day and night we would at least have 60 or 65 per cent of the audience overall. This is in town of course. You also have the farm areas.

The Chairman: I have a supplementary just before you go on, on Huntsville. You mentioned 4,000 population. It must be around three times that number in the summer or four times or even five times. I do not know.

Mr. Mackenzie: We do not know either but the Tourist Association and various other people who are interested in tourism, for instance, take a count at the Algonquin Park gates.

Now, years ago we were looking for 200,000 or 300,000 summertime visitors in the Muskoka-Parry Sound area. This is a great big carpet. It absorbs people like you can hardly believe. On Saturday mornings or any morning in town parking was a real problem.

We would have to say nowadays there is at least I would guess 300,000 summer visitors right around the Huntsville, Lake of Bays area, and of course with skidoos and the opening of winter activities, the hotels are doing quite a good business up there this last year or so.

The Chairman: I make the point because the Senators are not as familiar with the area as you are and, of course, I am.

One further supplementary question. Do you therefore sell, unlike most radio stations, more national advertising during the summer months?

Mr. Mackenzie: As a matter of fact, yes, that is correct. We have been very fortunate that way inasmuch as everything is not done by a computer. There are some people in the advertising agency, believe it or not, who still believe what they see.

Yes, we did well that way.

Senator Sparrow: You made reference to Huntsville and said you are at least budgeting for a profit this year. The other stations are all profitable?

Mr. Mackenzie: They all show a black figure.

Senator Sparrow: In your brief you show Gordon A. Sinclair as a director, holding one share. That is Gordon Allan Sinclair, I assume, the TV personality?

Mr. Mackenzie: Yes.

Senator Sparrow: Maybe I should ask Gordon Sinclair this question. What value is he to the company as a director and what kind of money would he make as a director?

The Chairman: Answer the second question first.

Mr. Mackenzie: Well, he makes about the same kind of money as the rest of us do but I do not know if we gave him his dollar this year or not. He takes it out at Christmas time occasionally. We do not pay him anything. He is there primarily because this is a small company and Gordon Sinclair was a very good friend to me during the opening of my first company and he has got a good brain. We appreciate him.

The Chairman: You sound surprised.

Mr. Mackenzie: No, he is a good businessman too.

The Chairman: Well, I think it is important that we have it on the record, in view of his well-known questioning on another program, that you do not pay him anything. He performs for...

Mr. Mackenzie: Oh yes, he does, just because I think he enjoys it and he contributes a great deal.

One of the other reasons he is with us is because when we assumed control of CKMP in Midland, he was one of the original investors with the then owner-management and so this lead us into this.

The Chairman: With his son? Was not his son involved in that?

Mr. Mackenzie: No, that was Bruce Armstrong.

Senator McElman: A supplementary Sinclair question would be: Is he worth as much as you pay him?

Mr. Mackenzie: Senator, I will ask him that.

The Chairman: I think we probably have not dealt with the second part of Senator Sparrow's question which is: What does he contribute? Does he give you advice and so on?

Mr. Mackenzie: I think I will ask Allan Rogers to answer that question.

Allan D. Rogers, Secretary, Countryside Holdings Limited: Yes, I think he does. He is quite faithful about attending directors' meetings when they call them. If he can possibly attend he does and he is of course, a long time, well-known summer resident of Bala, which is in the Midland-Muskoka-Orillia area.

Yes, I think he makes a contribution to the general operation of the company.

Senator Sparrow: Mr. Mackenzie, in your biographical sketch I note you have been in the broadcasting business most of your life, commencing with CJCA and then with CKWX, CKOC and All-Canada Toronto. Are you still associated in any way with these other interests?

Mr. Mackenzie: No.

Senator Sparrow: That was just an employment field?

Mr. Mackenzie: That is correct.

Senator Sparrow: So All-Canada at the moment has no connection with you or any of your other interests?

Mr. Mackenzie: No.

Senator Sparrow: What does G. N. Mackenzie Limited do?

Mr. Mackenzie: I am glad you asked, Senator. That company was a program producing and a program distribution company. Primarily it started off as a manufacturers' agency for American-type or Australian or whatever material was available and sellable to our Canadian radio stations fraternity.

It then got into the business of the production of Canadian, both English and French type material which was sponsored, as Senator Davey will remember, by people like Swift's and Chesebrough-Pond's, both English and French. It then became a distributing factor for news. I have sold it but it, broadly speaking, was in the production end of radio for both local and national type clients.

Senator Sparrow: You have since sold the company?

Mr. Mackenzie: Yes sir.

Senator Sparrow: So your only business in the field is with Countryside?

Mr. Mackenzie: That is correct.

The Chairman: Do you make your home in the community now?

Mr. Mackenzie: You mean...?

The Chairman: In Huntsville?

Mr. Mackenzie: No, I live in Toronto. We have a home in Port Sydney.

The Chairman: I see.

Senator Sparrow: On page 2 of your brief you refer to the time you purchased CKAR and later on CJCS. Then you say:

"It is doubtful if CKAR and CKAR-1 could have survived if Countryside had not acquired CJCS in Stratford."

Why?

Mr. Mackenzie: Well, I would defer to Mr. Rogers on this with just one opening comment.

That is that CKAR needed a tremendous amount of financial transfusions and CJCS was a profitable organization and gave us a cash flow that helped us with our bank and so on.

Maybe Allan can enlarge on that.

Mr. Rogers: Yes. What happened was for the first twelve years or eleven years of its existence, CKAR did not make any money and in fact in a number of years it lost reasonably substantial sums.

When we acquired CJCS, as Mr. Mackenzie has pointed out, it had a good cash flow and it enabled us to obtain bank financing, inter-company loans and this sort of thing which kept CKAR in operation.

Senator Sparrow: Not particularly for efficiency of broadcasting or selling?

Mr. Rogers: No.

Senator Sparrow: It just received a cash insert?

Mr. Rogers: Yes.

Senator Sparrow: You say in the middle of page 3:

"The directors of Countryside are not prepared to express an opinion as to whether or not multiple media ownership is socially desirable."

I do not quite understand that comment. Why are you not prepared to express an opinion? I presume you have one? Why would you not be prepared to express it?

Mr. Mackenzie: Well, Allan, you wrote that part.

Mr. Rogers: Well, I think the reason for that statement was this: that in our opinion small stations such as we have, and especially marginal stations such as CKAR in the earlier days and CKMP, were not economically feasible. They just did not make money. They lost money. It took a number of years to get them going so they are accepted by the people and have good ratings and so on. I think to that extent if any one wants to open a radio station today, he must either have a very large financial backing to suffer through the first three or four or five years of if he has a group of stations, he can use the economically sound ones to help along the lame ones.

To that extent I think that multiple media ownership is desirable. Whether it is socially desirable I am not quite sure.

What does multiple media ownership mean? I can see, for example, dangers in the so-called cross media ownership, newspapers, radio stations and all these things. It may not be desirable if someone has too much, too many types of media in one certain area.

The Chairman: Well, Mr. Rogers, you say "It may not be". Is it or is it not?

Mr. Rogers: I do not know. We have never had cross media ownership.

The Chairman: I think that the way Senator Sparrow puts his question to you is a good way. It is very important for broadcasters who come before this Committee to realize that, as I am sure you do, this is not a CRTC hearing. No one has been on trial here and certainly CKAR and Countryside is not on trial here.

We are particularly interested in where Countryside fits into the broad spectrum of things and what you think about the over-all media picture. Some of the questions you are answering by saying "if" or "maybe". Please do not feel you need to be so diplomatic. Say what you think.

Mr. Rogers: Well, let me put it this way. I think that it is socially desirable so far as small radio stations are concerned and that is what we are. That is what we know about.

The Chairman: Well, I think it is interesting for us to know that.

Mr. Rogers: I think it results in a better financial base. I think it results in some programming pluses because the good stations can program better than poorer ones. They can hire better personnel and we can have an interchange of managers. They meet and discuss things. We think this results in our stations having better programs and doing a better job than if they were just very small stations that were not properly financed.

So, to that extent I think it is socially desirable.

On the other hand—I speak personally—I can see that multiple media ownership may not be socially desirable if one person owns all forms of media in one particular market. Now, we do not do that.

The Chairman: Or if one person owns all the radio stations in Canada, for example?

Mr. Rogers: Yes, exactly, so I cannot say "Yes" or "No". Obviously I think what we are doing is socially desirable but I do not think it would be socially desirable perhaps if in any one area we owned the newspaper, the radio station and the television station and so on.

The Chairman: Do you wish to add something, Mr. Mackenzie?

Mr. MacKenzie: Yes. Well, if I might add one thing. I believe an awful lot of this gets right down to human relationships. You say and you are right that this is not the CRTC but we all have to have an opinion.

I believe you will agree with me that Canada, as a nation, has been fortunate in the type of entrepreneur who has invested his time and his money in private operational broadcasting of both areas. We are lucky to have the type of people we have who are running this. Of course in the progress of growing, as our country did, an opportunity comes along in a given market and the gentleman says "Well, this is part of our thing".

I, broadly speaking, think we have been fortunate so far.

Mr. Fortier: Supplementary?

The Chairman: Yes, Mr. Fortier.

Mr. Fortier: Referring back to what Mr. Rogers just said about the advantages of multiple ownership, I find it difficult to reconcile what he has just uttered to the Committee with what I see on page 3 of the Company's Brief in the first paragraph, the last sentence there.

Maybe Mr. Rogers is going to say now that Mr. Mackenzie wrote this one but he said: "...otherwise there appears to be little advantage, at least insofar as Countryside is concerned" and that is from owning or controlling a number of stations.

I think you have just put your finger on a number of advantages, some very substantial ones, as I understood you. How would you reconcile this?

Mr. Rogers: Well, I think what I am saying is that the advantages, in my mind, boil down to really two things. One, economics and two, if you have four or five managers who have different ideas and hold managers' meetings and so on, they meet and come up with new programming ideas. This is what we are doing in Orillia and it is working and what we do in Woodstock, but apart from that, I do not see any great advantages.

Mr. Fortier: I thought in your first statement that you were indicating that there were rather substantial advantages flowing from owning more than one radio station. Now you are sort of soft-peddalling a little.

Mr. Rogers: No, I did not mean to. I think I am saying and I will say again that without multiple ownership I do not think CKAR could have survived and I think it is important that it did.

Mr. Fortier: Yes, that point is made in the brief, I agree.

Senator Smith: Why would that be so?

Mr. Rogers: Because CKAR lost money for ten or eleven years and CJCS made money and we were able to finance CKAR with our profits from Stratford.

The Chairman: May I ask a question? On this CKAR losing money for the first ten years, frankly, Mr. Mackenzie, that was a great surprise to me. You planned the station and you thought you would make money obviously. What went wrong? Why did you not make money? Where were your...

Mr. Mackenzie: Errors?

The Chairman: No, I will not say "errors". Why did it take you ten years? I am sure you did not think it would.

Mr. Mackenzie: No. It is like anything else. It is not always planned that way. We bumped into a situation of straight ordinary mechanical problems. Frankly today, I do not think any of the gentlemen in our Board know how to plug in a toaster in relation to getting a transmitter going and the government comes along with readings on conductivity which read thus, and the Engineering Department say on that basis it will go this far.

It developed there were errors right on the ground so when we started our first transmitter it didn't work. We therefore had to get a second transmitter to literally cover the area.

The business of capital investment in literally two radio stations instead of one, the cost of transportation of the signal between Huntsville and Parry Sound on a common carrier was a continuing monthly expense.

Then you have the situation, Senator, that you are aware of and that is that any new radio station starts up this way, which ours did, it cools down and then has that long hopeful climb up. This is precisely what happened.

The Chairman: A particularly helpful question that I could ask because we are interested in similar stations everywhere in Canada: Was the market too small for a radio station? How small can a market be to support a radio station?

Mr. Mackenzie: I suppose that depends entirely on the economic situation involved. I think broadly speaking we did not feel the market was too small because we made comparisons, for example, with Peterborough County.

We took a look at the then population and I remember it was a static population of about 60,000 people in the Muskoka-Parry Sound area, not in the cities; but over in Peterborough they had 90,000 or 95,000, but their situation was well down. In those days they had only one radio station. I believe they had a television station and they had two daily newspapers.

In the area we were serving, as I pointed out, there was no daily form of intercommunication in those areas. We therefore felt that with the combination of what has happened, which with the population explosion, the fact that tourism is there, yes, we were right but it was a long time being right.

It was not a quick dollar or a quick situation.

The Chairman: In your opinion—I know you know the country well because you have travelled extensively, are there many communities left in Canada which are potential areas for new radio stations?

Mr. Mackenzie: In my opinion I hope we do not. This is not because of our small involvement but I sincerely hope that our governing authorities here recognize the errors, in my opinion, that have been made by the FCC in giving too many licences to too many people. Frankly, I do not believe this country needs a single more radio station that I can think of.

Senator Sparrow: Getting back to your comments on CJCS and CKAR and CKAR-1 not being able to survive; they could have survived just every bit as well had there been an insertion of personal capital or capital from another corporation outside the broadcasting field?

Mr. Mackenzie: Oh yes.

Senator Sparrow: There is not a direct connection. Is that what you are saying?

Mr. Rogers: I am saying that except to perhaps qualify it to this extent. I think if the then directors or entrepreneurs who established CKAR had not put in their own money, I believe no one else would have. After you have suffered through four or five years and you keep taking money out of your pocket, unless you can get it reasonably painlessly, it becomes a little humdrum.

Senator Sparrow: A related industry paying the shot, in other words.

Mr. Rogers: Right.

Senator Sparrow: Rather than some other industry?

Mr. Rogers: Right.

Senator Sparrow: I am not sure I know the value of this question to the Committee but it will be interesting for me to know at least and I hope to the Committee.

You have referred to the fact you have a management arrangement or you have management control of the two stations in which you own 50 per cent. What type of management arrangements do you have? Simply what would that management arrangement be?

Mr. Rogers: It is very simple. Both of those stations are owned 50 per cent by Countryside and 50 per cent by one other shareholder. It is as simple as that. We have a letter of arrangement between us and it simply says that Countryside shall have the management control of the stations. That is all it says.

Senator Sparrow: And you charge a management fee?

Mr. Mackenzie: Yes.

Mr. Rogers: Mr. Mackenzie charges a management fee.

Senator Sparrow: As an individual.

Mr. Rogers: As an individual.

Senator Sparrow: Then Countryside themselves do not charge?

Mr. Rogers: No, Countryside does not charge.

The Chairman: Mr. Fortier has a supplementary on this, Senator Sparrow.

Senator Sparrow: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: If we may deal with Orillia for a second. Your partners there are MacLean-Hunter?

Mr. Rogers: That is right.

Mr. Fortier: Do they provide you with any know-how at all, given, of course, their involvement in the field of communication, or do they disinterest themselves entirely from their investment in CFOR?

Mr. Rogers: I think it is fair to say that when we went into that organization that it was our know-how that they required.

Mr. Fortier: Were they already there, Mr. Rogers, when you went in?

Mr. Rogers: It was owned by another subsidiary of Maclean-Hunter's and two other persons.

Mr. Fortier: Did you buy your 50 per cent from MacLean-Hunter?

Mr. Rogers: No, we bought it from a company called Great Lakes Broadcasting.

Mr. Fortier: So that MacLean-Hunter were already there with their 50 per cent?

Mr. Rogers: In effect what happened was that we incorporated Orillia Broadcasting Limited which bought the assets of CFOR Orillia from Great Lakes and then Maclean-Hunter and Countryside each owned half the stock of the new company.

Mr. Fortier: Do you have meetings of the Board of Directors of Orillia Broadcasting Limited?

Mr. Rogers: There are...

Mr. Fortier: Maybe I should have asked my first question. Are there any of MacLean-Hunter's representatives on the Board?

Mr. Rogers: No. Very infrequently; they are furnished weekly with sales reports and that sort of thing but they leave the management of the station to us.

Mr. Fortier: And they do not give you any tip as to how a communications company should be run?

Mr. Mackenzie: It was the reverse, Mr. Fortier.

Mr. Fortier: Have you ever sought in recent years their advice on anything and been met with a refusal to provide it?

Mr. Mackenzie: We asked them for a couple of million dollars and they hesitated.

Mr. Rogers: We have not asked them.

Mr. Fortier: You have not.

Mr. Rogers: I am sure they would give us whatever information they could if we had asked them.

Mr. Fortier: Do you find it an advantage or a hindrance to be in equal partnership with Maclean-Hunter in the ownership of a radio station in Ontario?

Mr. Rogers: I think I can honestly say so far as both Oxford and Orillia are concerned we operate the stations. We furnish our partners with financial statements and that is the way it has been and there has been no problem.

Mr. Fortier: No problem at all, but you would be just as well off—again with no reference to the particular problems that you have in any station—if you owned 100 per cent of the shares. Is that correct?

You do not get anything from your association.

Mr. Rogers: Frankly except for tax reasons we would be as well off.

Mr. Fortier: Except for the tax reasons which you go into in your brief?

Mr. Rogers: Yes, right.

Mr. Fortier: Who are your partners in Midland in CKMP?

Mr. Rogers: I could give you a run down of the shareholders of all of them, if you wish.

The Chairman: Do you wish to have them tabled or would you rather discuss them?

Mr. Fortier: Unless there is one substantial shareholder, I think we should have them just tabled.

The Chairman: I think it would be quite sensible to table those with us. If there are any major shareholders, as Mr. Fortier mentioned, perhaps you would like to mention them.

Mr. Rogers: Perhaps I could give you the major shareholders. In Huntsville there are really none. In Midland the only major shareholders are Bruce Armstrong who is the President and Manager and Gordon Sinclair has a minority interest. He was an original shareholder in that station. CJCS we own outright. Orillia, as you know, is 50 per cent between ourselves and Maclean-Hunter. Woodstock is 50-50 between ourselves and Ferris Agencies Ltd. That is Gordon Ferris & Company.

The Chairman: Would you table a copy of that with us, please.

Mr. Rogers: I can send it. I just scratched it out on a copy.

The Chairman: Thank you.

Mr. Fortier: So you own—whether it is 100 per cent or 50-50 or 53 per cent—and manage all those stations?

Mr. Rogers: That is correct.

The Chairman: Yes, Senator Sparrow.

Senator Sparrow: On page 3 of your brief at the bottom paragraph you refer to the income and estate tax laws.

What is your recommendation as far as estate taxes are concerned? I ask this question in two ways really; Is it that there should be no estate taxes or the rate is too high? Should there be special provision for the broadcasting media in particular?

Mr. Rogers: If I may answer the last question first. I do not think there should be special provisions for broadcasters as opposed to any other undertaking.

We are all residents of Ontario and the difficulty, frankly, in Ontario is that at the moment the federal Estate Tax provision work pretty much in conflict with the Ontario Succession Duty provisions. The Ontario Government, in its most recent budget, has, of course, quite substantially increased the exemption for widows but the difficulty frankly is this: that if any one of us were to die shortly and if the taxing authorities valued these personal holdings on what we think they are probably worth, frankly it would mean we would probably have to dispose of everything we have to pay our duties if we wanted to hold the Countryside stock, if we wanted to sell the Countryside stock, then we would have to find a buyer who would have to come in in a minority position and all would be subject to the requirements of the CRTC that they qualify and so on. So you ask me what my opinion is about our Estate taxes and Succession Duties, my opinion is that if we are to have a capital gains tax we ought not to have Estate taxes and Succession Duties.

Mr. Fortier: But you are not asking for special treatment for broadcasters?

Mr. Rogers: No.

Senator Sparrow: Well at the moment we have not got capital gains. If it did come, capital gains would be another problem to be faced.

Mr. Rogers: Yes. If a capital gain is to be imposed on estates, on persons who have enjoyed a capital gain at the time of death, then that tax must be paid, the federal estate tax must be paid and the Ontario succession duties must be paid. Then for a small private company or a reasonably substantial private company, it seems to me, you have to be liquid before you die. You can do one of two things. You can sell out or you can go public. It is, of course, just as simple as that.

Senator Sparrow: You refer to that again on page 4.

Mr. Rogers: Yes.

Senator Sparrow: Are any of your stations for sale?

Mr. Rogers: No sir.

Mr. Mackenzie: Well, just a moment; how much?

Mr. Rogers: Well, how much?

Senator Sparrow: I believe you have had offers to purchase these radio stations and I ask this particularly of the bigger companies in the broadcasting field.

Mr. Rogers: We are constantly receiving offers but as far as I am aware they always come from a broker so we do not really know who is making the offers. I do not think we have had...

Mr. Mackenzie: We have never entertained one of these with any seriousness because we feel people shop, a lot of them, so we really seriously have not looked at any specific offer in any serious way at all.

Senator Sparrow: You have a salable corporation.

Mr. Rogers: We believe so.

Mr. Mackenzie: Under normal conditions.

Mr. Fortier: May I ask a supplementary?

The Chairman: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: On this question of going public—maybe I should direct this question to Mr. Warren, he has an interest in any corporation going public. When I ask this question I bear in mind the public trust nature of a communications company. Mr. Warren, is there any difference between a broadcasting firm and any other service industry in the arranging of capital by public financing that makes it more difficult in the case of a broadcasting company than in the case of any other corporation?

Roger W. Warren, Director, Countryside Holdings Limited: Well, basically speaking I am going to approach it slightly differently. First of all, as far as I am concerned, Countryside is too small at this stage to go public.

Mr. Fortier: Certainly it does not have a history of profit which would be a necessary ingredient.

Mr. Warren: I was going to get in to that. To start with I think size is important. I think we have had too many public issues which have been too small, with lack of marketability. This is a very, very important factor as far as an investor is concerned.

If there are not enough shares available, this means that any institutional investor probably will reject the issue simply because he has not got marketability. If he buys he has to buy too big a percentage and if he wants to sell it there is not a big enough market to take care of it.

The second point is the one you touched on, Mr. Fortier, the profit. In other words you have got to have good financial statistics in order to have a successful issue. Certainly any house, such as Ames and Co. Ltd. with which I am associated, wants a company with a good record and this is all important because when you sell something you want the selling party to be satisfied and also the buying party. The deal is only good if both sides are satisfied.

I myself would like to see more public issues in the communication field. I think I probably should add more issues. I feel our markets in Canada have not got enough issues of quality type stocks available. This is one of the major problems, particularly once again for institutional investors, that there is just not enough selection, not enough variety.

You take somebody like the Investors Group in Winnipeg. They own practically anything they can own. They could be getting into a controlling position in many of these companies which, of course, they should not get into and do not want to get into. Therefore they are forced to look to other countries for diversification within their portfolio.

Therefore I would like to see a situation created where it is advantageous for the communication field to go public. Granted there are problems with Canadian control and so on but we could get over that problem with the Bank Act, something along that line could be incorporated in legislation that would be passed.

Mr. Fortier: That is a very good general answer. I appreciate it but my question really was: Is it harder in your experience as a stockbroker for a broadcasting company to go public than for any other form of company?

Mr. Warren: I would say certainly in the last year it has not been because the broadcasting industry has caught the imagination of the investing public.

Right at the moment I would say it would be very difficult, the main reason being the uncertainties that have been created by recent statements brought down by the CRTC.

In fact, I have been out of the country for the last three weeks so I am not in a position to comment on this but I understand there is a doubt on exactly what is going on and that would make a public issue very difficult at this stage.

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Mackenzie, have you considered, prior to Mr. Benson tabling his White Paper, going public with Countryside?

Mr. Mackenzie: I feel we have probably always had the objective of becoming broader in the base and proceeding in this way. I do not think Mr. Benson's White Paper's comment was timed one way or the other in relation to this.

Mr. Fortier: Do you think it is a good thing or a bad thing in your mind for communication companies to become public concerns?

Mr. Mackenzie: That is a real tough one. It all depends where you are, I think.

Mr. Fortier: Well, say you are in your shoes today.

Mr. Mackenzie: Well, on the same basis that Mr. Rogers pointed out, I believe that everything is getting more and more competitive, more and more costly.

The services that are demanded or will be demanded in the '70's or '80's are going to be more extreme than they were in the '40's or '50's and in order to accomplish this, we are going to have to have more money.

Mr. Fortier: I think your case is a very natural one for this sort of question because in fact what you did twelve or thirteen years ago is, as a member of the public of the community during the summer, which was lacking in communications, you decided to start one so that there was part of the public which invested some money.

Do you think ideally that public should be involved and that the base should be extended?

Mr. Mackenzie: I think it would be advantageous to anyone concerned because first of all, of course, there would be a higher rate of local interest if you have a financial interest to a point and local responsibility.

I think it would be a healthy situation, yes.

Mr. Fortier: Do you think that government or government agencies or quasi-judicial agencies such as the CRTC, should encourage a broader base of ownership within the communications field?

Mr. Mackenzie: Well, Mr. Fortier, the way it is going I have to say that this is about the only route we have left to follow.

I have to assume that from what appears to be the guidelines, this is going to be the only answer.

Mr. Fortier: Unless you have terribly wealthy investors who will be paid to invest their money.

Mr. Mackenzie: I would guess that even that would be difficult in the years to come.

Mr. Fortier: I think I have to ask this question. You say "This appears to be where we are going". So I come back to my first question: Is this good or is this bad? Is the CRTC encouraging motherhood or it is encouraging vice?

Mr. Mackenzie: That is a very good question. I think that probably it is a good idea for people to get together. It follows the concept of the city and the town.

Everybody cannot afford to have their own car. You have to have a pool service occasionally. I think this is what you are discussing. The answer, I think and I expect it is the opinion of my partners, is that Yes, in the longer-run, we are heading for more of a community effort, not only in broadcasting but in many other things.

Mr. Fortier: This Committee is dealing with mass media. And my question was framed so you would apply your mind exclusively to the nature of the industry in which you are involved. Is it a good or a bad thing that mass media belong to the masses?

Mr. Mackenzie: With proper direction I think it is a good thing.

The Chairman: Mr. Rogers wants to comment.

Mr. Rogers: I would agree I think that it is desirable that the public have an interest in the mass media. Certainly if you take the historic situation of CFRB, which has been a public company for many years. It is an excellent radio station and certainly I do not think anyone can be critical of CFRB having been a public company. There would have to be proper direction and management. Obviously you would hold shareholders' meetings but you cannot call in all of your shareholders and discuss programming with them. I think it again boils down to the people who manage the station but yes, I think it is desirable.

The Chairman: Did you wish to add something, Mr. Mackenzie?

Mr. Mackenzie: Just to the effect where in a city like Toronto you have four or five radio stations and the public has a wide choice as to which particular station they want to become part of.

Senator Sparrow: Your brief stated that the reason necessitating going public was primarily taxation and succession duties or estate taxes. Two other things have come up now, a broader base of ownership which you indicated you think was socially of value and when you made a statement that perhaps additional capital may be acquired by going public.

Is the company you now have not financially viable enough to look after its own operation and inter-expansion for the future or are you saying that by going public, you would extend into the broader field of broadcasting or media in local area as well as others; or do you need this capital just for the people you serve at the present time?

Mr. Rogers: No. I think we would need capital if we proposed to broaden our base. If we wanted to buy another radio station today, prices are extremely high and certainly we could not have the resources within our organization to acquire additional properties.

We do not need it for our operations.

Senator Sparrow: As such.

Mr. Rogers: That is right.

Senator Sparrow: You say somewhere in your brief that cable television would be your greatest problem.

Mr. Rogers: Yes.

Senator Sparrow: Where is that in your brief?

Senator Smith: Page 4.

Senator Sparrow: That seems to be your greatest concern at the moment apart from the regulations of the CRTC and so on. It appears, as well, I think somewhere there, that you are interested in going into the cable business yourself. Is that right?

Mr. Rogers: Right.

Senator Sparrow: You say:

"It appears to be only a matter of time before cable companies will be allowed to sell their time commercially..."

and so on.

How long do you think it will be—when you say this—that it is going to affect you drastically financially as you have indicated?

Mr. Rogers: I think our concern is that in the United States, the FCC is now permitting cable companies to sell advertising locally. It seems to us that if a cable company in Huntsville could go to the local car dealer and do a one-minute commercial with a hand held Brownie camera, it would not cost him much more than it would cost us to put on a one-minute commercial over the radio and that a cable company could go conceivably into the local advertising market quite substantially, but that I do not know.

Senator Sparrow: I am sorry. I do not mean to interrupt you. Is there cable in all of the centres now?

Mr. Rogers: Yes.

Senator Sparrow: There is. It is in all of them?

Mr. Rogers: Yes.

Senator Sparrow: Including Huntsville?

Mr. Rogers: Yes. I was going to add when you asked me when this might happen, I cannot answer that.

The Chairman: Do you think it will happen? Do you think there is a possibility?

Mr. Rogers: I think if cable companies are required to do some local programming, they will have to have additional revenues and I do not know where else it would come from.

The Chairman: So you confidently expect to see the cable companies selling local advertising.

Mr. Rogers: I think probably. Yes, I think so.

Mr. Mackenzie: It is the logical way it happens.

Senator Sparrow: I will change the subject if there are no further questions. At the top paragraph of page 5 you mention a rather disturbing thing. You say:

"It would be a brave broadcaster indeed who undertook to promote an unpopular cause. The result is that we do the best we can".

Further down you say:

"Under the existing rules no radio station, large or small, will do anything that may jeopardize its licence."

That is a disturbing statement and it should be of concern, I suppose, to all of us. Perhaps you might explain that further, in the light of what you are not doing that you could perhaps do if there wasn't some fear that it wouldn't be considered in the public interest?

The Chairman: Perhaps a supplementary question before you answer that: Are you not a brave broadcaster?

Mr. Mackenzie: Right up to my eyebrows.

Mr. Rogers: I can only think of some examples. I can think of the example when a radio station in Vancouver, CJOR did not have its licence renewed because of some open line program. I heard the programming and I am the first to admit it was in extremely bad taste. It was something that certainly we would not broadcast over our station facilities. The fact of the matter is that they lost their licence and frankly whatever was said over that station is being said every night on a lot of stages at least in Toronto.

The Chairman: Is there not a difference between singing on the stage and singing on a radio station?

Mr. Rogers: I think perhaps there is but the fact of the matter is that the licence was not renewed. Nothing was done there. I am certainly not trying to uphold what they did. I think it was very bad broadcasting.

On the other hand in other forms of entertainment, if you will, it is being done every day on the stage and motion pictures and so on.

Frankly the situation is that we know we are being monitored all the time. We know our licences are going to be renewed every two years. We are collared down to account for what we have done. We must account if we have done anything that the regulatory body does not want us to do.

The Chairman: Mr. Rogers, excuse me. You say "you are monitored all the time." Do you mean that literally the CRTC is listening to your station all the time?

Mr. Rogers: Well, as I understand it...

The Chairman: Is there somebody sitting at Huntsville listening to your radio station?

Mr. Rogers: No, that is not true, but there are monitoring stations, as I understand it, which do air checks.

The Chairman: They do air checks?

Mr. Rogers: That is right.

The Chairman: But that is not monitoring all the time.

Mr. Rogers: They do have monitors going in every day or once a week and so on. I think what I am saying in this respect is that if we do not have a licence we have nothing and I think it is as simple as that.

The Chairman: Could you give us an example of something that you would like to do which would be good broadcasting in the interest of your community and which you feel inhibited from doing?

Mr. Mackenzie: Well, I think, Senator, that anybody here is aware that CAB has just finished its closed session and because they are closed and because we are members of it I am just trying to intimate what the newspapers are now saying or will be carrying.

I think that most of the people in our business have got a conscience. I believe they are mostly intelligent. Historically, radio has never had as realistic an editorial opinion as the newspapers and I think the reason for historically is because of the fact they are indeed utilizing a public frequency or channel and they are subject to—whether you like it or not—governmental scrutiny of one type or another. Mr. Rogers says it would be a brave broadcaster indeed who does. Well, there are a few of them. However, I believe that what we are really saying is that we would like to have a feeling of no Big Brother on our shoulders.

The Chairman: Well, you really have not answered the question. I would like still to have an example of something that you would like to do, something that you think would be good broadcasting and in the interests of your community, which you would like to do but which you feel inhibited from doing?

Let me offer an example. This question is not facetious. I want to know what you think. Do you think if your station aired regularly an announcement or if you editorialized clearly—saying this is an editorial comment—but suggesting that the Trudeau Government should be defeated and replaced by either the Stanfield Party or the New Democrats, let us say the Stanfield Government—do you think you would lose your licence?

Mr. Mackenzie: Well now, Senator, I am sure we would not lose our licence in that situation, nor would any other radio station in the country. I am simply pointing out to you historically that this sort of editorial approach has not been done to any effective degree across our whole country. Now, I have to leave to your imagination why not.

The newspapers are not under any form of governmental regulations such as we are. I think the time is coming when the broadcasting fraternity has got to stand up and say: "Look, we have a responsibility that goes with this authority"; but to answer your question, historically this is true.

Mr. Fortier: There are radio stations, Mr. Mackenzie, in the large cities—I cannot speak for Toronto but I can speak for Montreal—which editorialize on topics be they political or otherwise.

Mr. Mackenzie: You are thinking of the "Roberts' Report".

The Chairman: The "Roberts' Report" is a case in point.

Mr. Mackenzie: There is not enough of that and I think Mr. Roberts' point is that there is not enough of that in relation to the 100 per cent of our population.

Mr. Fortier: Do you think the reason for that, consciously or unconsciously, is the fact that Big Brother, the CRTC is looking over you?

Mr. Mackenzie: There is another reason, Mr. Fortier, and again we get back to our specific situation.

Number one is, as you have read in our brief, none of the gentlemen here with me or myself have gone in to one of our radio stations and said "Now, look do it this way. I believe the White Paper is no good or I believe it is good", whatever it might be. We have never done that.

Mr. Fortier: Except as far as "going to hell" is concerned.

Mr. Mackenzie: Well, that is different. But you see, we do not have that right of interference.

I happen to think that Mr. Leslie Roberts has got a great brain. Whether you agree or not does not matter, but he works in a major centre like Montreal.

Mr. Gordon Sinclair, a director of ours, whether you like him or not, has got something to say and he says it. But you take a look around, take the different areas in the Maritimes or the West...

The Chairman: You have used the example of Gordon Sinclair because he is a director of your station. I cannot think of any broadcaster in Canada who says consistently, more outrageous and controversial things. Sometimes I agree with him and sometimes I do not agree with him but he tells you what he thinks and so do Pierre Berton and Charles Templeton on their program "Dialogue" which I understand is syndicated across the country.

Please believe me, gentlemen, I am not trying to back you into a corner and I am not trying to embarrass you. I would be grateful if you could give me one example of—to quote the paper—an unpopular cause that you think would be (a) good broadcasting and (b) in the interests of your community—something you would really like to do that you feel you are afraid to do.

Mr. Mackenzie: I do not think, Senator, that we really have a specific in mind.

The Chairman: It is general?

Mr. Mackenzie: I believe Mr. Rogers was pointing out a historical situation which anybody, such as you, who has been in this industry long enough to know—it is a broad fact in history.

I believe now we are coming to a point where we should and are in the major areas, coming out with specifics of "I do" or "I do not like". I hope that we are capable certainly politically, in our little way to do our best to make sure that the Conservative, the Liberal and whoever, has equal time.

This is as far as we have gone but we should improve it.

Senator Sparrow: Have you had occasion to discuss this with your individual managers saying that "I do not think we should do this on this station because of this fear of Big Brother"?

Mr. Mackenzie: No sir. We have never ever, Senator Sparrow, gone along on these lines. Our efforts as top management, if this be the word, is simply to run the best thing we know with the available information that we know is correct, be it coming from Canadian Press or whatever, and present it in the best possible way and do our job as good and local citizens.

We have never instructed management—if you happened to be a Liberal and I a Conservative or whatever—along these lines.

Senator Sparrow: Well, I do not understand that statement in that paragraph. You still have not got through to me:

"Under the existing rules no radio station, large or small, will do anything that may jeopardize its licence."

I am assuming you are talking about yourselves as well as other radio stations, but you have given us, at least me, nothing to indicate that that has happened.

Mr. Mackenzie: I tried, sir, to point out the fact that this is an historical situation in relation to editorial comment that you have read over your lifetime in newspapers and it is true that way.

Senator Sparrow: It seems to me that this is a programming matter rather than a fear matter. We have made reference to broadcasters who do editorialize and, to people who are involved in broadcasting who have not lost their licences and who have not lost their jobs and apparently no one put undue influence on them for having done this. Now, is that not a good enough example?

Mr. Mackenzie: It is an example, Senator Sparrow, but it is an example of a small proportion in relation to the number of licences in the country.

If you pick out CFRB, as I have, and CHAD, which are excellent; and they have brainpower with them; right? To me, they are leaders of our industry. I think we need more of them, as Mr. Rogers has said, and I hate to repeat it for the fourth time but the fact is that historically it has not been done for the reasons I have tried to outline.

Senator Sparrow: Is there undue influence or are you influenced in your station then by the fear of losing government advertising?

Mr. Mackenzie: No.

Senator Sparrow: Are you unduly influenced by other advertisers?

Mr. Mackenzie: No sir. This has nothing to do with advertising.

Senator Sparrow: No, I am opening up a different field.

Mr. Mackenzie: No, the facts of the matter are simple. Number one, in Huntsville we have not got a Leslie Roberts. That is for openers. Number two, historically the industry itself is now just developing sound or intelligent editorial policies. Number three, the leadership has been taken by the big leaders of our community which are the stations we have described. Number four. It is our hope that in future we will (a) develop the intelligence, and (b) start editorializing in a full way.

We cannot take too many sides because of our communities, we are all things to all people.

Senator Smith: Mr. Chairman, just on the point, just before we move on to something little different. A little while ago you were on this same phase and you started to make some reference to the Maritime Province. Now, will you go back and say it again?

I think what you are trying to arrive at is that you could not expect the small station to provide the kind of talent, with the knowledge to editorialize, and make those programs meaningful. Is that what you meant?

Mr. Mackenzie: Well, you see, my point is looking at your history or geography because my father comes from Parrsboro and I have a built-in interest in it.

I think what I was talking about was the size of the community, whether ex-Toronto or ex-Montreal.

Senator Smith: I have the feeling, for example, that size does not necessarily mean the quality is not good enough for the big time.

I was delighted when I started to turn on a certain station in Ottawa a few years ago and I heard this little—Don Jamieson from a rather small city in Newfoundland, who was one of the best commentators on the air, in my opinion.

The Chairman: Finlay MacDonald from Halifax.

Senator Smith: ...And had a wonderful voice and so on.

There may be other Don Jamiesons.

Mr. Mackenzie: There are, sir. I am sure, as you are aware in our brief, we say our radio stations, small as they may be, we think they are good. We think they compare very favourably with any other local operation from the point of view of the weekly newspapers and so on.

They are also an excellent training ground for some of the people that you are discussing. We could list off one or two names you would know. Lloyd Robertson, who was on the air last night, is one of our Stratford alumni. This sort of thing, yes, but you do not find too many Don Jamiesons.

The Chairman: No, but in the brief you have not indicated that this is the reason you do not do these things; the fact that there are not too many Don Jamiesons. You have implied it is because Big Brother is watching you.

Mr. Mackenzie: That is right.

Mr. Fortier: May I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that Mr. Mackenzie put his finger on the real answer a few minutes ago. What their concern really is, I suggest, at the small broadcasting level, relatively speaking, is not your fear of losing a licence but rather your fear of losing an important segment of your audience.

Mr. Mackenzie: Or being unfair to them, Mr. Fortier.

Mr. Fortier: Being unfair to them in not telling them what they want to be told.

Mr. Mackenzie: On both sides of the question.

Mr. Fortier: Yes, exactly.

Mr. Mackenzie: I have also pointed out to you the fact that we do not have the Leslie Roberts type of analyst in Stratford or Woodstock and you can make an awful idiot of yourself if you go on the air with something that is improperly done.

Senator Sparrow: But that paragraph does not say that.

Mr. Fortier: Exactly.

Mr. Mackenzie: Perhaps it does not, sir, but I hope you know what we are thinking.

Mr. Rogers: I think it is as simple as this. Historically newspapers have editorized for hundreds of years. Canadian radio stations, until the last ten years, never have. There has got to be a reason for it, in my humble opinion.

Mr. Fortier: You go much further than that. This is a supplementary, Mr. Chairman. In your brief on page 7 and at the top of page 8, you speak of the number of investigations and the frequency of scrutinies.

You say:

"We think that to a degree the investigations and certainly the continuing scrutiny can only result in radio stations doing those things the various governmental bodies think the stations ought to do."

Now, I think you ought to be given a chance to explain what you mean here: that the governmental bodies are getting you to do the things that they wish to do.

This may be good in a certain area. This may be very bad—very bad if you mean they are doctoring your programs, of course.

Mr. Rogers: No, no. I did not mean that. I am sorry if that was the inference. I have more in mind, such things as the requirement as to commercial content, the requirement as to Canadian content.

Two of our radio stations are affiliated to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation so we carry 26½ hours of CBC programming a week whether we like it or not. These are all...

Mr. Fortier: You are not criticizing those policies, are you? I mean the maximum times to be devoted to commercials, the proposal with respect to Canadian music content. Are you criticizing those?

Mr. Mackenzie: I do not know whether you are but I am. We think these things have been propelled too quickly. We do not believe the theory is incorrect.

Mr. Fortier: Let us forget about the music content, although, if we have time I would like to get back to it.

Did the government regulations, emanating from the CRTC or emanating from the old BBG, by and large only serve to keep broadcasters in line, as you say at the end of your brief, or keeping them within certain boundaries or did they really prevent broadcasting from becoming "a vital industry", again quoting from your brief?

Mr. Rogers: May I answer one of those questions? The CRTC, so far, has taken the attitude that—I am subject to correction—we are only going to renew your licence for two years because we want to see how you are doing.

Mr. Fortier: Is that good or bad?

Mr. Mackenzie: It is pretty difficult.

Mr. Rogers: It is pretty difficult because...

Mr. Fortier: ...because of the sword which is hanging...

Mr. Mackenzie: No, because you need a big investment. If you owned a departmental store and you knew that everything you had was subject to going out the window in two years, and assuming you felt you were operating your departmental store as well as you knew how and it still could happen in this theory, this is worrisome.

Mr. Fortier: Of course, you know you are renting public property.

Mr. Mackenzie: We are renting it?

Mr. Fortier: In the broadcasting field.

Mr. Mackenzie: In effect then you can use that word, sir. I would suggest that it might be fairer to say that we are utilizing it to the benefit of the public.

Senator Sparrow: You want a longer term lease?

Mr. Mackenzie: Yes sir, within reason.

Mr. Rogers: If we break the law then all right, the CRTC or whatever the governmental body may be, should certainly have the power to call us down and warn us or cancel our licence or whatever; but what they are saying now, as I understand it, is that we are only going to renew your licence for two years because we want to see how you fellows are performing.

We know that and we are conscious of it. It makes financing extremely difficult. It cannot help in my personal view but have some effect on what you do with your station.

The Chairman: Senator Sparrow, are there other questions? We have another witness at 11:30. I have only one other question I would like to put to this witness.

Mr. Fortier: I have only one too.

Senator McElman: I have a supplementary.

The Chairman: We will have Senator McElman's supplementary and then Mr. Fortier and perhaps mine and then perhaps we can adjourn for a few minutes, until 11:30.

Senator McElman: I would like to get this matter of the sheer aspect of things down to a case in point.

I am sure, Mr. Mackenzie, you are familiar with Jack Fenety.

Mr. Mackenzie: I should say.

Senator McElman: The Immediate Past Vice-President of the CAB?

Mr. Mackenzie: A very old friend of mine.

Senator McElman: And an old timer, as you say. He is the top man at CFNB Fredericton, the oldest and strongest signal in the Maritimes.

I believe very recently, within the past few days, Jack was interviewed on his own station with respect to the proposals by the CRTC for content and so on. He was—I think I am being totally fair to him, I would not want to be unfair—we are friends—critical of the extreme of not only the proposed regulations but I think he backed up a bit...

Mr. Mackenzie: I beg your pardon?

Senator McElman: I think he backed up bit on the current regulations as well.

In any event he was extremely critical of the CRTC. Would this fall into the category of what you referred to as an unpopular?

cause and secondly, would you think that would in any sense jeopardize the likelihood of a renewal of licence?

Mr. Mackenzie: The last question, Senator, I just cannot answer because it is sort of a silly situation. The fact of the matter are that our whole industry at this particular point—and I have not had a chance to read this headline which says “The CRTC Hangman is over”, which the Senator has. Broadly speaking I think that our industry feels that it has done its very best as an industry. I believe it feels it has been subject to scrutiny that might promote a fear complex because of the nature of its business which indeed is a public franchise; and therefore with this feeling around your neck, you are really not playing hockey as well as you could if you did not have that approach.

I did not hear Jack's comments, but I imagine they were pretty straightforward. I am sure I would vote with him without even having heard it.

Senator McElman: To get back to my question, would you consider—let me say—the attack upon CRTC that that would possibly jeopardize one's chances for renewal of licence?

Mr. Mackenzie: That is a real dandy, is it not?

Senator McElman: It is meant to be.

Mr. Mackenzie: I think anything is possible. I will hide behind that one.

Senator McElman: There is a reference here to a fear.

Mr. Mackenzie: That is right.

Senator McElman: A very explicit and clear-cut reference. Would such a fear accompany such an attack?

Mr. Mackenzie: Would such a fear accompany such an attack?

Senator McElman: Such an attack upon the CRTC and their proposals?

Mr. Mackenzie: I think the Association as such, during its meeting this week will probably come out with the fact in an “United We Stand” approach.

Senator McElman: This is why I am asking; not in the ‘united’ situation, but I am asking in the case of an individual broadcaster?

Mr. Mackenzie: I believe he would have to be a man of great fortitude.

Senator McElman: In other words this is a courageous man of whom you are speaking who would, on his own, without the back-up of CAB would say “Here, I think this is bloody nonsense”.

Mr. Mackenzie: Exactment, Monsieur.

Senator McElman: This is the heart of what we have been talking about?

Mr. Mackenzie: Right.

The Chairman: Mr. Fortier?

Mr. Fortier: Given your history, Mr. Mackenzie, in this program producing and distributing company, in which you do not have an interest anymore, I find it surprising that you do not have some common programming in your stations. Why is that?

Mr. Mackenzie: I think I understand you but what do you mean exactly: Do you mean the same programming here?

Mr. Fortier: You do not have some syndicated programs in your group?

Mr. Mackenzie: Once again you get down to the business, sir, of local management, local situations and local appeals. Sometimes what is popular in Stratford is not as popular as it might be in, I will say, Orillia.

Mr. Fortier: I grant you that, but is that so all the way across the spectrum of programming?

Mr. Mackenzie: No. As a matter of fact we have unified policies on programming not specifically in relation to—we will say—this performance of a music format. It could be possible for a radio station at Huntsville, if it was surrounded by cowboys, to be playing T and C all the time.

The only policies that we have that are in decency and good business, as Mr. Rogers pointed out.

It is my pleasure to go up all the time to the radio station. We have one man at the present time who we think is good who is taking our over-all policies in relation to—in this case—entertainment presentations, and applying them here, there and you.

We have also found things that are bad that we throw out.

The Chairman: That is substantially the area that I wanted to discuss so I think perhaps we have dealt with that.

We could perhaps conclude by making a reference to page 7 of your brief where you say:

"No other industry is "investigated" as frequently..."

You have "investigated" in quotes.

I hope you will realize that this morning you have not been "investigated". You are here because any Committee such as this must direct at least part of its interests to local broadcasters and in particular local broadcasters in the smaller communities. You have things to say which are of value to us in our deliberations and we are grateful to you for coming.

I think we are mindful of the traditional broadcasting hostility to government boards, agencies and committees but as I said yesterday I think perhaps the broadcasters might be aggrieved if any reference to broadcasting was omitted from a study of this type which is looking at the over-all media spectrum in Canada.

So, gentlemen, thank you very much. We will adjourn. We will re-convene right at 11:30.

Thank you.

—Whereupon the Committee recessed until 11:30 a.m.—Upon resuming.

The Chairman: Honourable Senators, I call this session to order. The witness, whose brief we are going to receive now, is the Radio Futura Limited. Sitting on my immediate right is the Vice-President, Mr. Corey Thomson. It is my understanding that Mr. Thomson will introduce the other members of the delegation and perhaps you have an opening comment or two you may wish to make.

It has been suggested to me that questions be put through me to Mr. Thomson and Mr. Thomson will in turn refer them to some of his colleagues.

Mr. Corey Thomson, Vice-President, Radio Futura Limited: Thank you. Mr. Chairman and Senators, I think all of you probably have done your homework and probably have read the brief. In the essence of brevity, I know the brief is such it is probably a little innocuous, we stand prepared to discuss any one of the answers as given in the brief or any additional information that you would care to put to us in the form of questions. We will endeavour to answer any questions to the best of our ability and I think probably the best way is our answer to the first question. Are there any questions in connection with it, number 1?

Senator Smith: In connection with what?

Mr. Thomson: With our first answer.

The Chairman: I think we will just let the Senators fire away, if that is all right with you.

Mr. Thomson: That is much better.

The Chairman: I think it is. So, Senators, if you will put your questions to Mr. Thomson who in turn will hand them off.

Senator Smith: Mr. Chairman, I would like to just say there is some value perhaps in having a short brief like yours because you can be sure we have all read it in the first place. There are the bare bones. We would like to ask you a few questions to fill them out.

The first one I would like to get cleared up—you mentioned particularly the Montreal Station CKVL, and I want to come back to that in a minute—would you please tell me what is the present situation with regard to the other station in Vancouver, CKVN?

Mr. Thomson: Senator, with your permission, we have brought with us, at the end of the line, Mr. Ronald Carabine, who is the General Manager and Station Manager. We did not put too much reference to CKVN in there because I think, as you are quite aware it is in a fluid state at the present time. At the present time I would suggest the entire operation has not been finally crystallized. I would like to ask Mr. Carabine to answer your question for you.

Mr. Ronald Carabine, General Manager and Station Manager, CKVN: I did not quite understand your question.

Senator Smith: My question was: What is the operational status, for example, of the station or, is that a very good question for you to answer?

Mr. Carabine: You mean programme-wise?

The Chairman: I think before you answer that it might be useful, Mr. Thomson, if asked you to introduce the balance of the team you have here. We ought to do that first.

Mr. Thomson: Mr. Jack Tietolman, President, CKVL-AM and FM and CKVN. Mr. Marcel Provost who is the Programme Director CKVL-AM and FM. Mr. Ronald Carabine, who is General Manager of Radio Station CKVN in Vancouver.

The Chairman: Mr. Carabine, Senator Smith's question is simply: What is happening at CKVN.

Senator Smith: Let me add something to the question so you will understand what I am looking for. It is my information that you attempted some time ago to develop that station into what is known as a news station?

Mr. Carabine: That is right.

Senator Smith: In conformance with a technique which is presently known in some large cities in the United States?

Mr. Carabine: That is right.

Senator Smith: I am also led to believe that that was not considered to be a success. Now, are you operating this as a pop station today, as the original station perhaps used to be referred to?

Mr. Carabine: Not quite as the original station was referred to. I will give you more information perhaps on the total news concept that we had. We started this just over a year ago. As a matter of fact it continued approximately one year.

I might add that we had one of the largest total news stations in Canada and probably on the North American Continent.

The Chairman: Was that not the only total news station?

Mr. Carabine: The only total news station to my knowledge and as a private station was probably one of the largest in North America. We had our own representatives in Ottawa. In Victoria we covered the Parliamentary Sessions and so on and so forth.

The cost of running an all-news station is very much higher than running the regular disc-jockey or music or talk type of operation. We promoted it. We publicized it. We obtained the best personnel possible. We had more news services supplied to us than even any American station because we had the advantage of being able to subscribe to not only the Broadcast News Voice service but to practically all of the American news services.

We ran this for over a year. Not only was it not a success financially—which was not our main concern at the time—but rating-wise and public acceptance was gradually decreasing and decreasing to the point where it became economically impossible.

We supported the station I think due to the fact that Mr. Tietolman is a private broadcaster and had a firm belief in this. I do not think any other company, private or public, would have continued with the heavy losses that we sustained, if he had not been the radio man that he is. It was an unfortunate thing that—I think the City of Vancouver population probably was not large enough to support such an undertaking and regretfully we had to cancel the all news format.

Senator Smith: And then since that time, since you have had to give up the idea of making it a total news station, you are running what you refer to as a standard type of programming?

Mr. Carabine: At the time we are running a standard type of programming. We are aiming right now to the young adult approach, youth and young adults where we are featuring some programs at the moment. We hope to enlarge on these as we go along.

One of the features we have is a French School of the Air where we have two young high school students—it just started this past Sunday—who are in the process of learning French in an informative and an entertaining way, not just the classroom affair. It is just being prepared. We have production on that. We have a talented French-Canadian boy out there who is instructing these girls on how they would travel from Vancouver to Quebec, how they would get around the Province of Quebec and the City of Montreal, and learning French this way.

We have a garden show where we feature a well-known horticulturist on an open line format. As you know, Vancouver is a pretty big centre for gardening practically all year round. This is another feature that we have.

We also started this past Sunday at the Vancouver School Board with one of the directors of the School Board. We are running a program that is run entirely with the students. This is a sort of current event type of program where the high school and university students participate. We are going more for this type all along where there is actual participation by the public.

Senator Smith: Mr. Carabine, it seems to me it was a very interesting thing for you to try and the kind of substitution, you are now making for that, is also interesting to me particularly the example of the young high school couple engaging in a French program.

Mr. Carabine: Right.

Senator Smith: It is very interesting indeed and I wish more parts of the country would try out things of that nature.

Now, if you had to do it all over again, would you have postponed that decision with regard to the continuing of a total news station concept if you had known that the newspapers were not going to be in existence?

Mr. Carabine: No. As a matter of fact we terminated the news on March the 6th and the newspaper strike actually took place on February 15th. We did not cut our news entirely. We still run our half hour and our hourly regular newscasts.

It was just a matter, actually, of financing—the amount of money that was lost in that operation, the number of people that we had to employ to maintain it—the well was just about running dry, as far as I was concerned.

It is a seven market station and there is a good news service in that area there. I do not think that an all news station is a feasibility.

Senator Smith: Even in the absence of a daily newspaper?

Mr. Carabine: Even in the absence of a daily newspaper because many of the people I spoke to since we terminated it and long before we terminated it, were aware of it. They would listen to you as they would listen to any other radio station for 15 or 20 minutes to obtain the news and they were not too much interested after that in what you were doing.

In other words, they knew you were a news station and perhaps they would or would not listen because they were getting good news from other radio stations; except we gave it with definitely more news to give and definitely a better service.

The Chairman: I think, Mr. Thomson we would be most interested in Mr. Tietolman's comments on this.

Mr. Thomson: I was going to go into that, Senator, because I would like to go on the record as saying that I do not think there is anybody else in Canada that would have pioneered a concept like this which had been going in the United States for a little while.

The answer had to be obtained as to how effective this particular type of programming would be in Canada because it had never been tried here. Of course, you do not get the answers until you try but I think even after it had proven that it was not going to be an immediate success, that my associate Jack Tietolman should go down as one of the most courageous men in Canadian radio, to have continued this, Senator, in the face of deficits which amounted to $30,000 or $40,000 a month for a staff of 70 people.

I think that a tremendous amount of credit should be given to him. I mean I do not consider it a failure. I think that Jack Tietolman's pioneering of this and his taking of a loss of many hundreds of thousands of dollars and the way he kept tenaciously at it, is something that is one of the most creditable personal acts on behalf of a private broadcaster in Canada because this was a personal thing with Jack Tietolman. It was not a corporate thing. It was a personal thing with Jack Tietolman, those losses at that time.

I would like to ask, with that introduction, Jack Tietolman to comment.

The Chairman: A glowing introduction, I might say.

Mr. Thomson: Well, I have been with him a long time, Senator.

Mr. Jack Tietolman, President, Radio Futura Limited: Senators and ladies and gentlemen, I was going to say this. I am a stubborn individual and I tried to make a tree grow in Vancouver. You know, we did everything we possibly could. We had a little bit of sunshine. We had a little bit of smog and sometimes we didn't see the mountains for the trees and sometimes we didn't see the mountain for the sky but the real problem was—I would call it—the unappreciativeness of the public. This is something I cannot fight.

You know, I was saying to Ron Carabine we were fortunate that the ratings came out showing that we had no acceptance. If we had had acceptance we would probably have had to continue to lose because advertisers are very hard headed businessmen and today, would say, we have to bow down to the youth. They have a computer and you feed in the information to the computer and you are dead in a minute or you are alive. You know the awful truth immediately, whether you are going to get a budget or whether you are going to be left out.

What happened to us was something that probably happened to many people who did not know the strength or the opposition or what you have to fight to get through. As Ron Carabine mentioned, there is sufficient news in Vancouver and I agree.

One of the things that Ron mentioned to me, which hurt me immensely, was after we had discontinued this service, we did not have too many complaints. Now, you know very well, it is almost like when we had our FM station originally opened and the station went off the air, and I did not know about it because we had no complaints. Nobody called up and said the station was off the air. That gives you a rough idea of what I felt like finding the awful truth at the end. You added up your total. You say "Now we are off the air and we will have thousands of people complaining". It just did not happen.

As a matter of fact I sometimes I think people are not even complaining about the newspaper situation. You know, Vancouver is a playground city. A lot of people, I used to say, would go there to retire and die. Other people would go there to grow things. Other people would go out for boating and there are one hundred thousand boats.

I sometimes think in an area of this sort there are cities to live in and there are cities to do business in. When I went down to the Islands I thought this is an awfully nice place to live in and I would like to be in business but I found you couldn't make any money in the Islands. You can spend it.

This would be my opinion of Vancouver, even though it is a very progressive area. There are lumbering interests and mining interests that are very great. There are even broadcasting stations that are doing very well but being low man on the totem pole, we tried to develop a new concept in broadcasting. To our great regret, even to this day, it hurts me to come before you ladies and gentlemen to tell you about the news because we were very proud of the news.

In fact, we were told by people like Metro Media, American people like people from Westinghouse Broadcasting—we were told by outstanding people that this was a real good news operation. I even told some of the members of the CRTC at our last renewal in Vancouver that I thought that our news was not the best in Canada, it was the best in America. But after you write the poem, or you write the symphony, you maybe don't get recognition until after you are dead.

Senator Smith: Long live King CKVN.

The Chairman: May I ask you: Would an all news service be successful in Toronto or Montreal?

Mr. Tietolman: Montreal, I don't think so, because of the bilingual aspect. We know we are in a bilingual market.

In Toronto it might be successful but I would say this. We Canadians are too quiet and too much rested. We are not like the Americans, running here and there and looking for news.

I know some of you may tune in the 11:00 o'clock television program to get the news or you may pick up the morning paper and that is it. You don't get excited about it and you certainly do not have a radio playing on your desk wanting to know if somebody was shot down in Vietnam.

It is a matter of temperament. I have found that the temperament is faster in Montreal than Vancouver and it may be just as fast in Toronto, but the problem with a news station is strictly the people. Do they want news?

Now, you have an example. I have heard and read that some of the newspapers have been quoted as saying that business is down in Vancouver because of the newspaper strike. I have heard one of our confreres in broadcasting saying business is not down. I was telling some of our people we have many advertisers on our station that do not use newspapers to any great extent.

I say that every case is different. There are people who look to the newspapers. There are people who look to radio. There are people who look for news. There are people who want music.

It seems to me that most of the people look to radio for entertainment not as much for information—this may surprise you—unless they hear of some shocking thing happening or the Prime Minister has a special message or there'll be an increase in the budget or the income tax. Everybody will tune in at that particular moment but ten minutes later they would have been satisfied.

The Chairman: I do not want to prolong the discussion on newspapers but before you established the news format in Vancouver, did you engage in a period of research to decide whether or not it was a feasible idea?

Mr. Tietolman: Well, quite frankly I think the research would have cost as much as our experiment. You know, I often go along on research. Research is too few and too far apart. You know, like three hundred samples will decide the whole country. I say you need three million samples. It is not something like the back of your watch. If it is solid gold it is stamped 14 carat but if it was not stamped, you would have to take it into a lab. We could not afford to take it into the lab.

Senator Smith: I would like to ask Mr. Tietolman to give us the secret, if he has one, or at least give us a dissertation with as much enthusiasm as he did with his great experiment out West, in respect of his successful attempt to change the concept of broadcasting in Montreal; because my understanding is that you pioneered something which other people have told us is impossible to do in economic terms; that is to use a relatively large amount of Canadian talent and Canadian programming on your station in Montreal, CKVL.

Mr. Tietolman: Well, if I can answer this: I want to tell you that basically money is not everything.

Now, I cannot say this if I am a public company. If I were a public company I would have to answer to the shareholders. I think this would stifle my ambition in a way. I often said that you have to be prepared to lose your own money to make experiments. It is unwise and unfair to make experiments with other people's money. And there are many of those going around in various parts of this country, but the fact remains that I believe in the Canadian entity. I believe that we may be the little boys.

I was saying to some people the other day that unfortunately we in Canada have developed people like Oscar Peterson, who became a great star like Norman Brooks, who is south of the border today, a star. I could go on and mention other amateurs who became stars in the Metropolitan Opera. I could go on and on—in fact my memory does not suffice to tell you this but I was saying we have always been the farm team for the Americans and as soon as we develop this talent—the Americans are always on the lookout, whether it be from Canada, from Italy, from Britain—they take all the great talent and pay them three to four times as much as we can afford and we lose the talented people. I could reminisce and look back and say I started this person off or that person off.

The fact remains that this is where I got my kick, developing something from nothing, growing that tree. As a matter of fact we are doing it today. We are always on the lookout for new talent and we are proud but somehow or other we cannot seem to hold on to them because we are too close to the United States. I was suggesting we move a little further away but unfortunately this is not physically possible.

Mr. Thomson: Senator Smith, I think that you were asking Jack Tietolman to give a little success story on Jack Tietolman and I know that I would feel a little better if maybe I told you the success story of Jack Tietolman.

Senator Smith: Yes, I would be glad to have something. I would like to ask this question, by the way, in the framework of the protests, almost, that are now being made, that it is almost impossible financially to use Canadian talent. You do not even quarrel with what the CRTC proposes to make other stations do, as compulsory.

Mr. Thomson: Senator, I think if I understand the first part of your question, I think the answer you are trying to get is: Why was CKVL such a success? I think that is probably one of the questions.

Senator Smith: Yes.

Mr. Thomson: The other one was why did we use such a tremendous amount of Canadian talent that we have more Ohio State Awards and more international awards and things of that nature than all the other private radio stations in Canada put together; what started that policy; what ended that policy and why is it not continued?

Is that the context of your question?

Senator Smith: Yes.

Mr. Thomson: In the first place I do not believe that the story of CKVL can be repeated again today. There was a timing element here. When Jack Tietolman and his associates, who are here, started in a barn, the concept of a station, it was in 1944. I think at that particular time you will have to find out what French radio was like in the City of Montreal.

Number 1, there was absolutely no radio in the City of Montreal after 12:00 o'clock. Now the original concept of the Verdun radio station was to broadcast at the time when all the munition workers were working on the shifts and things of that nature. There was a complete and utter radio and music entertainment blackout there from 12:00 o'clock midnight. So the thought was maybe these people should be heard. Maybe a small radio station could serve them. Therefore the timing was excellent for CKVL. CKVL provided the services that the other stations were not providing, one of which only was the all night program. We were the first station to go all night.

The other one, with the exception of Canadian Marconi—let us develop a little bit further. Marconi had, of course, ulterior motives for their FM programming which at that time was transit radios, to put radios in buses and streetcars and things of that nature.

We did a bit of FM programming and the team that sparked that naturally—I think it probably is an exposé of Mr. Tietolman's genius in the programming field and the timing was right. There was a need for another French or bilingual radio station in the City of Montreal.

Today, you see, you always have to ask yourself the question before you go into an enterprise of the intricacy of a radio station: What can we provide that the other stations are not already providing in this area, because thereby lies the secret of your success.

Now, Mr. Tietolman took a tremendous percentage of the growth. A French radio station is not like an English radio station because on an English radio station you have a pool of talent syndicated out of the whole English-speaking continent to draw on.

In French-Canada—I will make this statement because I firmly believe it—there is more genuine talent in French-Canada than there is in English-Canada because of the fact that much of the French talent that is there has a linguistic barrier, a cultural barrier or maybe even an acceptance barrier and in the City of Montreal and surrounding districts of Montreal. It was just purely a question of having enough courage to tap this tremendous source of talent that is there.

You also make an allusion, Senator Smith, to Canadian content. Well now, if you are running a French station, a good French station, a private operator is running a percentage of Canadiana which far exceeds the present regulations or any future regulations unless they have got to be completely 100 per cent, which is ridiculous.

There was the time that Mr. Tietolman and Mr. Provost were running more live Canadian talent, non-staff programming, than the French network of the CBC. We kept this up for a long, long time. It was accepted. It was acceptable. Then things changed. Things changed in radio. You find, for instance, that maybe people do not want them anymore, maybe a competing station is playing the top 50. You go through phases, just like the difference in suits. My suit now is out-dated. My tie is out-dated. Senator Davey has the latest in a tie. These things change and listening habits change.

Mr. Fortier: You should have been here yesterday!

Mr. Thomson: I was here yesterday. Yes, I was. I want to tell you I regretted not having my dark glasses!!

But anyway to get back to your question, Senator. I think that Mr. Tietolman put it right on the nose when he said that it is awfully hard to understand the enthusiasm that he creates and the loyalty he creates in his associates because of his vision and because of his dedication.

I will leave these photographs with you. This is not only a combination of the awards CKVL has won down through the years but also some special honours that have been heaped upon Mr. Jack Tietolman in person. You have to know the man to understand the operation.

Senator Smith: Mr. Thomson, to what extent is that station a bilingual station?

Mr. Thomson: It is a bilingual station to this extent. We started out hour by hour. We started out one hour of English and one hour of French. We found to our dismay that the English-Canadian would tune out when he heard French but the French-Canadian would stay with us through the English but not completely and therefore it was a question of who you try to serve.

In other words, you try to serve the people that are listening to you or that want to listen to you. So as a result of the in-depth telephone surveys, which, of course, were available to us at that time on a month-to-month basis, we re-programmed. We found apparently more people were listening to us in French and less in English and if we were going to serve, we had better serve our audience, not the people that were not listening to us. So little by little throughout the years we have used larger and larger blocks of French and smaller and smaller blocks of English; until at the present time most of our English is public service—almost 100 per cent is public service.

But again you must realize that many times, not in our case, but an FM station could be considered a radio operator's conscience. He may not be completely happy with what he is playing on the AM operation so he plays fine music on his FM operation. Our FM operation is bilingual and so therefore we are able to discharge quite a number of our obligations or commitments—if you wish to call them obligations or commitments—with our FM operation.

One thing that may be rather interesting, as far as the English part of our FM operation is concerned, is that most of the other stations, going to the complex on the top of Mount Royal, are limited to a power which must not be greater than 50,000 watts. To give you another idea of Mr. Tietolman's vision, Mr. Tietolman spent almost $300,000 to put an antenna at the top of the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce building with one object in view, that of being able to have a powerful enough FM station, although the power was technically limited to 50,000 watts.

Now, with this power that we have, which is actually unique in North America—you do not climb up the outside of the building, your tower is big enough for a man to climb up inside—it allows us at the present time to run 307,000 watts of horizontal polarization, which reaches the average antenna, plus 307,000 watts of vertical polarization which gets into the whip antenna on the average car radio.

You see, Mr. Tietolman is not affected by any corporation stockholders' requirements. He can do what he wants. I think it is to his credit that what he has done with the gross revenues down through the years at CKVL, I think, is exemplary; and that is the story of CKVL.

Senator Smith: I would like to ask Mr. Tietolman a question. I suppose it is fair. In view of the extra expenses he permits his people to undertake in the field of programming and making sure the signal is an adequate signal and so on, do you still make a reasonable profit in that CKVL operation?

Mr. Tietolman: Let me answer that question, Senator Smith. It is the story of radio. We did terrific until television came in and gradually the eyes took over where the ears left off and a description of a beautiful girl by word of mouth is one thing but seeing her on television is another. That is it.

What has happened recently to the radio industry is that there has been a continuation of advertisers who have changed gods. Before, radio was their god. Today, a lot of advertisers are paying $700 an announcement on television where they probably think twice; and they say they have not got enough money to even fulfil their obligation for the television budget, they leave out some of the radio stations.

Now, profits are measured by this phenomena, the buying of advertising and the advertisers have no—what you call—faithfulness or loyalty to radio. He buys wherever he can and they buy only in numbers. Now, you asked a question. Our statements are available to you.

We have had, I might say, a little bit of a shocker, starting about three or four months ago where all of a sudden it seems all of the advertisers are dropping out of radio nationally. We had a drop of about 40 to 50 per cent in our national business in the last four or five months. Now, this is no secret.

I met somebody else the other day I think he was up before, one of the people from Telemedia. He told me the same thing. You see, these are things that we in the radio business—all of a sudden a lot of the boys are a little bit shocked by the new regulation because they were coasting easily. They were coasting easily. And money was coming in and all of a sudden we have run into what you might call a little bit of objectivity as the dollars are not as available as before and all of a sudden there are new laws and laws and restrictions.

I would say I, for one, have nothing against Canadiana. In fact I believe that is why we call this country Canada. I mentioned to the Chairman only yesterday that in order to solve these arguments we should buy the United States and all it "Canada South".

Senator Smith: Mr. Chairman, I think I will pass. Thank you very much.

The Chairman: Mr. Fortier?

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Tietolman, you said earlier, or Mr. Thomson put words in your mouth, if your company had been a public one your ambition would have been stifled?

Mr. Tietolman: I believe that.

Mr. Fortier: Does that statement apply to all television and radio broadcasting companies in Canada? In your opinion, that for the electronic mass media to become successful, it was necessary to have pioneers who had money to invest, money to lose or money to gain and that the concept of the public company in the broadcasting field is one which we can look at today but we could not look at yesterday?

Mr. Tietolman: Well, I will answer that simple question. All of us some time or another make an investment. We wish to look at the financial statements and if we buy, we are not particularly interested in the company. We buy to make a little money. We hope the White Paper will not take it away but it gives you an idea that basically there is a motive for profit.

When there is a motive for profit, you get into a kind of position where I have been, that personally I would have been the first one to be fired, if I headed up a public company, because maybe my enthusiasm runs away and I forget the profit motive. This happens very often. In fact it happens today. It just happened in Vancouver.

As a matter of fact The Chairman said "Did you make a survey?" You know very well that when you want to get out of a position, you make a survey and then you say: "Well, the people don't want it and so we do not go ahead." We do not even start.

Now, how much pioneering would have been done in Canada if everybody made a survey before they started? There would have been nothing done in Canada. We would still have the Indians running the country and I honestly believe that it takes what you might call enthusiastic fools, that is me, enthusiastic fools and believers in something that go right to the heart, or let us say with the love of accomplishment, to be able to be a pioneer?

It takes more than money. It takes more than blood. It takes everything.

Mr. Fortier: Given your Vancouver experience, and putting it behind you, if that is possible, for the next few minutes, do you still consider yourself a pioneer in the broadcasting field?

Mr. Tietolman: Oh yes. I would like to tell you, ladies and gentlemen, that one of the agency people called me up after there had been an article on the front page of Marketing saying we lost so much money and Jack Tietolman gave up the news. He said "Jack, do you wash your laundry in public?" I said "This is the only way to turn a defeat into a victory" because some of the agencies did not know we existed before they read this article.

Mr. Fortier: Now that they know you do exist...

Mr. Tietolman: We hope that they will have sympathetic feelings for us and try to let us recuperate a little.

Mr. Fortier: You have washed your laundry in public. Would you say in public what your intentions are with respect to the future? Where do you see the future of radio broadcasting in Canada?

Mr. Tietolman: I honestly see the future as a little bit divided. We have divisions. We have what we call satellites. Yesterday The Chairman mentioned absentee ownership. I said to The Chairman "What about satellites? Would the owner have to be up there with the satellite?"

We have satellites coming in. We have cable coming in. We have—God knows what. We might have mental telepathy.

Mr. Fortier: What is that going to do with radio?

Mr. Tietolman: There is a division. You know, in some countries, if you remember France before the stable governments, there were umpteen parties. We have a few in Canada, but as we get smarter everybody wants to be a king. Everybody has his own idea. Everybody would like to see his own favourite program.

It means roughly with the division of the cable, there will be more selectivity. We will have people wanting to watch how to save coins. Somebody else will want to watch programs on how to do your laundry. Other people, how to cook. Other people, how to be a good husband and so forth and so on.

I can foresee a time when you will get a practical education from just opening the cable. You will not have to go to school.

Mr. Fortier: Would you agree your comments apply mostly to television rather than radio?

Mr. Tietolman: I want to tell you: There is a division and yet there is no division. What I am trying to say is cables will carry sound programs as well and so will satellites, but I was going to say that if you people had any influence to reward me, all I want is a satellite transmission.

You know instead of worrying about one market, surely there are enough people that will like your programs across the country. You see, take the news element. We probably would have been in a good position on a satellite because there surely are enough people liking the news across the country without worrying about an individual market where we did not succeed.

In other words, we are in a small country, 22 million people. We have one-tenth of what you might call the action of the Americans and ten times the problems.

Mr. Fortier: You said earlier that you were hurt by television?

Mr. Tietolman: Oh yes.

Mr. Fortier: Have you been hurt by the advent of cable?

Mr. Tietolman: Not yet.

Mr. Fortier: In Montreal?

Mr. Tietolman: Not as yet. I would like to say that on cable in Montreal there is one FM station, which is not our FM station, and under the new regulations of the CRTC, they say every FM station will be on and that is a good thing. You have probably read the regulations.

I would like to say that a lot of decisions are being made without the public being asked about it. In other words, it is like writing laws in the Bible, nobody asked the public before the Bible was written. You know what I am trying to say, the laws are made and the public is asked to get used to the laws and regulations.

So far, I am fortunate. I have been thinking in the right direction but it took us 22 years before Commissions to tell them we needed Canadiana. If you live long enough and you have enough patience, you will see things happen.

Mr. Fortier: You were ahead of the CRTC?

Mr. Tietolman: Well, we were. I think the first time we were before the Aird Commission, as a matter of fact, I was told by some other broadcasters I was crazy, sinking all this money into Canadiana and there would be no thankfulness. As a matter of fact one fellow said "you will be crucified". I said I was born on Christmas and I hope I will not be.

Mr. Fortier: If you had started a station, Mr. Tietolman, in any other city but Metropolitan Montreal, Verdun, would you have sought to put the same accent on Canadiana as you have done with such success in Montreal?

Mr. Tietolman: I would. As a matter of fact I will tell you. You will remember perhaps that one of the people we had working for us was the late Billy Munro who wrote "When My Baby Smiles At Me", and there was a boy by the name of Norman Brooks who did not even speak French. We were more or less a French station. And Brooks used to sing like Al Jolson; he had a voice just like Al Jolson. We actually trained him to sing in French. He didn't understand a word. He was just like anybody else, you gave him a copy of a French song we had in English with a translation.

I want to tell you, the people who are happy are those who do what they like to do. You know, I think you Senators are happy being Senators. I like what I am doing. I want to tell you I look forward to going to work and I do not consider it an effort. I consider it a pleasure. Some of the people play hockey, play radio and that is it.

Mr. Fortier: May I suggest to you that what you have just said very eloquently amounts to criticism of some of your fellow broadcasters in Canada. Is that correct?

Mr. Tietolman: No, I do not criticize. I want to tell you this. You know, as I have repeated often, many people are in positions where they cannot help themselves. In some areas there is not sufficient talent. In other areas talent becomes very independent. I was telling a story to the boys this morning. I saw you know Wayne and Shuster. They are wonderful Canadian talent. Now, I do not know exactly the cost but let us say they were built up by Canada. After they are built up they are offered a tremendous amount of money and they have an agent after this and the agent is getting paid an awful lot of money for American programs.

Then Canada wants to bring her sons and daughters back on the air. So then they call the agent and the agent says "That will cost $20,000 or something like this"; so I want to say this to you: You know, a lot of people not realize that after you have built them up, there is no thankfulness. I have seen it. Mind you, I think all you people are little children, just like Jesus said, you know, but nevertheless there is a lot of truth in that.

What are we building? We are a farm team for the Americans and if we do not realize it, the Americans do. As a matter of fact, they are looking for resources in materials and in talent and Canada is just the farm team so if you are a good hockey player, they will buy you down south. If you are a good baseball player, down south. There are very few people like Jack Tietolman who would not move down south for a good deal because "I like it in Canada". There are very few. I would say about 2 per cent.

The Chairman: What can we do about it?

Mr. Tietolman: There is only one remedy. Either they buy us or we buy them, I would say, to be quite frank about it. I like our temperament, our way of life. I like the idea that we have no axe to grind in the international world. I like being a Canadian.

Mr. Fortier: You have made it big being a Canadian.

Mr. Tietolman: That is right.

Mr. Fortier: With CKVL. I bear in mind your words and I repeat them proudly that maybe there is more talent in French Canada than in English Canada.

Mr. Tietolman: Yes, there is.

Mr. Fortier: But still all things are relevant. Why is it that there have not been broadcasters like you in English Canada who have tapped local talent and made it big by using Canadian talent.

Mr. Tietolman: I want to correct that impression. There have been broadcasters—I do not know all of them—I knew the late Ken Soble. He did a lot of this work. He was in Hamilton and Toronto. No, do not let us say that. There are very good broadcasters today, very fine broadcasters.

Mr. Fortier: By and large the people who said you were stupid 15 years ago, today are screaming blue murder at the CRTC proposals in saying "We cannot do it"?

Mr. Tietolman: Well, I want to correct one little thing. You see, this is a little bit one sided, ladies and gentlemen. You see, to bring a law in—if you said to me I have got to use more bodies and there are no bodies, this is unfair. This is like the story of the Israelites in Egypt when they had to find the straw to make the bricks.

Do you know what I am trying to say? I think the right way would be for you ladies and gentlemen to recommend a subsidy of $3,000 for each long playing record so that private industry could go into records without the fear of losing their shirts and develop a Canadian entity. There should be what we may call a music jury that could recommend which records or which songs are worthy of playing on the station.

Now, to say that something is Canadian, is not sufficient. We Canadians are more fussy than the Americans—I think so—so therefore I do not even accept all the American talent and programming. I am a very fussy individual. Why would I accept all the Canadian talents and programming? Now, we used to run auditions and may run through 100 people to get one talent. Now, that is a good average, I want you to know. We have 22,000,000 people and that gives you an idea there is still a lot of talent but the fact remains, in order to make the CRTC regulations work, we have got to supply it or have it available.

Now, I know that there has been a subsidy for Canadian films, and I might say, again we have not been too successful from a Canadian point of view, although, recently, there have been some French Canadian films that have been a very huge success. I think one of them that spent $80,000 will probably make a million dollars and this is very, very rewarding. But I think the time will come shortly. I will repeat what I said again, when we develop the records and good talent, do not think that they are going to stay with us.

You know what will happen? It will not take long. They will get a copy of our records and those boys or girls will get an offer and they will disappear from the Canadian scene so fast, in a few years, we will not remember they were Canadian and this is the unfortunate element. It is purely money.

The Chairman said "What do we do?". I think we should raise the standard of living higher than the Americans and attract Americans. You know, when we pay more interest, we get the money; when we pay less, they get the money.

The Chairman: Mr. Carabine and Mr. Thomson have both indicated they would like to comment on that.

Mr. Carabine: I think perhaps I can give you some information on your question as to why Canadian talent is not used in English markets. Speaking from the very short time that I have lived in Vancouver, which is just under two years...

Mr. Fortier: You were a Montrealer?

Mr. Carabine: I was previously in Montreal. I have learned quite a bit from Mr. Tietolman's way of doing things and his interest in radio. We tried to follow the same philosophy out there to some extent.

One of these, of course, was to develop local talent. No other station has been doing it out there for some time from what I could gather when I enquired. Therefore, we put on a half hour live talent show every night. This is a very expensive proposition. The unfortunate part was we did not get enough talent turning out to even keep that program going. We had to fill in with the orchestra that was there to accompany any singer or musician.

Now, here is a market that has a lot of talent and we publicized it. We gave prizes to every contestant. The Grand Prize was a one year guaranteed recording contract from Polydor Records Canada Ltd. with distribution in the States, Canada and Europe. We did not get enough talent to support it. Again the same thing with the younger children's Saturday Morning Talent Show," not enough talent turned out.

Mr. Fortier: So what is the answer in Vancouver?

Mr. Carabine: I think the answer in Vancouver is that eventually there would have to be a joint effort, on the part of all broadcasters, to combine, to run one show to get them to turn out. I do not know how to get people to come out to something that they say they want, because if they do not want to participate themselves, what are you going to do?

Mr. Fortier: Is this not one of these things that indirectly the CRTC is trying to do with these proposals? They are trying to do what you have sought to do unsuccessfully. They are trying to force more radio stations in Canada to do this sort of thing and maybe Canadian talent will wake up to the fact that by gosh, there is a market for my talent.

Mr. Carabine: Well, I do not think I am qualified to say what the Canadian Radio Television Commission is trying to do.

Mr. Thomson: I would like to comment on that. I think, Mr. Fortier you are asking a question that we can only offer our opinions on.

Mr. Fortier: That is why you are here.

Mr. Thomson: Exactly—our opinions. I think if you ask us our opinions on why can the same pattern not be applied in English Canada as applied in French Canada, I think my first observation was extremely relevant; that English talent has the whole Continent whereas French talent has a tendency to be in a cell, which is a French-speaking world, where French-speaking acceptance of their end product is in one fairly small localized place, as opposed to the country.

Also I wonder if you realize the complete ramifications of trying to get Canadian talent out. This is an old story over our history which goes back almost 25 years. It is the problem of getting them out. That is only one problem. We say, "Look, we want to get you out. We want to get you exposed. We want to use you." As amateurs you are supposed maybe, whether above the table or below the table, to pay their so-called expenses. Even that is not always sufficient incentive to get them out.

There is another problem also. I think that you probably realize that the media are very heavily unionized. In other words, they are unionized by the Federation of Musicians and there you have the situation where an amateur is allowed for a certain length of time and after that he must become a professional. Now, I am not saying whether that is good or bad. I am just simply telling you the problem you are up against if you want to continue exposing Canadian talent on an amateur basis of some kind.

Now, if we are willing to admit that there has to be some slight monetary consideration for somebody—I mean the man with a piccolo, he can stick it in his pocket and come down to the station; but what about the man with a big string bass, when he comes down. It is as simple as that. Now, he is allowed a certain number of performances on a subsidized or an expenses-paid amateur basis. This is right where you come into the situation—this man is going to play as an amateur or going to play as a non-member of the union concerned, then you come up against a completely different problem.

Let us go into the recording business as such—the physical end of the recording busness. I know because I happen to hold personally through one of my companies long before—this dates back to 1954—a recording licence. I wonder if you have any idea of the cost that is involved in producing a tape, let us call it, for an eventual recording? It is fantastic. You get into pension funds for musicians. You get into for so much, you can put it on one time. For the next time, you can put it on for a year. Then the question of what might be called universal rights comes in. Then after that, the cost of most of the young talent. I am taking a group, for example. They cannot read music. They can play music but they cannot read it.

Then you come to the other question which I think is a very valid question, Mr. Fortier, to answer a question with a question. What is Canadiana as far as music is concerned? What is Canadiana? I have fought this thing down through Senate Committees and before the old Boards and everything else like that. What the devil is Canadiana? What are we looking for in Canadiana?

The only United States music, which you could call United States, as opposed to the whole English world, is probably Dixieland. Now, what is the only Canadian music; even today, what is it? It is old French-Canadian songs personified by "Alouette" that the Voyageurs used to keep their paddles going in unison.

Mr. Fortier: We said yesterday we are speaking more of Canadian performers rather than Canadian music.

Mr. Thomson: Yes. That is my next development, Canadian performers. Now, what is it we are looking for? Are we looking for a Canadian concept, typically Canadian music, a typically Canadian dish of some kind or are we looking to develop Canadian talent? Or are we going to insist that that Canadian talent play exclusively Canadian source music?

For instance, let us take an FM station, which is going to suffer tremendously from this. Let us take any great opera that you want. What is the difference if it is played by the Berlin Philharmonic or if it is played by the St. Louis Orchestra or must it be played by the Toronto Symphony Orchestra or the Montreal Symphony Orchestra or another Canadian orchestra? Because the differences between the renditions, the end product of these ten orchestras that are available—it takes certainly a dilettante to distinguish between them. So what are we looking for?

The Chairman: If that is the case, what is wrong with having it played by the Toronto Symphony orchestra then?

Mr. Thomson: They do not record.

The Chairman: Well, why should they not start recording?

Mr. Thomson: It is a question of costs.

The Chairman: Well, you have been putting a lot of questions to Mr. Fortier which have been rhetorical. Let me put the question back to you.

Mr. Thomson: Yes.

The Chairman: Mr. Tietolman a few minutes ago said we are faced with one of two alternatives. He was not being altogether facetious.

Mr. Thomson: No.

The Chairman: One alternative is that the United States buys us and he mentioned a second alternative which was that we buy the United States. He suggested that we buy them and call it Canada South. He knows very well that is an impractical suggestion.

Therefore am I to conclude from what he said and from what you say that the only thing that either of you foresee for this country is to become the 51st member of the United States?

Mr. Thomson: No, I do not agree with that at all.

The Chairman: Well, what would you do?

Mr. Thomson: What would I do? Well, I think I would do pretty well what I think most dedicated broadcasters—I speak of the industry—are trying to do right now. I think many of us are very pro-Canadian. I think in our particular case, and I think I can probably speak for the rest of them, we have demonstrated the fact that we are extremely pro-Canadian but it is the old story, Senator Davey, of General Motors. They make mould which costs $100,000 to make one fender for an automobile. Let us say that they decide they are going to produce a thousand fenders for Canadian consumption only. All right. Then they cost $100 per fender.

If, by the same token, that same fender price is the same in the United States and they turn out a million fenders, then the cost, of course, becomes considerably less.

The same thing is true with a recording. I wonder if you have any idea—and I suggest this probably may be a very interesting comparison. Let us take a specific example. What would it cost to make one recording of the Montreal Symphony Orchestra playing Stravinsky and where would the market be?

The Chairman: Mr. Thomson, again you are posing problems and I agree they are enormous.

Mr. Thomson: They are.

The Chairman: But we are more interested in solutions. What are the solutions?

Mr. Thomson: In my considered judgment I think there is a solution to giving the amount of Canadiana that the public should be exposed to and I believe—I advanced this before the CAB. Let us make it very ridiculous. If you gear it to time only, you could get a piano player playing 20 hours a week; but if you geared it to a combination maybe of time plus a certain amount of the gross, plus a subsidy, then I think you get a far better type of thing than you are going to get if you just gear it to playing a certain percentage of your time. I do not think it is a question of time; I think it is a question of quality. In other words if a man was committed with subsidies, etcetera, to spend an amount, let us say $50,000, maybe we would have a symphony orchestra playing.

The Chairman: Mr. Crépault is reported as having said at the CAB meeting—and I was interested to hear this morning that Norris Mackenzie said it was a closed meeting...

Mr. Thomson: Yes.

The Chairman: Therefore I do not know whether this statement is correct. Mr. Crépault is quoted as saying at the meeting and I quote him:

"One superb and masterful 90 minute production a week will do more for Canada and Canadian identity."

This is in a column written by Patrick Scott of the Toronto Star and then he observed—and I would like you to comment on it...

"Ninety minutes of anything good is better than 60 hours of anything bad—but where have all those "superb and masterful" 90 minute productions been hiding up till now?"

The broadcasters have had several generations to show what they can do without regulations, and it is precisely because they have shown so little that the regulations are here".

Would you comment on that?

Mr. Thomson: I would not like to comment on it because in the first place I do not believe it. I think one of the things that will probably evolve from the broadcasters themselves is the fact—and I think this is extremely interesting—that in the past we have been in a position where the print media have not always expressed our feelings nor the situation exactly factually. They take a very small extract from something—for example they may go out from here and you may read in the paper that Jack Tietolman suggests Canada buy the United States. You know what I mean?

So, we are taking steps right now and I am going to tell you—and this has been advanced very vigorously—that I think it is about time we used our own media on a national basis to express ourselves, by our own reporters, by our own radio oriented and television oriented use, because of something like that, which I suggest is not the fact. That is one man's opinion and it is the opinion, remember, Senator, of one man who is paid and who represents one of our greatest medium of competition, the newspapers.

I do not think that in all honesty if I were a city editor—and this has been the story of radio since 1919—if it is a competing medium I do not expect too much to be said that is good for a competitor. And not always factual.

I want to go on record. I will not buy the story.

The Chairman: Mr. Tietolman, do you want to comment on this?

Mr. Tietolman: I was going to say, and this is no reference, this was said and many people have heard it. "Fools rush in where angels fear to tread". This gives you a rough idea. The Bible said that King Salomon said this. He said "Don't judge the other man until you are in his actual position where you can appreciate his problems".

I say if we had less critics and more people who would pioneer new ideas and development—in other words, let us talk less and more. Let us get people—instead of writing articles, let them go out and write masterpieces.

pieces, books, documents, plays. And we will put them on.

Mr. Thomson: That is right.

Mr. Fortier: Would you like to apply that reasoning to the CRTC?

Mr. Tietolman: In which way?

Mr. Fortier: Let us talk less and do more?

Mr. Tietolman: Well, I want to say that government bodies too may be in the same spot; but nevertheless I would say that when the government bodies are looking for information—and I may say in the case of the CRTC—it has not been what you would call an easy job.

Canadiana is a long, long whisper into the wilderness, you know. I do hope Canadiana will develop. I think there are many problems and instead of asking you gentlemen questions I will say this. I just want to leave one thought with you. We subsidize certain of our exports. We subsidize certain of our universities so let us subsidize our talent. Let us get a very constructive sort of meeting out of this meeting.

I would like to see you people recommend a $3,000 subsidy to anything that would appeal to the government. In other words, not to every long play record because somebody may have a foolish idea but there should be a committee and that money should be available. And I do not mean one record, I mean 10,000 long play records a year.

If you want to make Canadiana popular, make it available. If you want me to eat any favourite food, you have to make it available. If you want me to look at Canadian pictures, you have to have Canadian pictures and that's the story in a nutshell.

There is your answer. There is your simple answer. Instead of just asking a lot of questions you can get more results by putting up the money on the line.

Mr. Fortier: Indeed, these are good answers but unfortunately come from a man who has proved that the questions can be answered in the affirmative.

Mr. Thomson: In French-Canada.

Mr. Tietolman: If I may say this to you. You know, we have had private institutions, private universities and private this and private that. Until the government really wants to face the fact this becomes a national problem and not a local problem. You cannot depend on advertisers who may not want to buy a medium and then who will come to the station and say "Look, why do you not put out the record at your own cost?"

My dear friends, I am willing to change jobs. I am willing to take the revenue from the government and let them have the station.

I would say this in all honesty. That one problem is very deep. If I had more money to play with, if I had more money to develop, you would have more Canadiana.

I think the time is arriving in order to help the CRTC and to offset all the criticism, give us the records or give us the tools and we will finish the job. "V for victory!!!" How is that?

The Chairman: Let me put the same question I put a minute ago to Mr. Thomson. You seem to despair that this country has any independent future, independent of the United States?

Mr. Tietolman: I say this in all honesty. We are going about it the wrong way. You know, nobody is going to pay for anything they get free unless somebody supplies it. In other words, you have got an established market. You have got the New York Stock Exchange. You know very well in order for us to develop a Canadian entity and financing, we have to develop our own Stock Exchange. We have to develop our own markets.

The same thing happens with talent. We have to develop a market for that talent which does not exist because right here, you bring Americans down and you pay them umpteen dollars and they walk out with the money. Then you are telling us about Canadian records. Are you kidding or something?

The Chairman: Is this a suggestion you have made before?

Mr. Tietolman: Oh, sure.

The Chairman: When did you first make this suggestion?

Mr. Tietolman: Oh, about 20 years ago.

The Chairman: No one has listened to you?

Mr. Tietolman: I want to tell you, as I said before, some of the great operas and some of the great works were not recognized until their creators had passed on and then they looked at them. I hope I live a little bit longer. I hope I see the realization that Canada is just not an Indian name.

Let us be honest. You see the problem—on all these Committees you hear a lot of stories. I hope with this suggestion, we can hit the jackpot. We want money. We want the money to develop Canadiana. We think we deserve it. And if Canada is to be an entity it, is not enough, you know, to go out and pay farmers for not growing wheat. It is more important to grow talent.

The Chairman: Do you really believe what you said a few minutes ago that only 2 per cent of Canadians care about Canada retaining its identity?

Mr. Tietolman: No, I did not say that.

The Chairman: I thought you did.

Mr. Tietolman: No, I did not say that. I would say this that the listener is very critical; that the listener may not accept all the American programs, will not accept all the American records, will not accept all the American books or periodicals.

The individual is independent. I said this to one fellow today. He is a separatist individual. He is separate unto himself. He likes what he likes. He hates what he hates and that is it; so therefore you cannot force your will on anyone. You know, it is hard enough to lead a horse to water but really to lead a human being to water, it is even worse. You cannot force people to accept your thinking. You have got to make it available and as the gentle rain falls down and penetrates, it is better than the bucket of water where you have to duck.

The Chairman: That may be a good point to cut off the questioning. I have only one other question I would like to put to you.

This Committee, Mr. Tietolman, I am sure you know, is interested in the broad media spectrum.

As such, because you are a pioneer communicator in this country, because you have been interested in communications for a long time and have been around, I would like to put a question to you. I may say we put the reverse question to a great many newspaper publishers. We have asked them to discuss your industry. I would like to know what you think about newspapers in Canada generally? Perhaps you may wish to confine your remarks to Montreal. If you wish to generalize—what do you think of the newspapers in this country?

Mr. Tietolman: Well, I think we have some very good newspapers. I really do. I would like to say that I always say, "To be a good newspaper it has to be constructive." The articles I pay more attention to are constructive articles and not merely what you call people throwing stones at people.

I have always felt that anybody who criticizes someone else should be ready to be criticized himself or examined under a microscope. In other words, before a person opens his mouth to say something about somebody else, he should be ready to be examined personally.

In other words, "Do unto others as you would want others to do unto you," and if you want others to do well, give them constructive criticism and advice and give them a chance to develop.

You ask me about newspapers? I think we have some very good newspapers. The only thing is, I like to see the news reported. We at CKVL or CKVN do not cut out any news. We do not hide any news. We do not distort any news. We give it as it is given to us. We do not control the news agency, unfortunately, but we give the news as it is, without any opinions on news. We have editorials. That is a different thing, but the news is given clearly and concisely, for which I originally used to admire Time Magazine—just the facts, no comment on it.

Mr. Fortier: But you do editorialize?

Mr. Tietolman: Well, we have editorials. Actually, I want to say it is a necessary evil to editorialize but I don't editorialize. We have editors.

Mr. Fortier: But does the station editorialize as such, or do you have individuals?

Mr. Tietolman: We have individuals who are qualified to editorialize and we have no axe to grind.

I want to say to you that I read recently some articles in the paper where people were pro and con and on examination they were found to own shares in the pro and not own shares in the con. In other words, as I said again and as my confrere, our Vice-President Mr. Thomson said, you have to examine where it comes from. You know, the word God is the word of God but individuals are not angels.

Mr. Fortier: Do you have any intentions, Mr. Tietolman, of acquiring other radio stations in Canada?

Mr. Tietolman: Well, I will tell you, from our past experience I am a little bit leery. I would like to say—I said one time to the Commission that I would like to get into the picture end, you know, picture tubes.

Mr. Fortier: Yes, I am with you.

Mr. Tietolman: Because you know, I have heard it said that "a television station is a licence to print money". You see, this is where the mistake occurs. You know, a responsible broadcaster does not consider it a licence to print money. They consider it a licence of great responsibility. It is like becoming President of a Committee. It is a responsibility you cannot take too lightly. I say that every individual licensee—we have some very good people among the radio and television operators. I certainly may not agree with every one but I would say that our industry, comparable to other industries, including newspapers, are ahead of all the other industries.

We have got the best brains and the most talented people in our industry.

Mr. Fortier: Would you like to get into the print picture.

Mr. Tietolman: I was in the print picture too. I used to own a newspaper Radio-Monde. We were the pioneer in a radio paper, that is right. I probably would do a good job because I think I have got a little ink in my veins too. You see, I like news, big news and a newspaper prints news.

You know, what a newspaper is? It is a mirror, just like the news—it is a mirror of what is happening.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortier: What happened to Radio-Monde?

Mr. Tietolman: Radio-Monde was sold, Mr. Fortier. And you know, personally, I like all newspapers; I like television.

[Text]

We only have one life and I say make something of it and that is why as I look back, I say to myself I am not sorry for my losses. It is a good thing to be a good loser, but you always have to learn. Like the fellow who had no experience and a million dollars and then he had no money and he had a lot of experience. This is happening to us.

The Chairman: Perhaps on that note I can terminate this hearing and in so doing perhaps I could address my remarks to you, Mr. Thomson, because you gave the opening statement. We are grateful to have had your organization before the Committee because yours is one of the pioneer broadcasting organizations in the country and of course, we are particularly grateful that you brought Mr. Tietolman or allowed him to come.

We are thankful to him but I think Mr. Tietolman will be the first person to admit that the organization has been built so well because it has been a team effort and so we are grateful that you have brought the other people with you.

Mr. Tietolman, unlike a great many pioneers you continue innovation and experiment and we hope you always will. We have been thankful that you have found the time to come. I think you were here earlier this morning when I said we are as interested in finding out the success of your own station, as we are in having your views on the over-all media spectrum.

I think a study like this, and I know Mr. Tietolman would agree, has to include an analysis...

Mr. Thomson: Would you like my analysis of what I think is wrong with the media?

The Chairman: By all means.

Mr. Thomson: I think this may come as a bit of a shock to a lot of people. You know, we look sometimes at the generations below us and we say to ourselves "What is the matter with these kids?" Sometimes we are a little bit concerned about their attitudes and we sometimes try very hard to understand them across this gap. And what exactly is the gap? I think the answer to it is that they understand us probably a lot better than we understand them.

I think that one of the troubles is that in the news—I have already expressed this view, by the way, at one of the forums—is that when we give the news of rebellion, of riots and of demonstrations and of things of that nature, the media—and I am talking generally, probably with the exception of billboards—the media generally are giving exposure to the end result, and possibly the results of its own activities.

The greatest rebellions in history, I think, can be resolved down to pretty well dissatisfaction where the population growth has gotten bigger than the valley and they have to move because there is not enough food—tyranny, despotism or whatever it is; but then there is another great cause and that is the basic cause today—there are others—I mean they look at it and they say “Well, you are not sincere.” They look at it and say “You are hypocritical”. They say “You have false values”. They will look at even the media and say “It is not truthful. What do you think we are? Do you think we are crazy?”

We may put on a commercial to preserve teeth and the girl obviously is wearing a denture with an X marked on it. That is not completely honest advertising.

Then there is the question of pronunciation when a great Canadian chocolate company comes along and says this chocolate bar has maraschino cherries in it. I am a little concerned because I happen to know “Maraschino” has been pronounced incorrectly and I am a little bit concerned about it.

But I think that one of the troubles today is the fact of inequality. I think the exposure of inequality today by the media is just a little more responsible for some of the unrest and dissatisfaction than we might be willing to admit.

I think that when there are so many poor people that the exposure, in living colour yet, of steaks being sliced and the world's goods coming in and the freezers and the things of that nature, the younger generation says “What is the matter with a system which will not allow us to have that which is being exposed to us?”—the tremendous exposure of capital goods, the tremendous exposure of a life which is no reflection or in no way comparable to the life that they particularly are leading, the idealization of many things, the fallacy of it sometimes and the hypocrisy of it sometimes.

I sometimes say to myself, should the media generally explore the other facet of it? In other words, not necessarily Madame Jones with her diamonds and pearls at the St. Andrew's Ball but what about Mrs. average John Jones, and so forth and so on; are we paying for the exposure of inequality in the media generally without a sufficient amount of exposure of the other side of life?

Now, I am going to leave you with just one thing that happened while I was down in Florida about two months ago. I think Miami Beach probably represents the epitome of what might be called gracious living. People from all over North America go down there and pay fabulous amounts of money to sit out in the sun and do nothing but complain about the food and their $150 a day suites.

A television station had enough courage to get out into the shadow of these big hotels and it singled out three or four families that were living in the most abject poverty that you ever saw in your life, in the shadows of Miami Beach residents. They took a picture of this very little old man sleeping in bags, the window with things stuck in it, the lighting fixtures hanging from the wall so you got a shot of one 25-watt bulb there—what he was eating—the fact he had to get up early in the morning and went around and prowled around among the garbage cans of the big hotels in order to keep himself going. This exposure was given and what was the result? My, it was just as if you dropped a bomb. The mayor was down. The governor was down. Everybody was down. How could this exist? How could this exist?

Now, there was a television station that had given exposure, whether they wanted to or whether they did not want to, of only one fact of life, the inequalities; the inequalities of the levelling out had never been given the proper amount of exposure.

I would suggest that the media—not the medium—but the media have not done enough to alert the Canadian man, the Canadian dollar, the Canadian consciousness to the inequalities that exist in our present society. It is a challenge to the media right now—to the media, all of them, to do something about the inequalities that exist right here.

We hear about Canadiana and giving work to artists. I think an in-depth exposure of exactly what is going on here in our own country is the responsibility of all the media; and if they do that right now, they will be accomplishing—let us almost call it—one of their purposes and in my considered judgment one of their responsibilities.

The Chairman: Thank you very much, Mr. Thomson, for this very compelling statement. We are grateful to have it on the record.

This session will now be adjourned. May I say to the Senators—I would again thank you gentlemen for coming—we are meeting at 2:30 to receive the brief from Standard Broadcasting.

Mr. Tietolman: May I say, ladies and gentlemen of the Senate, I want to thank you very much for your nice reception and I do hope that my suggestions are not just put into the libraries. I saw a lot of the libraries. They have a lot of these buildings where they put all the books in, you know. I hope they go on the forefront and I do hope to see the realization of the $3,000 per long play record.

I want to leave this thought with you before I go. We have already started to do Canadian dubbing on films. This is a little thing we are going into on the side. We have done some from the National Film Board and we are going to do some foreign films, using Canadian artists on the voice track, to make Canadiana possible.

We are ready to proceed on records as well, if you co-operate.

The Chairman: Thank you very much, Mr. Tietolman. We will adjourn until 2:30.

Upon resuming at 2:30 p.m.

The Chairman: Honourable Senators, if I may call the session to order. The brief we are receiving this afternoon is from the Standard Broadcasting Corporation Limited. Seated on my immediate right is Mr. W. C. Thornton Cran, who is the President of Standard Broadcasting Corporation Limited. I am going to ask Mr. Cran to introduce the rest of the people who are here with him.

If I may just say to you Mr. Cran that the brief, which we requested, was received in compliance with our guidelines some three weeks in advance. It has been circulated to the senators and studied by them. We would like to ask you some questions on the brief, but before doing that we would like to put time at your disposal to make a brief oral statement; following that we would like to ask you some questions on your oral comments and on your written brief and perhaps on other matters as well. So on behalf of the Committee, welcome, and perhaps you could, first of all, introduce the rest of the people who are here with you.

Mr. W. C. Thornton Cran, President of Standard Broadcasting Corporation Limited: Thank you very much, Senator Davey. I have with me to-day Mr. Donald Hartford Vice-President and General Manager of CFRB Limited, Mr. H. T. McCurdy, President of CJAD Limited in Montreal, on my right, Mr. J. Lyman Potts, President of Standard Broadcast Productions Limited, on the far left Mr. Jack Dawson, Vice-President and Station Manager of CFRB Limited, Toronto on the right, and Mr. Sidney Margles Deputy News Director of CJAD News.

For several years I have been a Member of the Board of Directors of the Argus Corporation, which is the largest single shareholder in Standard Broadcasting Company, of which I have been President and Chief Executive since 1959.

We are here to support the written brief which you were kind enough to invite us to make and to answer any questions, or add any further information, which you may desire from us.

Perhaps I should mention that amongst the reporters present at the reporters' desk is Miss Leslie Empringham of our Ottawa Bureau who will be reporting on these proceedings. Whilst she is a valued member of our staff and of the press gallery she has failed, as yet to be admitted to membership of the National Press Club, due to some form of a discrimination. Perhaps your Committee can assist her in this matter!

A brief history of our Company.

On May 30th, 1925 Standard Radio Manufacturing Company was incorporated under Dominion Charter and its business was the manufacture of radio receivers for the Canadian market. Subsequently on February 19, 1927, it obtained a license and commenced to operate Radio Station CFRB in Toronto. On September 3, 1929, the name was changed to Rogers-Majestic Corporation Limited and it manufactured and marketed radio receivers under the brand names of Rogers-Majestic, Rogers Majestic, DeForest and Crossley. Through a wholly owned subsidiary, it also manufactured radio tubes. In October, 1929, shares of the Company were sold to the public—a long time ago.

On September 24, 1934, the operations of this radio station were transferred to a wholly owned subsidiary under the name of Rogers Radio Broadcasting Company Limited. In 1941 the whole of the manufacturing operation was sold and the parent company changed its name to Standard Radio Limited, whose only asset for a number of years was the shares of its subsidiary company Rogers Radio Broadcasting Company Limited. In 1947, shortly after the incorporation of the Argus Corporation, 49 per cent of the issued and outstanding common shares of Standard Radio were acquired by Argus, which holdings have been maintained to the present day.

On January 3, 1962, the broadcasting company changed its name to CFRB Limited and the parent company is today operating under the title of Standard Broadcasting Corporation Limited. The shares of this company are today held by some 2,400 individual shareholders and as a result of stock having been issued to employees under stock option schemes, the ownership of Argus Corporation has been reduced to 46.7 per cent. Because of the number of Canadian pension funds, mutual funds, Insurance companies and investment companies which are shareholders, I estimate that the total number of Canadians beneficially interested as investors must exceed 500,000 people.

The present operation of the Company can be described as follows: (1) CFRB Limited—Operating AM Radio Station CFRB at 1010 kilohertz in Toronto with a weekly cumulative audience, according to the last BBM report, of 1,377,600 persons, by far the largest audience of any radio station in Canada.

The programs of CFRB are simulcast on a low power short wave station CFRX, which original and prime purpose was to cover parts of the Canadian Arctic, but still would appear from the mail it receives, to enjoy quite a substantial audience in many parts of the world, due to the vagaries of short wave transmission. However, the audience of CFRX is not considered to be of any value from a point of view of commercial advertising.

An experimental FM license was granted at 46.4 mHz and operation began in October, 1940 until January 1941. After the War, operation resumed as CFRB-FM until the FM band was reallocated. Then on April 18, 1949 the operation continued at 99.9 on the FM dial and in July, 1961 it increased its power considerably and commenced programming separately from CFRB. The present call letters CKFM, were adopted in April, 1963. It was the first Canadian station to broadcast in stereo and today commands a weekly cumulative audience of 232,000 persons with the exception of a few newscasts that are simulcast. Both CFRB and CKFM broadcast entirely separate programs 24 hours a day but rely upon common facilities for Accounting, Engineering and News Departments. These two stations compete, not only with the many other AM and FM stations in the market area, but also with themselves, for a share of the audience.

(2) CJAD Limited—In 1960 Standard purchased the Montreal Station CJAD from the late Mr. J. Arthur Dupont, who had pioneered that station in 1945. The original 10 kilowatt transmitter plant was replaced with a new 50 kilowatt one at a new site on May 6, 1964. CJAD, at 800 on the dial, broadcasts 24 hours a day to a weekly cumulative audience of 492,000 persons. At certain times it attracts the largest audience in the Montreal market, amongst all radio stations French and English.

In October, 1962, its sister frequency modulation station was commenced with the call sign CJFM-FM and now has a weekly cumulative audience of 146,000 persons. Both CJAD and CJFM operate from the same premises with a separate programming but also share the facilities of Accounting, Engineering and News.

(3) Standard Broadcast Sales Company Limited: On December 1, 1962, Standard Broadcast Sales Company Limited was formed as a wholly owned subsidiary to carry on the sale of air-time to national advertisers in Canada. This business is commonly known as a "rep" house. The present roster of stations represented by Standard Broadcast Sales is as follows:

Vancouver—CKNW and CFMI-FM.
Calgary—CHQR
Winnipeg—CJOB-AM and FM
London—CKSL
Hamilton—CHML-AM and CKDS-FM
Toronto—CFRB-AM and CKFM-FM
Montreal—CJAD-AM and CJFM-FM
Halifax—CHNS and CHFX-FM

(4) Canadian Standard Broadcast Sales Inc.—Although, in recent years, the dollar volume of radio and television broadcasting revenue from the United States has not been large, on January 12, 1966, the Company—Canadian Standard Broadcast Sales Inc., was formed as a wholly owned subsidiary and operates with a small staff with an office in New York City with representatives in other major markets of the United States. Currently Canadian Standard Broadcast Sales represents 56 Canadian radio and 12 Canadian television stations in the United States market. This includes three CBC French language television stations. The sales for this company for the month of March, 1970 were at an all time high.

(5) Standard Broadcast Productions Limited: This further wholly owned subsidiary was formed on June 1 1966, and is one of the pioneers of a cross-country news service intended for private radio stations. 16 stations, ranging from Vancouver to St. John's Newfoundland, currently subscribe to Standard Broadcast News Service which transmits voice clips and news actualities on an hourly basis and more frequently if required. The subscribing stations across Canada all act as "pick-up" stations for news in their respective areas and the Ottawa Bureau is staffed by three full time representatives. The majority of the International News is obtained through the National Broadcasting Company, which is able to afford to maintain full time representatives in the principal news centres of the world."

I might add to here that we also have some of our own staff. We have someone down at Cape Canaveral and Houston and now one in Montreal to cover things from a Canadian angle.

"Standard Broadcast Productions also syndicates, to other Canadian stations, a number of programs prepared by Canadian artists and commentators. Some are distributed by wire—others by tape.

The management of Standard Productions has, for a number of years, devoted considerable time and effort to the creation and maintenance of the Canadian Talent Library, which is now subscribed to by 172 other Canadian radio stations. Canadian Talent Library is, in fact, operated as a non-profit trust with the Crown Trust Company as the Trustees. All the subscriptions of other stations, together with substantial subsidies made by CFRB and CJAD are reinvested in further Canadian recordings.

The Canadian Talent Library of records is leased out to any Canadian Station. There is no exclusivity in any market. In addition, it is being leased to the British Broadcasting Corporation in England and incorporated in a broadcasting tape service in the United States. Many of CTL's recordings have been put on the Canadian and International markets under various recognized record labels. Recently the CTL has agreed to provide Air Canada with background music tapes for its fleet of planes so that Canadians can enjoy music played by Canadians rather than the U.S. tapes they have been using up to now.

(6) Standard Sound Systems Company Limited: This company was formed as a wholly owned subsidiary on December 7, 1966, and originally started a background music service utilizing the facilities of a sub-carrier of CJFM in the Montreal area. After this had been successfully built up over a three year period a similar service was started in Toronto.

However, in September, 1968, the opportunity arose to purchase the Muzak franchise and business for the Provinces of Quebec, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland. The bulk of the subscribers of this service were located in Montreal, Quebec City and Halifax. Acquisition of this Muzak franchise forced Standard to dispose of its Toronto Background Music operation to Associated Broadcasting Company Limited who held the Muzak franchise for Ontario. The Toronto Branch of Standard Sound Systems then changed over to a contracting business, concentrating upon schools and hospitals and its two principal lines of equipment are the Dukane (audio communications) and Philips (for closed circuit TV purposes.)"

Well, Senator Davey and your colleagues—that, I think, describes who we are. You have our written brief in front of you. We shall endeavour to answer any questions that you may have.

The Chairman: Thank you very much, Mr. Cran. The procedure we follow here is very simple. The Senators will put their questions to you and if you wish in turn to hand them off to your colleagues, please feel free to do so and indeed I think the Senators should feel free to put some questions to some of your colleagues, but they will certainly begin by putting them to you and you, if you wish can hand them off.

I believe that questioning this afternoon is going to start with Senator McElman.

Senator McElman: Mr. Cran, this morning we heard from Countryside Holdings. In their brief and in the course of discussions, it became evident that they hold, as an individual part of the broadcasting industry, a concern and I think it could be even expressed as a fear, that if they enter into certain areas, which they refer to as unpopular causes, they would have reason to fear what action might come upon them from the CRTC, because of such controversial broadcasting. Your station, CFRB, employs a stable of people who cover controversial subjects in their talk programs, such as Gordon Sinclair. Apparently you hold no such fear, so which of these attitudes...

Mr. Cran: Excuse me, Senator for interrupting you but his son is sitting right behind you.

Senator McElman: Is he as tough as his father! What do they pay you Mr. Sinclair?

As between these two approaches to the regulatory body, which is more indicative of the general broadcasters approach?

The Chairman: It just might be helpful for anybody who has the brief from this morning here, to actually read that quote.

Senator McElman: It reads as follows, Mr. Chairman:

"...the Stations performance is subject to minute and continuing scrutiny by the CRTC. It would be a brave broadcaster indeed who undertook to promote an unpopular cause"—and then further on "...no radio station, large or small, will do anything that might jeopardize its license."

In the questioning—I don't think I misrepresented the answers we got, there appeared to be even more than a concern—I think perhaps a fear that if a broadcaster entered into a controversial or as they termed them "unpopular areas of discussions" that they might have reason to fear whether they would have a renewal of license. Does your organization hold any such fears?

Mr. Cran: May I ask Jack Dawson to answer that question.

The Chairman: Mr. Dawson?

Mr. Jack Dawson, Vice-President and Station Manager of CFRB Limited, Toronto: Mr. McElman, I think placing a station's license in jeopardy is one thing—I mean we know the rules by which we must operate our broadcasting station, as all broadcasters do, I am sure.

However, in the area of controversial broadcasting, I honestly think that a great deal of it depends on who it is or who is being controversial. If it is a young lad who is new to the news media or new to the industry—and most of us found ourselves in that position at one time—I think that there is a tendency for some young broadcasters to try to emulate those outspoken individuals of a good number of years experience in the industry in order to gain some form—I hesitate to say "notoriety"—but perhaps that is the word I mean.

I truly believe that as far as our station is concerned we are rather fortunate in being able to attract to our stable, as you refer to them, of broadcasters, very experienced individuals who have been around a long time. They have their own considered opinions on a subject and they are not adverse to expressing them. Does that answer your question, sir?

Senator McElman: To a degree. Are there are strictures put upon the broadcaster who have or do enter these controversial fields such as Mr. Sinclair. Do they have a consultation before they develop a subject or do they have a free-wheeling approach?

Mr. Dawson: I believe in the main, Senator McElman, they have a free-wheeling approach. I cannot think of the last time quite frankly, that Gordon Sinclair has consulted me on a given approach that he was going to take to a subject. However, I know that it happens very occasionally, and by "very occasionally", I do mean probably once in a two-year period.

Senator McElman: After these then, have there been occasions, and if so in what frequency, where it has been necessary for management to discuss with one of your staff that perhaps may have gone too far along on a given subject and that they might take a different approach or a less direct approach or a less controversial approach?

Mr. Dawson: I really can't think of one Senator McElman. I believe that in the area of good taste, that this is in the eye of all of us. We all have various views on matters of good taste, of course, and we are subject to the laws of the land and I don't believe, to mention Mr. Sinclair's name again, he has ever been sued. We have had a couple threats but I don't know of one in my association with the radio station that ever reached the Examination for Discovery. Is that the proper phrase?

Mr. Fortier: Yes.

Mr. Dawson: Is that good enough?

Mr. Fortier: Yes.

Mr. Cran: May I add to Mr. Dawson's answer?

The Chairman: By all means.

Mr. Cran: We do have a problem, occasionally, with a younger and less experienced announcer who may try to emulate the people who are so very successful, like Gordon Sinclair or Pierre Berton or somebody like that and who say things which are out of place. Then we have to speak to them to put them in line.

Senator McElman: But not with the...

Mr. Cran: Not with the experienced ones, no.

Senator McElman: In the utmost good humour this morning, since Mr. Sinclair has an association with Countryside we asked what they were paying him and we prefaced this with saying that we were going to ask Sinclair-type of questions. The answer we got was nil—they paid him nothing. We then asked if he was delivering as much value as he was being paid. What are you paying Gordon Sinclair?

Mr. Cran: No comment.

Mr. Dawson: There is another department on the Hill than can tell exactly.

Mr. Cran: If you listen to the station often enough, he will tell you!

The Chairman: Mr. Fortier?

Mr. Fortier: Do your stations, Mr. Cran, stand behind your commentators such as Leslie Roberts and Rod Blaker and Gordon Sinclair? What I'm trying to get at is I have heard in Montreal for example, over station CJAD the statement on occasion "that this is Mr. Roberts' view and it does not necessarily represent the view of the station", but correct me if I am wrong, on other occasions, I haven't heard it. It seems to depend on the nature of the editorial or the comment?

Mr. H. T. McCurdy, President, CJAD Limited, Montreal: I think the actual statement, Mr. Fortier, is "the freely expressed opinions of—," and we don't add the phrase that you quoted.

Mr. Fortier: Did you not at one time add that phrase?

Mr. McCurdy: Yes it may have been but it was a long time ago because all we try to point out, in any of these introductions or closings to commentaries, is to clearly establish in the ears of the listeners, that they do not necessarily reflect our views because we do not have an editorial stand as a station.

Mr. Fortier: Well, that was going to be my next question.

Mr. McCurdy: We have a variety of commentators and I think we probably do as much controversial commentary as our big brother in Toronto; but we try, in the course of a given day or week, to air a variety of views on any given topic; I suppose as a means of informing the public so that they may be better able from all sources of information to draw their own conclusions. If you have listened you may have heard Blaker disagree with Roberts or agree or disagree with both.

Mr. Fortier: Should radio stations have an editorial stand—take an editorial policy?

The Chairman: Mr. Cran?

Mr. Cran: We have considered the matter from time to time and I am afraid we have rejected it. We have decided that having these various views, many of which are conflicting, on different aspects of a subject was a better policy. Management, in any way, are inclined to be involved in playing down the views of station.

Mr. Fortier: Can you envisage a situation in Canada where you would feel compelled as a broadcaster to take a company view, as a newspaper would at the time of an election, for example, and recommend that people vote for Mr. X or party Y?

Mr. Cran: No.

Mr. Fortier: You don't think that this is...

Mr. Cran: I can't envisage it myself.

Mr. Fortier: You don't think that this is really within the purview of a radio station, is that correct?

Mr. Cran: No.

Mr. McCurdy: In the field of politics I would hesitate but I think there are other issues in which we would take a stand. We have taken stands on things like crime and pollution and various things that are in the community or of national interest.

The Chairman: Have you taken any stand on issues which you perhaps might regard as unpopular causes? You know, it is very "in" to be against pollution these days but are there other examples of causes you have found which may not be broadly popular in the community.

Mr. Jack Dawson: I can think of one, Senator Davey, that we issued as a direct station editorial and by that I mean placing it at a specific time—prime time. We repeated it three times, I believe, in the course of a 24 hour period. That was a number of years ago—it was probably 8 or 10 years ago now and even maybe longer than that. I have forgotten the exact issue but there was some controversy about the CBC being responsible to the Government rather than to Parliament. There was some controversy at that time in the public press and we took the view: "please, hands off the CBC".

The Chairman: Probably concerning the program "Preview Commentary" in the morning?

Mr. Dawson: It may well have been, senator, that is the only editorial that I can ever remember...

The Chairman: We should perhaps return to Senator McElman but if I can just ask one final supplementary question on your opening question. The witness this morning—I think some of us were astonished, and I don't think Senator McElman has over-stated the case, that they were fearful that controversial programming—not bad broadcasting—but controversial programming might cost them their license. Do you fellows live in that kind of fear at all?

Mr. Cran: No, we don't live in any fear at all.

Mr. Fortier: Would the size of your organization have anything to do with that?

Mr. Cran: Well, I suppose that helps but we don't fear any sponsor, we don't fear the attitudes of any shareholders.

The Chairman: They were referring specifically to the CRTC.

Mr. Cran: A small station which has a very small number of sponsors in one small community probably has to be afraid of what they might say about some of the local people.

The Chairman: That wasn't the context—it was a fear of a government agency. However, I think in fairness to the people who were here this morning we perhaps at this point may be guilty of saying things...

Mr. Cran: We may fear the CRTC if they lift our license.

The Chairman: Well, their point—they were afraid of having their license lifted on the basis of controversial programming. That is precisely what their fear was.

Mr. Fortier: For example they said they would never criticize the CRTC in answer to a question from Senator McElman.

Mr. Cran: We frequently have to send tapes up to the CRTC because complaints go to a Member of Parliament or something like that. Gordon Sinclair—you mentioned Gordon Sinclair—half of his audience love him and the other half hate him and the same thing with Berton and Templeton.

The Chairman: Which half are you in, Mr. Cran?

Mr. Cran: No comment.

The Chairman: Senator McElman?

Senator McElman: This morning following this line of questioning, I gave the example of the station and manager in Fredericton, Jack Fenety who is the immediate Past President or Vice-President of CAB.

Mr. Cran: Right.

Senator McElman: Mr. Fenety is a very straight forward fellow and he was interviewed for a half hour by one of his own staff on the new CRTC proposals and he was his usual out-spoken self. He said many unkind things in that context about the proposals and by experience against the CRTC and their regulations in general, and I ask "Would this be the sort of thing that would give you cause for fear?" and the answer was "Yes".

Out of your experience in broadcasting do you feel that any broadcaster in Canada should hold such a fear of the regulatory body? Is there any basis for such a fear out of your experience?

The Chairman: Mr. Cran?

Mr. Cran: There is, I suppose, a fear that broadcasters might well hold when it comes—if there is going to be an extension by the CRTC in to what types of programs to give by regulation, and with the rules we have worked under up to now, that might become very fearful and I hope it would never occur.

Senator McElman: But out of the rules that you have been operating under up to now, today, and taking this into consideration...

Mr. Cran: We have no cause for concern. As a matter of fact with the proposed regulation which is being debated now across the road and will be for the next few days, about the 30 per cent Canadian music content—I was dragooned by Gordon Sinclair to go on his show one evening and he interviewed me for the whole show. I welcomed it because we had been working towards that for many years with the creation of the Canadian Talent Library. We felt that with the position we held in these two predominantly large markets, it was incumbent upon us to employ musicians and to get them exposure as Canadian musicians throughout the country. We felt that just followed along the line of our own thinking; but we haven't got any fear at the moment.

Senator McElman: Unless there are supplements on that perhaps I could change the subject.

Senator Smith: Let me ask a question on that.

The Chairman: Senator Smith?

Senator Smith: Mr. Cran, I wonder if you personally have held views opposite to the ones you have just expressed with regards to this 30 per cent Canadian content. Would you have felt quite free from fear of any kind of repercussion if you had expressed those views in strong language on that program?

Mr. Cran: Sure.

Senator Smith: On that program?

Mr. Cran: Sure.

Senator Smith: You would have gone right ahead just the same?

Mr. Cran: Yes.

21494—4

The Chairman: Senator McElman?

Senator McElman: Perhaps at this point it would be a good time to move to the provision of 30 per cent...

The Chairman: Fine.

Senator McElman: Would you let us have your views on this?

Mr. Cran: Well, as I say we have been working towards this and I think that currently we are running around 17 per cent Canadian music on our station. We are getting it up now so that we can produce more by the deadline and I believe we will do it—the 30 per cent by then. However, I will repeat what I said before that I don't think it is right for people like us in our position to take large amounts of money out of the market, like Toronto or Montreal, in advertising and to depend upon music as a substantial portion of our program content, and not involve in someway or the other the employment of local Canadian musicians.

It is impractical today to have it live. That is why we did it on a recorded basis and those recordings, we make available to any other station in the country.

Senator McElman: You feel that your station will be able to meet this requirement by the proposed date?

Mr. Cran: Yes.

The Chairman: May I ask Mr. Hartford a supplementary question on this.

Senator McElman: Well, I have a supplementary on this too. Do you feel that other broadcasters throughout the country will be able to meet the requirement without measurable difficulty?

Mr. Cran: I am not sufficiently aware of other broadcasters. Perhaps Mr. Potts would care to answer you.

The Chairman: Mr. Potts?

Mr. J. Lyman Potts, President, Standard Broadcast Productions Limited: Senator, I think it will vary across the country depending upon the format of the station. I was interviewed on the CBC coast to coast program "As it Happens" the other night and they had many of the same questions, but I think it will vary. Some stations will follow a rural appeal or country music and this kind of thing, but the question is: is there enough country music in this country to satisfy the need of that station or will the station have to go half-classical or into a more popular field in order to find the right amount of music, which will distort the image of that station in the mind of the listener.

It may vary from station to station across the country depending on how they are appealing to the public. This will also vary too from station to station as to the supply. Everybody feels that the fellow who is doing something else is going to be all right. The rock station thinks they are going to be hit hard and so the middle of the road is all right; the middle of the road says "who is going to record those big orchestras that we need by Canadians? Certainly no recording company is going to because they must have their money back in Canada and you need an international release." The people are wondering where the André Kostelanetz records are coming from for "Candlelight and Wine" and so forth.

But just what records are going to be made? There is a feeling that, as a result of this regulation, a lot of people are going to get into the recording act and start making records. Now, what kind of records are going to be made by these people? Who are going to risk their money on the records remains to be seen; but some stations are waiting to see whether the supply is going to be there or not.

In producing the Canadian Talent Library, we had endeavoured to demonstrate that in this country we have excellent musicians and singers of all types and we have tried to put forth a representative group of recordings that covers the complete spectrum of music. We have tried to plan against this particular day for one thing, but secondly because we want to do this and we have tried to make things of lasting value because there was so little of the Canadian. So we have recorded a lot of our material down the middle, steering right or left from time to time. We had hoped by our example to suggest to other broadcasters that if it agreed with us in our concept, they start their own show and do something similar. But if everybody did something, there would be no need for a regulation today. The regulation comes as a result of the minority not doing something, or not living up to the public expectations of the broadcasters—that is where most of our regulations come from.

Regulations are made to cover minority operators not the majority of stations. This is why we have this today. Some stations, to answer your question, will have some difficulty, I think, but it varies as to the market.

Mr. Cran: Senator, if I may interrupt and add to Mr. Potts answer. If I was operating a station, on which I was using all classical music, like some FM stations have done in the past, I would be extremely concerned because there just is not that amount of classical music available in Canada. We have made an investment in it ourselves, because we have a particular program which we have been doing for 25 years of two hours of classical music in the evening and only a tiny percentage of that is available from Canadian sources. If you were doing that all day long you would be in an awful bind.

The Chairman: Mr. Hartford?

Mr. Donald Hartford, President, CRFB Limited: Well, yes, it has been said that we feel we can live with the 30 per cent, and one has to sympathize with what the CRTC are trying to do, but the thing that I am some concerned with is the entry by the CRTC into the matters of programming a station. It is unfortunate that this has to be the way we have to get our 30 per cent, because when you get into the entertainment area of programming, that becomes another matter altogether; quite apart from the 30 per cent which motivates that agency. In the long run—you know, governments change, people change and if others say: "Well, that was one way to go. Perhaps we can rely on some guidelines for news and other things".

I personally feel that the listener is probably the best censor of the whole thing. If you put on something they don't like, they go away in great droves. You don't have an audience, you can't sell it and you are out of business. So the most desirable effect would be to have free access to the type of audience that you could get; but some broadcasters feel differently and I guess that is why we have such forms of program control in a way.

Now, the thing Mr. Cran just mentioned—don't think they are programs they wish to inhibit but if it does go through in these cases it will. In our case, "Starlight Serenade", two hours each evening of classical music, there is very little Canadian and it is very expensive to produce. And adjacent to that, we have another hour with Ray Sonin who plays songs from the past and on Saturday evening play songs from England. It is pretty difficult to make these Canadian; but if you put them back to back you can average over four hours—so that you couldn't really comply if that came into effect. There is absolutely no way to move on it at all in any direction, there is no latitude in that you could average it some other way, so those programs would probably have to go. There aren't that many doing this kind of programming any more and I'm sure there are aspects of this which they would look at.

The Chairman: There has been indications, I believe, that the CRTC will offer some latitude in these various areas. I have heard discussions where obviously a program of opera would be an enormous problem. So assuming they give that kind of latitude, isn't it unfair to suggest that it is program control? That is really what you are talking about—music content? They are not saying that CFRB, for example, has to run any music at all and they are not indicating the kind of music that you have to run. You could become an all news station if you wanted to.

Mr. Hartford: That is so, but I think what I really said was I hoped that it is a move in the direction...

The Chairman: Fine.

Mr. Hartford: That if we start to think in the terms of should we have 30 per cent of any kind of music—well, then perhaps should we have a percentage of Canadian content in news and should we relate it to other things. Then you are really getting into a programming area. I didn't mean to be unfair because I said I hoped we really don't, to any great extent get into that kind of thing. Perhaps the broadcasters as such—and I know it is difficult for some—will do a little self-analysis and maybe it will become a little less necessary in the future.

The Chairman: Senator McElman?

Senator McElman: What you are saying in effect, Mr. Hartford, is that if some stations want to put on four hours of music in the Cantonese-style, it is up to him if he can stay alive...

Mr. Hartford: I wish he could.

Senator McElman: If he could survive.

Mr. Hartford: I wish we didn't have to get into a control because if he feels four hours of Cantonese music is for him, if he feels he can live on it and some people enjoy it, I wish he could have the right to do that. I haven't any good answer to that, but it is unfortunate that we have to get into an area where this will prohibit it.

Senator McElman: Alright, let us just forget the mechanics for a moment—the principal and the objective that is imprinted in the CRTC proposals—do you support the objectives?

Mr. Hartford: Yes.

Senator McElman: Of greater Canadianization?

Mr. Hartford: Yes, I believe I started by saying that one really can't quarrel with the objectives—that it well might be there may be some modifications yet, there often are on these things.

Senator McElman: Yes, you are right. It is only a proposal so far.

Mr. Hartford: Yes.

Senator McElman: In light of it being a proposal only and thus far we are only having opinions on it, I take it from what has been said that you don't support entirely the extreme and generalized approach taken the CAB thus far?

Mr. Hartford: We don't fully support some of these things the CAB does. We are members and we basically support the idea of the CAB but we don't always. We don't support them for example, in release of rate card data and such things. Often we go at odds with them and sometimes we are the only station. I guess it may create problems for them and we sympathize with what they are doing as well but we have a large audience to think about and a large station of which we are proud and we go our own way in a great many instances.

Senator McElman: In the current situation as I understand it, CAB says that the proposal for 30 per cent in music is impractical and unattainable. You would not subscribe to that, I take it?

Mr. Hartford: No, we don't personally but you must remember they are speaking for a group of stations and they are perhaps talking for stations that are perhaps going to find it that difficult—I don't know.

Senator McElman: Well, looking at the broadcasting industry across the country, and I'm sure you have a good view of it, could you believe that to be a proper terminology to be used for the industry as a whole? That is that it is impractical and unobtainable?

Mr. Hartford: I find it pretty difficult to comment on that statement because I wouldn't like to discuss the operation of a radio station run by someone else really.

The Chairman: I think that is an acceptable answer. I think if a witness can only talk about CFRB, in fairness...

Mr. Fortier: This really flows from something that Mr. Hartford has said. Laudible though the objectives may be, which is not exemplified by these proposals, you spoke a few minutes earlier of what I suppose is your most important commodity—your listeners. Do you have reason to believe that your listeners want more Canadian music?

Mr. Hartford: Music is only a part of a mix, you know. If you listen to a morning run which a few years ago—we call it a morning run...

Mr. Fortier: Yes.
